To His GRACE

The Duke of BEDFORD.

E do not prefix Your GRACE's Name to this second Volume, from a vain Presumption, that your Knowledge in antient History can receive any Improvement, being very sensible, that Your GRACE has already gone through this and all other Branches of polite Learning, the inseparable Companions of true Nobility : But Patrons of avowed Merit and Discernment are so necessary to Works of this immense Labour and Charge, that it would be an unpardonable Temerity in us to send ours abroad, without One of such distinguished Abilities.

THIS, My LORD, is the powerful Motive which has encouraged us to address ourselves to Your GRACE : For nothing can more effectually recommend our Labours to this, or to those other Nations into whose Language our former Volume has been translated, than the Consideration, that the Authors would never have dared to have published them under the Protection of a Personage so eminent for his Quality and refined Taste, but from a Consciousness of their having spared neither Pains nor Time to render the Performance worthy of Your GRACE's and the World's Acceptance.

IN This, My LORD, You will have the Pleasure of promoting a Design, which, we hope, will prove of the greatest greatest Advantage to this and future Generations, who will be furnished with a complete Body of History, without the irksome Task of consulting that vast Variety of Authors of all Ages and Countries, out of which it is compiled ; and the Reader at the same time directed by the Marginal Notes where to recur to the Originals ; so that to doubt of Your GRACE'S approving of an Undertaking so universally useful, so long wished-for by the Learned of most Nations, and never till now attempted, at least in this extensive Way, were to call in Question the most conspicuous Part of Your GRACE'S Character.

AND here, My LORD, whilst we shelter this Volume under Your Illustrious Name, how gladly should we embrace this Opportunity of paying that Tribute, which is but a just Debt from every honest Heart, to a Nobleman whose exalted Birth and Merit shine with so equal a Lustre ! But this Subject, grateful as it would be to us, and indeed to all that know Your GRACE, we must be forced to decline, being convinced, that Your GRACE'S Actions will more infallibly transmit it to Posterity, than the Pens of the ablest Panegyrists.

PERMIT us only to add, That it is from a true Sense of this, we have taken the Liberty of inscribing the following Sheets to Your GRACE ; being, with the profoundest Respect,

MY LORD,

CHAP. X.

The History of the MEDES.

SECT. I.

The Description of MEDIA.

THE country before us, once the seat of a potent empire, derives its name Name, situation, &c. from Madai the third son of Japhet, as is plain from scripture, where the Medes are constantly call'd Madai^a (A). It was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by part of the Caspian sea; on the south by Persis, Sufiana, and Affyria; on the east by Partbia and Hyrkania; and on the west by Armenia Major. It was in ancient times divided into several provinces, namely Tropatene, Charomitbrene, Darites, Marciane, Amariace, and Syro-Media: All these were by a later division reduced to two only; the one called Media Magna, the other Media Atropatia, or simply Atropatene^b.

Atropatene was that part which lay between mount Taurus and the Caspian sea, and is supposed to have been so called from one Atropatus, who being governor of this province in the time of Darius, the last Persian monarch, withstood Alexander the Great, and upon the downfall of the Persian monarchy seized on this part of Media, and transmitted it to his posterity, who held it as sovereigns to Strabo's time^c. This was a cold, barren, and inhospitable country, and on that very account allotted by Shalmaneser for the abode of many captive Israelites after the conquest of that kingdom.

CITIES of note in this part of Media were Gaza or Gaza, the metropolis of the province, and situated, according to Pliny, in a spacious plain between Ecbatan and Artaxata, and equally distant from both. Sanina seated between the Araxes and the Cambyfes; Fazina between the Cambyfes and the Cyrus; and Cyropolis between the

(A) Among profane authors, some derive the name of Media from one Medus, the son of Media and Jafon; others from a city here call'd Media; whence, say they, the whole country borrow'd its name (1). Sextus Rufus tells us, that in his time it was known by the name of A'edena (2); and from others we learn (3), that it was also called Aria. But to enquire farther into the origin of these various appellations, would prove both a laborious and fruitless task.

Cyrus and the Amardus. This tract was inhabited by the Cadusians and Caspians, a barbarous and inhuman race, originally sprung from the Scythians.

Media Magna was bounded by Perfis, Parthia, Hyrkania, the Hyrcanian Sea, and Atropatene. The most remarkable cities in this part of Media were Ecbatan, Laodicea, Apamea, Rageia, Arfacia, &c. Ecbatan, the metropolis of all Media, and the seat both of the Median and Persian monarchs, was built by Dejoces, the first that reign'd in Media after the inhabitants had shaken off the Assyrian yoke^a. The walls of this city are said, in the book of Judith, to have been built by Arphaxad, who is generally supposed to be the same with Pbraarjes, the successor of Dejoces.[†] They are much celebrated by the ancients, and minutely described by Herodotus^{*}: they were seven in number, all of a circular form, and gradually rising above each other by the height of the battlements of each wall. The situation of the ground, rising by an easy ascent, was very favourable to the design of building them, and perhaps first suggested it. The royal palace and treasury were within the innermost circle of the seven. The first of these walls was equal in circumference to the city of Athens, that is, according to Thucydides^{*}, 178 furlongs; and had white battlements, the second black, the third of a purple colour, the fourth blue, and the fifth of a deep orange; but the two innermost, as serving more immediately for a fence to the royal person of the king, were embellish'd above the others, the one being done over with silver, and the other with gold[†]. This description of Herodotus favours, we must own, somewhat of romance; but nevertheless, that Ecbatan was a great and powerful city, and perhaps no ways inferior either to Nineveh or Babylon, is confirmed by far better authorities. In the book of Judith^{*} we read, that the walls of this stately metropolis were seventy cubits high, and fifty cubits broad; that the towers on the gates were a hundred cubits in height, the breadth in the foundation sixty cubits, and the walls built of hewn and polished stone, each stone being six cubits in length, and three in breadth. This city is by the ancients constantly call'd Ecbatan of Media, to distinguish it from another in Syria bearing the same name^b, where the unfortunate Cambyfes died, as we read in Herodotus[†] (B).

Laodicea, of which appellation there were many towns, so call'd either from the mother of Nicator or the wife of Antiochus, is counted by Strabo^{*} among the cities of Media, and placed by Pliny^{} near the confines of Persia. Apamea is by Strabo sometimes adjudged to Media, and sometimes to Parthia[†]. Raga, Rageia, or Ragea, is call'd by Isidorus[‡] the greatest city of Media: it was repair'd by Nicator, who call'd it Europus, and by that name it was known to Ptolemy; but in the book of Tobit it is call'd Rages, and placed in the neighbourhood of Ecbatan^{††}. In pro-

(B) Pliny (4) tells us, that Ecbatan was built by Seleucus; an unaccountable oversight, since he must have read an account of it not only in Herodotus, but likewise in Demoftbenes (5), who calls it the ordinary residence of the Persian monarchs. On the other hand, Diodorus (6) carries the building of this town back to the fabulous times of Semiramis, and speaks of mountains levelled, vallies raised, waters convey'd through rocky mountains, and other astonishing works performed by his heroine for the embellishment of the city, and convenience of the inhabitants. This great city was situate on a rising ground, according to Ptolemy and Diodorus, about twelve stades distance from mount Orontes, and not at the foot of mount Jafanius on the southern confines of Media and Persia, where Ammianus Marcellinus is pleased to place it (7). Here Daniel is said by Josephus to have built a stately palace, which afterwards served as a mausoleum of the kings of Media. Some of the beams, says this author, were of silver, and the rest of cedar, but plated with gold. There are now no monuments remaining, either of this magnificent building, or of the proud palace, where the monarchs of Asia were wont to pass their summer; nay, there is a great disagreement among our modern travellers about the place where that stately metropolis stood. The opinion of Molet, who translated and wrote a commentary upon Ptolemy, seems to Sir John Chardin the most probable, viz. that Tauris is the ancient and famous Ecbatan (8); and this opinion is confirmed by Orrellius, Golnitz, Teixera, Andrea della valle, &c. Josephus assures us (9), that the palace built by Daniel was entire in his time; but at present not even the ruins of any magnificent building are to be seen either at Tauris, or in that neighbourhood; for in all the ruins there the materials, as our traveller judiciously observes (10), are only earth, brick, and pebbles, which in ancient times were never used in Media for the building of palaces. Some writers confound Ecbatan with Batana, which is evidently Ptolemy's Batina, and placed by him to the north of mount Orontes, near the river Straton.

a cels of time it became the seat of the Partbian kings, who gave it the name of Ar-facia or Arface, as we shall see in the history of that people. Other cities of Media are mention'd by Pliny, Stephanus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Isidorus, viz. Zombis, Patigran, Gazaca, Margasis, &c. but these were all built in after-ages by the Macedonians, and are therefore call'd by Strabo " Greek cities. This part of Media was inhabited by the Carducians, Marandæans, Gelians, Syromedians, Margasians, &c.

THE mountains of this country, such as may be proper to take notice of, are, Mountains and rivers. according to Ptolemy and Strabo °, Choatra parting Media from Assyria, and branching out from the Gordyeen mountains on the confines of Assyria and Armenia; Zagrus dividing it from the same Assyria on the east, a mountain, if Polybius p is to be b credited, one hundred cubits high. Paracboatra placed by Ptolemy on the borders towards Persia, and by Strabo q on the confines of Media, Hyrkania, and Partbia.
These are the boundaries between Media and the adjacent regions, and therefore may be said as properly to belong to the latter as to the former; but the Orontes, the Jansonius, and the Coronus are in the strictest sense mountains of Media, as arising in the very heart of the country. The rivers of note are, according to Ptolemy, the Straton, the Amardus, the Cyrus, and the Cambyfes. But these rivers, as they are represented to disembody themselves into the most southern part of the Caspian, must by their position have belonged to the provinces of Gbilan and Mazandaran, as they are now call'd, and consequently could not belong to Media proper, as it is described c to us by the ancients.

WE cannot help taking notice here of a considerable mistake, which many of the ancients have been guilty of with respect to the situation of the Caspian Straits, called by the Latins Portæ Caspiæ, Claustra Caspia, and Pylæ Caspiæ. Ptolemy, Strabo, Ar-rian, Isidorus, Characenus, and Dionysius Periegeta r, place them on the confines of Media and Partbia, or on the eastern borders of Media. But Pliny, not liking this situation, carries them quite cross the country; and after having been some time at a loss how to dispose of so heavy a load, drops it at last on the confines of Media and Armenia, that is, on the most western borders of Media s. Suetonius t and Tacitus u confound them with the Iberian straits, which are a narrow passage through the d mountains dividing Iberia from Sarmatia. Some of our modern geographers place them in Media Atropatia, between the Caspian mountains and the Caspian sea, confounding them with what the present inhabitants call Demir-can, or Iron-gate, which is a narrow passage out of Tartary into Persia.

THE northern parts of Media, lying between the Caspian mountains and the sea, Soil.
are very cold and barren: the present inhabitants make their bread of dried almonds, and their drink of the juice of certain herbs. Here the snow lies on the mountains for nine months in the year v. But the southern parts are productive of all sorts of grain, and necessaries for life, and withal so pleasant, that the country adjoining to Tauris, probably the ancient Ecbatan, is call'd the garden of Persia. There are here
e large plains, among which that of Nysa is famous for the numerous studs of horses that were kept in it for the use of the Persian monarchs, and are often mentioned and celebrated by the ancients. Where this plain of Nysa was situated, is no easy matter to determine (C).

(C) The ancients place the Nysæan plain in the easternmost parts of what they call Media, and far beyond the limits of what is now supposed to have been properly this country. We have a traveller, who thinks he has seen this fertile pasture; but if he did, we must place it quite differently from what the ancients seem to insinuate it ought to be, and several degrees nearer us. His words are, "We continued our way (from Tauris towards Persia) upon the most beautiful and fertile plains cover'd with villages. These plains afford the most excellent pasture of all Media, and, I dare say, of the whole world, and the best horses of the country were there at grass.—I ask'd a young nobleman in company with us, If there were any other plains in Media so fine and so extensive? He told me, He had seen some as fine about Derbent, but none more " extensive; so that 'tis reasonable enough to believe, that these plains are the Hypobaton of the ancients, and where they say the kings of Media had a stud of fifty thousand horses, and that here it is also we must look for the Nysæan plain, so famous for the horses of that name. Stephanus the geographer says, that Nysa was in the country of the Medes. I told this same nobleman some particulars which historians relate concerning these horses, particularly Phavorinus, who says, all the Nysæan horses were light duns; he answer'd, that he had never read or heard any thing of the kind. I afterwards enquired of several gentlemen of learning, but could never understand that there was any place either in Persia or Media that produced horses of that colour (11)."

(11) Chardin. ubi supra, p. 185.

Climate.

THE climate is very unequal; that part which lies between the mountains and the sea is exceeding cold, and the earth swampy, and full of marshes, where innumerable swarms of venomous insects are bred (D), which, together with the vapours rising from the Caspian, render that part very inhospitable. The provinces that are more remote from the sea enjoy a very wholesome air, though liable to heavy rains and violent storms, especially in the spring and autumn *. Besides the cattle and game of all sorts, which the Mediterranean provinces abound with, some of them have been for many ages remarkable on account of the various sorts of excellent wines they produce, especially the neighbourhood of Tauris, where no fewer than sixty different kinds of grapes, all of an exquisite flavour, are to be tasted at this day †. From its productions in the present state, we may judge what it must have been in better times.

The Caspian sea.

WE cannot dismiss this subject without some observations on the Caspian sea, which is the northern boundary of Media. This large body of waters was by the ancients called indifferently the Caspian and the Hyrcanian sea, from the Caspians and Hyrcanians, whose shores it washed ‡. However Pliny § makes some difference between these two appellations, telling us, that on the Caspian coasts it bears the former denomination, and on those of Hyrcania the latter. The ancient, and likewise the modern geographers, had but a very imperfect knowledge of the true situation, extent, coasts, and bays of this sea, before the discoveries made lately by a very able navigator and geographer (E); and therefore what has been said by others is only to be relied on so far as it agrees with the accounts he has given us. Ptolemy, and even Herodotus, knew that the Caspian was surrounded on all sides by land, without any communication with other seas or visible efflux; whence some thought that it ought to be call'd a lake rather than a sea. However Strabo ¶, Pliny , Pomponius Mela ††, and Arrian ‡‡ wrote that it was join'd either to the Indian or northern ocean; but we are well assured by experience that they were mistaken. They were perhaps led into this error by such as had made their observations when the Volga had overflowed its banks, at which time it appears more like a sea than a river, covering with its waters, as a modern traveller informs us †††, the whole country to the extent of sixty miles: This they might easily have mistaken for a strait joining the Caspian to the ocean. Ptolemy, though here in the right, was greatly mistaken as to its extent from east to west; for supposing it, as is rightly judged, to have extended, or rather to have been the same with the Aral or Salt Sea, at 10 degrees distant from it, he reckons it to have been about twenty-three degrees and a half; whereas it does not exceed, where widest, three degrees forty-two minutes, and where narrowest, one degree twenty-two minutes. He likewise places it three degrees more to the north than it really is. These mistakes were observed, and in some degree redressed, by Albufeda an Arabian prince and able geographer, who in 1320 discovered the true situation of the Caspian, and abridged its extent by a third of what Ptolemy had allow'd it. By this alteration its length was no more in longitude, as Ptolemy had placed it, but in latitude, as it truly is. Albufeda's observations were greatly improved by Bourrous, Olearius, and Jenkinson; but the true dimensions of this sea were not ascertain'd till the late observations abovemention'd; since which, the ingenious Basil Batatzi has given the world an accurate map of it, and of its adjacent countries, ann. 1732, printed in Greek and Latin by John Senex. By all which we are assured, that it lies between the thirty-seventh and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude, and does not exceed three degrees forty-two minutes in its greatest longitude, which gives it a quite different figure from what it is represented to have in the maps of Ptolemy, and in the writings of other ancient geographers.

THE Persians call this sea Kulsum, or the sea of Astracan; the Russians, the sea of Gualenskoï; the Georgians Sowa; the Armenians Soof. It receives the river Volga, which itself is like a sea, and near two hundred others into its bosom, and yet is never

(D) Ælian tells us (12), that these parts of Media were greatly infested by scorpions; and that while the king of Persia was on his progress into Media, the inhabitants were employ'd for three days before his arrival on the confines in clearing the country of these venomous insects.

(12) Ælian. de Animal. l. 15. c. 26.

(E) M. Vanverden, who by orders of the late Czar formed a very exact chart of the Caspian from observations made by him on the spot in 1710, 1721, 1722. These observations, together with M. Vanverden's new chart, were by the Czar's orders communicated to the royal academy of sciences at Paris.

a increased or diminished, nor observed to ebb or flow. This constant plenitude has given rise to many speculations, and some have imagined that it must necessarily have some subterraneous communication either with the Black sea, though a hundred leagues distant, or with the Persian gulf, which is near two hundred leagues distant from it. Father Avril, a modern traveller, seems to favour the latter opinion, and alledges this proof to confirm it, viz. that over-against the province of Xilan in Persia there are two immense whirlpools, which with an incredible rapidity and frightful noise suck in and swallow whatever comes near them, and are consequently caused by some great cavity in the earth. He adds, that every year about the latter end of the autumn a great quantity of willow leaves are observed floating on the water by those who inhabit the coasts of the Persian gulf; and as this tree is no where to be found near the Persian gulf, and on the other hand the coasts of the Caspian towards the province of Xilan are covered with them, he rightly concludes that there must be some subterraneous intercourse between these two seas. This observation, if true, is a strong proof of some secret communication between these two bodies of water, the leaves being conveyed through subterraneous fissures from the one to the other. But since the opinion, asserting a communication between the Caspian and other seas, has been taken up chiefly on this consideration, that as so many and so large rivers disembogue themselves into it, and are constantly pouring in their waters, in process of time the channel would be filled, and run over, unless there were subterraneous fissures and meatus's, through which it might evacuate its superfluous waters into the Ocean; as the opinion, I say, of the Caspian's being joined either immediately, or by means of some other sea, to the ocean, is chiefly founded on this, it will be worth while to consider how the Caspian or any other sea comes to lose so much water as it receives either from rain or rivers flowing into it (F). The water of this sea is salt like that of other seas, notwithstanding

(F) There are two hypotheses among philosophers, one is, that the waters of the sea are conveyed by subterraneous conduits to the springs of rivers, and that in draining through the fissures they lose their saltness: the other is, that it happens by the vapours that are drawn up from its surface. The former is now rejected by most, it being next to impossible to explain how the water of the ocean, being more depressed than the very mouths of the rivers, can come up to their springs, which are mostly on high mountains. But in the latter hypothesis we have no occasion to explain this, nor to prevent the increase of the seas, by supplying the springs with their waters.

The quantity of vapours drawn up from the sea was tried by Dr. Hall's, who made the following computation (13). By an experiment made with great care he found that water, salted to the same degree as common sea-water, and heated to the same degree of the air in our hottest summers, exhales the thickness of a sixtieth part of an inch in two hours. Whence it appears, that a bulk of water a tenth part of an inch high, will be exhaled into vapours in twelve hours. So that if the superficies of the whole ocean, or part of it, be known, it may also be known how much water arises from it in vapours every day, supposing the water to be equally hot with the air in summer. According to what has been laid down, a superficies of ten square inches emits daily a cubic inch of water; one square foot, half a pint; a square, whose sides are four feet, one gallon; a square mile 6914 tuns; and one degree square (consisting, as we may suppose, of 69 English miles) 33 millions of tuns. The same author supposes the Mediterranean to be about forty degrees long, and four broad, allowances being made for the places where it is broader by those where it is narrower, so that its whole superficies may be accounted 160 square degrees; and consequently the whole Mediterranean must lose in vapours, according to the foretold proportion, in a summer's day, at least 5280 millions of tuns. What quantity of water is dried off the surface by the winds cannot possibly be reduced to any rule; but we may venture to say, that it sometimes exceeds even what is evaporated by the heat of the sun.

Now to compare this quantity of water with that which is carried daily into the sea, the above mentioned writer observes, that the Mediterranean, for instance, receives these nine considerable rivers, the Iberus, the Rhone, the Tiber, the Po, the Danube, the Neisser, the Borysthenes, the Tanais, and the Nile, all the rest being of no great note. Each of these rivers he supposes to be ten times greater than the Tbames, not that any of them is near so great, but to comprehend with them all the small rivulets that fall into the same sea.

He likewise supposes the river Tbames at Kingston-bridge, where the tide seldom reaches, to be in breadth about a hundred yards, and in depth three; and the water to run two miles an hour. If therefore the breadth of the water a hundred yards, be multiplied by three, the depth, and the product three hundred square yards by forty eight miles, or 84480 yards, which the water runs every day, the product will be 25344000 cubic yards of water, or 20300000 tuns, that are carried every day into the sea.

Now, if each of the aforesaid rivers yield ten times as much water as the Tbames, it will follow, that each of them carries every day into the sea 303 millions of tuns, and the whole nine 1827 millions of tuns in a day.

However this is but little more than one third of what is proved to be raised in vapours out of the Mediterranean in twelve hours time. Hence it appears that the Mediterranean, the Caspian, or any other sea, is so far from increasing or overflowing by the rivers it receives, that in a short time it would rather be evaporated and drained, unless the vapours that it exhales returned upon it in dew or rain.

Scaliger and others were of opinion that the Caspian is joined by some subterraneous intercourse with the opinion of the ancients to the contrary; and its freshness in some parts near the shore, only owing to the rivers that discharge themselves into it. It is neither of a different colour from other seas, nor without various sorts of fish, as Olearius, an eye-witness, assures us, and thereby disproves the opinion of the ancients, who believed it to be of a blackish colour, and to have but one kind of fish, and that of a monstrous form. We shall conclude this section with observing, that the ignorance of the ancients, with relation to this sea, or lake, as some are pleased to call it, may be urged as an argument of the imperfect knowledge they had of these northern parts of the Persian empire, and at the same time warn us not to depend on their accounts, unless vouched by the testimonies of modern travellers, who have with far greater care and better success surveyed those remote regions. b

S E C T. II.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, arts, learning, and trade of the MEDES.

Their origin.

WE have already derived the Medes ^a from Madai, the third son of Japhet, and thereby put them upon the level with the most ancient nations (G). In process of time several colonies from the adjacent countries settled among them, being invited thither by the fruitfulness of the soil, which gave rise to the various tribes into which that people was anciently divided. The Greek writers will have them to be originally Persians ^b; and Herodotus tells us that they were called Arians till the time of Medus, the son of Medea, from whom they took the name of Medians. But our etymology is far more natural, and confirmed by the authority of all the ancient interpreters, who by Madai in scripture constantly understand the Medes ^c.

Government.

THEIR government was originally monarchical, like that of the other primitive nations, and they seem to have had kings of their own in the earliest times. Some ^d are of opinion, that one of the four kings who in the days of Abraham invaded the southern coasts of Canaan, reigned in Media. Lactantius mentions one Hydaspes, who, according to him, reigned long before the Medes were conquered by the Assyrians. And Diodorus tells us, that Pharnus, king of the Medes, was with his seven sons defeated and taken prisoner by Ninus in the very beginning of the Assyrian empire ^e. But his accounts of those early times are no ways to be relied on, it being plain both from scripture, and from the authority of the most judicious with the Euxine, but he alledges no reason to prove his opinion; however this may be urged for it, that the Euxine sea, as Mr. Dugdale observes (14), is continually disgoring a large quantity of water thro' the Bosphorus, and some think that it is more than the rivers pour into it; wherefore it may, for aught we know, be supplied from the Caspian.

(G) Some will have Madai to have been the progenitor of the Macedonians, and not of the Medes, grounding their opinion upon the two following reasons: 1. That the Madai, or Medes, are not mentioned in scripture till the latter ages. 2. That this situation removes Medai too far from the rest of his brethren, and takes him out of his general lot, which was the isles of the Gentiles, to put him into that of Shem. But to the first it may be answered, that the Jews always retained the name, and it is plain they made use of it as soon as they had occasion: To the second, that according to our hypothesis the plantations of the sons of Japhet were contiguous; for the western Media was bounded on the north by the river Ros or Aras; to which, as we have elsewhere observed (15), the dominion of Magog extended. However, it cannot be denied but some of Madai's descendants may have carried their progenitors name thither, if we will not suppose him or his immediate successors to have peopled it, since we find several of the prophets (16) calling that country by his name. A modern writer (17) produces several authorities to shew, that there were a people in Macedonia called Midi, or Mædi, and a tract called the Medic regions in the borders of Peronia; but this can only prove the Macedonians to be a later colony of Madai. To say that the Macedonians are the off-spring of Madai, because the word Macedonia is compounded of Madai and Celtim, is relying too much, as every one must allow, on the authority of a forced etymology; and we may as well adopt the etymology of those who derive the Tartars from an ancient tribe among the Medes called Tapuri, which they change into Taturi, and that into Tartari (18).

among the ancient and modern chronologers, that the Assyrian empire did not begin till the days of Pul, as has been fully shewn in some preceding chapters †. Whereas Ctesias and his copist Diodorus have made this empire as old as the flood, and given us the names of all the Assyrian kings from Belus and his feigned son Ninus to Sardanapalus. According to the successions of Assyrian kings, as stated by them, that empire continued about 1360 years; whereas Herodotus tells us that it lasted only five hundred years, and even his numbers are all too long. They were first brought under the Assyrian yoke by Pul, according to us the founder of that monarchy, or by his immediate successor Tiglatb-pileser. Till that time they were probably governed by their own kings, as were, according to holy writ, the neighbouring nations (H). In the reign of Sennacherib they shook off the Assyrian yoke, and fell into an anarchy, which lasted till the reign of Dejoces, as we shall see in the following section. Their kings, after the revolt, were quite absolute, and controuled by no law; nay, they claimed an equal respect with the gods themselves; the custom of adoring kings, which afterwards prevailed in Persia, having first taken rise among the *Medes*¹.

THE Medes were once a very warlike race, as will appear from their history; but Manners and customs in process of time became one of the most effeminate nations of Asia, especially after they were reduced by Cyrus. In war they used the same armour as the Persians, whom they are said to have taught the art of war, especially to handle with dexterity the bow; and likewise to have been the first that introduced luxury into Persia, which at last occasioned the downfall of that empire, as it had before been the ruin of the *Medes*². Polygamy was so far from being disreputable among them, that they were bound by law to maintain at least seven wives, and those women were looked upon with contempt who maintained fewer than five husbands. These are the words of *Strabo*³, which, considering the equality, as to number, of both sexes, can only be meant of the richer sort, viz. that such among the men should be obliged to have that number of wives; and that rich women were esteemed according to the number of husbands they maintained. In war they poisoned their arrows with a bituminous liquor called Naphia, whereof there was great plenty in Media, Persia, and Assyria. The arrow being steeped in it, and shot from a slack bow (for a swift and violent motion took off from its virtue) burnt the flesh with such violence, that water rather increased than extinguished the malignant flame; dust alone could put a stop to it, and in some degree allay the unspeakable pain it occasioned. They are likewise said to have bred a number of large dogs, to whom they used to throw the bodies of their friends, parents, and relations, when at the point of death, looking upon it as dishonourable to die in their beds, or be laid in the ground⁴.

SOME writers charge the Medes with being the first authors of making eunuchs⁵; but others impute this execrable practice to the Persians, and even name the place where it first took rise⁶ (I). The custom of confirming alliances with the blood of the

(H) In the time of the judges of Israel, Mesopotamia was under its own king (19); the king of Zobab reigned on both sides of the Euphrates till he was conquered by David (20). The kingdoms of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Philistia, Zidon, Damascus, and Hamath the Great, were governed by their own princes; and so were those of Haran or Carrbæ, and Seppharvaim in Mesopotamia, and Calneh near Bagdad. As these petty kingdoms were ruled by their own princes, so was Media till the time of Pul, who subdued most of the above-mentioned nations. Media may have been subdued by Nimrod, who was a great warrior; but his empire, if he founded any, was of short continuance, it being the custom in those early times for every father to divide his territories amongst his sons.

(I) Stephanus tells us, that this custom was first introduced in a city of Persia called Spada, whence he derives the Latin word Spado, signifying an eunuch. But both he, and those who charge the Medes with introducing such an unnatural practice, are certainly mistaken, since we find eunuchs in vogue among the Assyrians and Babylonians long before such a piece of wanton luxury can be supposed to have been known either to the Medes or Persians. Josephus (21) acquaints us, that Nabuchadnezer commanded the most comely youths among the captive Jews to be made eunuchs. And Hierom is of opinion, that the prophet Daniel and his three companions were eunuchs (22). Ammianus Marcellinus will have Semiramis to be the first contriver of eunuchism (23). What prompted them thus to maim and deform nature, Petronius Arbiter will tell us:

Subripuere viros; excelsaque viscera ferro
In venerem fregere: atque ut fuga mobilis ævi, Circumscripserunt mora, properantes differat annos* (24).

And Claudian,

*Seu Persica ferro
Luxuries vetuit nasci lanuginis umbram* (25).

the contracting parties, which obtained among all the eastern nations, even in the Roman times, was originally peculiar to the Medes. When they were to strike alliances they used to tie together with a hard bandage the thumbs of their right hands, till the blood starting to the extremities was by a slight cut discharged. This they mutually sucked, and a league thus confirmed was esteemed most awful, as mysteriously solemnized with the blood of the parties.

Laws, religion, on, &c.

THE laws and religion of the Medes were much the same with those of the Persians; wherefore, we shall defer what may be said of them till we come to the history of the Persians, from the oriental writers. We shall only observe here, that when a law was once enacted, it was not in the king's power to repeal it or to reverse a decree he had once made; whence the laws of the Medes are in holy writ called unchangeable†. A modern writer tells us that those only were admitted to the crown, who were remarkable above others for their strength or stature‡. But that there was no such law is plain from the regular succession of father and son, without regard to any personal quality whatsoever. Some law of this nature may perhaps have obtained among them before they were conquered by the Assyrians; but we are quite in the dark as to the state of Media in those early times.

THEY paid their kings the greatest respect imaginable, putting them upon the level even with their gods. They thought it a high offence either to spit or laugh in their presence*. They honoured their sovereign with the haughty title of great king, or king of kings, which stile was afterwards adopted by the Persian monarchs c and their proud successors the Parthians, whose king, even in the time of the emperor Constantius, retained that title, writing himself in a letter to that prince, Sapor king of kings, allied to the stars, brother to the sun and moon, &c.†. When they appeared in publick, which seldom happened, they were always attended by musick, and numerous guards consisting of the prime nobility, their wives, children, and concubines being part of their retinue, even when they headed their armies in the field.

As to their arts, learning, and trade, we are quite in the dark; their country abounded with many excellent productions, as well for the use of the inhabitants themselves, as for foreign exportation; but whether they ever applied themselves to d trade, is what we find no where recorded: the contrary seems rather to appear, from the character which the prophet* gives them of despising gold and silver, and delighting in the bloody trade of war; neither do we find any mention made by the ancients of their arts or sciences. During the short time of their monarchy they seem to have applied their thoughts only to warlike exercises, namely to the arts of managing a horse and handling the bow, in which they surpassed all other nations, the Median horse being no less celebrated by the ancients, than were in after ages the Persian foot‡. Thus much we have thought necessary to say apart of the Medes and their country: what else may be added thereto, we defer to the sections of the following chapter, which will be no more than a continuation of this.

Eunuchs have always been in great repute among the eastern princes, and were anciently employed in the most momentous affairs; all the places of greatest trust being filled by such men. But we have formerly shewn that the term Eunuch doth not always signify a castrated person, but often an officer at court, and near to the king's person; such as was Putiphar to the king of Egypt†. To them the Persian kings committed not only the guard of their own persons (26), but likewise the education of their children, it being a custom among them to put the heir apparent of the crown, as soon as he was born, into the hands of eunuchs, under whose tuition he remained till he attained the seventh year his of age (27).

S E C T. III.

The Chronology of the Medes to the translation of their empire to the PERSIANS.

WE have formerly shewn how Ctesias and his followers have darkened the chronology of the Assyrians, Babylonians and Medes with such enormous anachronisms, that 'tis no easy matter to ascertain the rise or fall of those potent monarchies †. To proceed with all the clearness and perspicuity so perplexed a subject will allow, we shall distinguish in the chronology of the Medes three remarkable occurrences, which will give birth to as many different æras, namely the recovery of their liberty after they had been subdued by the Assyrians, the rise of their kingdom after some years of anarchy, and the beginning of their empire, which, it is agreed on all hands, rose on the ruins of the Assyrian monarchy. The first king of the Assyrians, who brought the Medes under subjection, was either Pul, according to us the founder of the Assyrian empire, or his immediate successor Tiglatb-pileser. For this prince having at the request of Abaz king of Judah, made war upon Rezin king of Damascus, and reduced that capital, transplanted its inhabitants to Kir in Media *. Whence it is plain, that the Medes were then subject to the Assyrians; and consequently, that they must have been subdued either in the reign of Pul, or soon after the accession of Tiglatb-pileser to the crown, for the empire of the Assyrians was already grown great, and the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul king of Assyria, and the spirit of Tiglatb-pileser king of Assyria † to make war. Pul makes his first appearance in scripture during the reign of Menahem king of Israel, in the year of the flood 2228, before Christ 771. Tiglatb-pileser, who is supposed to have been his son, succeeded him in the year of the flood 2259, before Christ 740. That there was no Assyrian empire before the days of Pul, is plain both from the scripture (K), and from the particular histories of each kingdom, so that the Medes could not be subdued by them before the time we have mentioned. From the time of Pul or Tiglatb-pileser they continued in subjection to the Assyrians till the reign of Sennacherib, which began about the year of the flood 2286, before Christ 713, while Hezekiah was king of Judah (L). They took advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or † Vol. I. p. 388, & seq. * 2 Kings xv. 27. and xvi. 5, 9. † 1 Chron. v. 26.

(K) None of the prophets who preceded Pul, and foretold the calamities which the people of Israel afterwards suffered from the Assyrians, ever name that nation, but only speak of a people that is to be raised up against Israel. Thus Jonah, who prophesied about sixty years before the reign of Pul, mentions indeed the king of Nineveh, but no where that of Assyria. The city of Nineveh had some time before shaken off the Egyptian yoke, and was governed by a king of its own; but his territories were of (28) no great extent, as is plain from the said prophecies; neither was he called king of Assyria, but only of Nineveh. Amos prophesied about ten or twenty years before Pul began his conquests, and foretold, that God would raise up a nation that should humble the house of Israel, at that time elated with their success against Damascus and Hamath; but what nation he names not. In the prophecies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Nabum, Zephaniah, and Zachariah, which were written after the Assyrian monarchy was grown powerful, it is openly named on all occasions. Therefore as Jonah and Amos, who prophesied before the reign of Pul, never mention the Assyrians, and those who flourished after his reign, frequently do; it is pretty plain, that in the days of the former the Assyrians made no great figure in the world, but were to be raised up against Israel; and by consequence rose in the days of Pul, who is the first upon record that fulfilled the prophecy of Amos, threatening Syria and Israel with captivity. Besides, we know from scripture, that till Pul made his appearance on this side the Euphrates, not only Syria and Egypt, but many other neighbouring nations were governed by their own kings. Sisac and Memnon were great conquerors, and subdued Chaldaea, Assyria, Media, Persia, Bactria, &c. but in their histories no mention is made of any opposition made to them by an Assyrian empire then standing. Homer mentions Bacchus and Memnon kings of Egypt and Persia, but knew nothing of an Assyrian empire (29). Whence it is manifest, that the Assyrian empire, which Ctesias makes as ancient as the flood, did not begin till the reign of Pul, who reduced all the above-mentioned nations.

(L) That in the time of Shalmaneser they were subject to the Assyrians, is plain from scripture, where that prince is said to have transplanted the inhabitants of Samaria to Halab and Habor, and the other cities of the Medes (30). In this captivity Tobit was carried from his native country, the city of Thisbe, in the tribe of Neptali, with Anna his wife, and Tobias his son, into Assyria; but the rest of his brethren were carried into Media, and planted there, particularly Gabriel in Rages, and Raguel in Ecbatan (31), which proves Media to have been in the time of Shalmaneser subject to the king of Assyria.

of the sudden slaughter of his army near Egypt, and shaking off the yoke; defended their liberty by dint of arms against the power of the Assyrians, which was now in its decline. These are the troubles which prevented Tobit from going into Media, according to his custom^c; and they must have happened about the latter end of Sennacherib's reign, that is, about the year of the flood 2289, before Christ 719. The Medes having thus rescued their country from the Assyrian bondage, fell into a kind of anarchy, as Herodotus informs us^d, which gave Esar-baddon or Assar-baddon who succeeded Sennacherib, and was both a valourous and fortunate prince, an opportunity of bringing great part of Media, if not the whole country, anew, under subjection. How long the anarchy may have lasted, is hard to determine. Some include the years of the anarchy in the fifty-three which Dejoces their first king, is said to have reigned. It cannot have lasted above twenty or thirty years; for Pbraortes, who succeeded Dejoces, and reigned, according to Herodotus^e, twenty-two years, was slain by Chynilidan, or Nabuchodonosor, in the twelfth year of his reign. Nabuchodonosor came to the crown in the year of the flood 2851, before Christ 684; so that Pbraortes was killed eighty-six years after the Medes had revolted from the Assyrians; from which number, if we subtract the fifty-three of Dejoces, and twenty-two of Pbraortes, eleven years will remain for the anarchy. But the reign of Dejoces, who, as we read in Herodotus^f, had some time exercised the office of judge before he was chosen king, is evidently too long, and we may safely abridge it of fifteen or twenty years, adding them to the anarchy. From the beginning of the reign of Dejoces to the destruction of Nineveh, which happened in the second year of the reign of Jeboiakim (M), that is in the year of the flood 2390, before Christ 600, Media may be properly stiled a kingdom. From the destruction of Nineveh, we may date the rise of the empire of the Medes; for the conquerors, that is, Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, having shared the Assyrian empire, they both became very powerful, and reduced most of the neighbouring nations, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. Their empire lasted till the taking of Babylon; for Xenophon^g tells us, that after the reduction of that city, Cyrus went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and succeeded him in the kingdom, which is entirely agreeable to Scripture. Babylon was taken seventy-three years after the destruction of Nineveh, to which we may add the two years that Darius the Mede reigned over that city; so that the empire of the Medes lasted seventy-five years, at the period of which the Persian empire took rise in Cyrus. That Darius the Mede reigned over Babylon, is unquestionable; for he is said in Scripture^h, to have introduced there the immutable laws of the Medes and Persians. In his reign the Medes are ever placed before the *Persians*ⁱ, as the Persians in the reign of Cyrus and his successors are always set before the Medes^k.

BEFORE we proceed to the history of the Medes, we shall exhibit the series of their kings according to several authors.

(M) In the reign of Josiah, when Zephaniah prophesied, Nineveh and the kingdom of Assyria were standing, for that prophet foretells their fall (32). Not long after Pharaoh Necho led his army to the Euphrates against the king of Assyria, and on his march slew Josiah (33); whence it is manifest, that the last king of Assyria was still alive. But in the third and fourth year of Jeboiakim, the successor of Josiah, we find Assuerus king of the Medes, and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, leading their armies against the king of Egypt, and taking from him what he had newly taken from the Assyrians. Whence we may conclude, that Nineveh was already reduced, and the conquest of Assyria completed. We cannot therefore err above a year or two, if we place the destruction of Nineveh, and fall of the Assyrian empire, in the second year of Jeboiakim.

THIS table contains what may be called two original catalogues, those of Herodotus and Diodorus, as he has borrowed it from Ctesias. The other two are compounded of both, with an equal deference to each, as far as they go. By what we have laid down above, and confirmed with the authority of holy writ, it appears that Herodotus is not greatly mistaken in his numbers. Ctesias enumerates ten kings of Media, whose names are different from those mentioned by Herodotus, except the last, whom he calls Astyages, and Diodorus names Apandas. The reigns of the eight first amount to 282 years, and those of the two last are omitted; but if they be supplied from Herodotus, they will come very near Justin's account, who supposes the kings of Media to have reigned 350 years. Eusebius and Syncellus differ as widely from Ctesias as from each other, except in the name and reign of the first king Arbaces, and besides omit two of his ten. They pay a greater deference to Herodotus, whom they copy more exactly, at least with regard to his names, tho' they vary sometimes very materially from him in the lengths of the reigns. As for the variations between them, it would be a fruitless task to enquire into them; especially as it must appear from what we have said already, that they are both grossly mistaken (N).

(N) Dionysius Halicarnassensis and Appian have followed Herodotus with regard to the duration of the empires of the Affyrians and Medes. The former acquaints us (34), that the empire of the Medes was ruined in the fourth generation; and the latter (35), that the three great empires of the Affyrians, Medes and Persians, to the time of Alexander, did not last 900 years. The Persian empire continued 230 years, from the first year of the fifty-fifth olympiad to the second of the hundred and twelfth. To this number if we add 670 years, which the empires of the Affyrians and Medes lasted according to Herodotus, the sum will be but 900 years. These are the sentiments of the most judicious among the profane historians concerning the duration of the empires of the Affyrians and Medes. But on the other side Cephalon, Alexander Polyhistor, Diodorus Siculus, Cassius, Trogus Pompeius, and his abbreviator Justin, with Velleius Paterculus, have followed Ctesias in his catalogue of the Affyrian kings. Among christian chronologers, Africanus, Eusebius and Syncellus have inserted in their catalogues the kings of the Affyrians and Medes mentioned by Ctesias; though in order to adjust their chronologies they have sometimes abridged, and sometimes increased their number.

If the empire of the Medes continued 352 years, as it must have done according to Ctesias, if we supply the reigns of the two last kings in his catalogue from Eusebius or Syncellus, it must be supposed, that after the empire of the Affyrians was destroyed by Arbaces; there were no Affyrian kings either at Nineveh or Babylon, and that the Medes were sole masters of Asia. But this supposition is evidently repugnant both to sacred and profane history. If we consult the scripture, we shall find; that the Affyrian empire was never more potent than after this pretended destruction of Nineveh. The prophet Jonah, who flourished in the reigns of Azariah king of Judah, and Jeroboam king of Israel, was sent to preach repentance to Nineveh about eighty years after the supposed reign of Arbaces, and Nineveh was then a great city, three days journey long; it had a king of its own, and was so populous as to contain above 120,000 children not yet come to the use of reason (36). Could a city, which had been reduced to a heap of rubbish but eighty years before, grow to such a pitch of grandeur in so short a time? For according to the prophet's account it was then in the meridian of its splendor. Those who follow Ctesias, have been forced

WE shall begin with what we may call the fabulous history of the Medes, being extracted from Ctesias, his transcriber Diodorus and their followers. According to these the Medes were governed by kings of their own, before the early days of Ninus, the pretended founder of the Assyrian monarchy. For when Ninus invaded this country, it was ruled by one Pharnus, who being worsted by that mighty warrior, was taken prisoner, and crucified with his wife and seven children¹. Thus Media was reduced to a province of the Assyrian empire, and remained subject to the successors of Ninus till the time of Sardanapalus. However they made some attempts towards the recovery of their liberty during the regency of Semiramis and minority of her son Ninyas; for she is said to have invaded Media with a mighty army, and encamping near a mountain called Bagisban, to have made a pleasant garden twelve furlongs in compass. The mountain was dedicated to Jupiter, and had on one side craggy rocks seventeen furlongs high, which she ascended on the packs and loads carried by the beasts of burthen that followed her army. In the lower part of this rock she caused her statue to be hewn out, and a hundred of her guards attending her. From hence she marched to Choon a city of Media, where on the top of a very lofty rock she formed another pleasant garden with stately edifices, whence she might behold the beauties of the spot, and her whole army encamped in the plain. From Choon she advanced towards Ecbatan, and on her march levelled mount Zarceum, which was many furlongs in extent, filled up valleys, and in spite of nature opened a plain and easy way to Ecbatan, which to our author's time was called Semiramis's road^m. These extraordinary works, as they were lasting monuments of her conquests not only over the rebellious Medes, but nature itself, kept that nation in a servile subjection and dependency to the reign of Sardanapalus, that is, for the space of near 1400 years (O), when Arbaces governor of Media, and Belesis governor of Babylon put an end to the Assyrian empire in the manner we have related, and we hope more fully confuted in the history of *Assyria*ⁿ.

Arbaces.

Arbaces the first king of the Medes after their revolt is represented as a prince of great generosity and gratitude, as appears from his behaviour towards the mean spirited Babylonian Belesis, who by a pious fraud bereaved him of the immense treasures that were concealed in the ashes and ruins of the Assyrian palace, as we have elsewhere related at length^o. He is said to have subdued all Asia, and to have reigned twenty eight years.

ced to own, that Nineveh was twice taken and destroyed, viz. in the time of king Josaphat by Arbaces, and three hundred years after in the reign of Josiah. But the scripture, Josephus and all profane writers, allow only one desolation of that great city. The latter differ only in the time when it happened. Herodotus places it at the end of the reign of Cyaxares, and Polybistor does not much differ from him. Ctesias and his followers refer it to the reign of Arbaces three hundred years earlier. That the latter are mistaken is manifest from holy writ, as we have already shewn. We may add, that this powerful empire, which Arbaces founded, must soon have decayed, which is inconsistent with the system of Ctesias and the authors that follow him. The Assyrian empire must have raised itself again, Nineveh must have been rebuilt, and have pass'd from an heap of rubbish to an extraordinary pitch of grandeur, and all this in the space of 70 or 80 years. For after this pretended destruction of Nineveh and the Assyrian empire we find in scripture a series of Assyrian kings and a potent empire not subject to the Medes. Besides, if we compare the destruction of Nineveh described by Ctesias with that we read in scripture and Polybistor, they will plainly appear to be the same. Ctesias says, that Sardanapalus burnt himself, his concubines and treasures; Polybistor writes the same of Sarac. Ctesias tells us, that the Medes in conjunction with the Babylonians destroyed Nineveh; and the same is confirmed by Polybistor and the sacred penmen. Ctesias writes that the city was laid in ashes, and the citizens dispersed; and this is what we read in the prophets. Such a conformity of facts, joined to the former evidences, amount to a full conviction, that there was but one destruction of the Assyrian empire, and one desolation of Nineveh.

(O) These stories are of a piece with what the same author relates elsewhere, viz. that the army of Ninus consisted of two millions of men, at a time when the earth was not yet well peopled; that Semiramis employed two millions of workmen in the building of Babylon; that she disposed in the shape of elephants the hides of three hundred thousand black oxen, and other fables of the like nature forged by Ctesias, and gravely related by Diodorus.

a HE was succeeded by his son Mandaucæ, who reigned fifty years, but did nothing worthy of notice in the warlike way, being himself, as he is represented, a prince of a peaceable disposition, and his subjects desirous of some respite after the violent struggles for liberty and empire in the last reign. Mandaucæ.

Sofarmus appears next, by some called Medidus; he reigned thirty years, and this Sofarmus is all we find of him upon record.

Artias, by some called Arbycæ, by others Cardicæ, reigned next. From his name some, who indulge etymologies, argue him to have been a great and glorious prince, the word Arti or Arta in the composition of his name denoting greatness, as it does, according to the interpretation of Herodotus, in that of the Persian Artaxerxes. All we can say is, that if he performed great exploits, they have been long since buried in oblivion. There is a great disagreement among authors concerning the length of his reign, some allowing him fifty years, others thirty, and some only thirteen.

AFTER him came Arbians, in whose reign a war broke out between the Medes and Cadusians, who at the instigation of one Parfodes rising up in arms shook off the yoke which they had for some time groaned under. Parfodes was by birth a Persian, but the chief favourite and prime minister of Arbians king of the Medes, whom he served with great fidelity till being highly provoked at a sentence pronounced against him by that prince, he fled with three thousand foot, and a thousand horse to the Cadusians, where he not only withdrew his obedience to Arbians, but stirred up the whole nation to a revolt. The Cadusians being thus encouraged to stand up for their liberties, committed the whole management of the war to Parfodes, as the most proper person on all accounts to appear at the head of their army. But before he took the field Arbians died, after a reign of twenty years. If this Parfodes be the Parfondas mentioned by Nicolas of Damascus, we have already mentioned the reasons which induced him to revolt.^a Arbians.

Artæus came to the crown while the Cadusians were making vast preparations to invade his kingdom, and understanding that Parfodes was advancing towards the frontiers at the head of 200,000 men, he thought it high time to curb the insolence of that rebel. And accordingly having raised an army of 800,000 men, he marched out with his mighty host, and engaged the rebels; but was most shamefully routed and forced to save himself by flight, leaving 50,000 of his men dead in the field of battle. Upon this Victory the Cadusians proclaimed Parfodes their king, who accepting the crown, inspired his new subjects with that irreconcilable hatred which he had conceived against the Medes, and laid the foundations of a perpetual enmity between the two nations. He is said to have solemnly conjured the Cadusians even on his death-bed to wage an eternal war with the Medes, and never lay down their arms till that odious nation was utterly abolished, loading at the same time with curses and imprecations such of his successors as ever should upon any terms whatsoever be reconciled with them. In pursuance of this, as we may call it, his last will, the Cadusians watched all opportunities of harassing the Medes with inroads, and doing them what mischief they could, till the empire was transferred, from them to the Persians.^b Artæus.

AFTER Artæus reigned Artynes twenty two years, but did nothing worth mentioning. He was succeeded by Artibarnas or Artabanus, in whose reign the Partians revolting put themselves under the protection of the Sacæ, a people inhabiting mount Hæmodus which separates India from Scythia. This occasioned a war of many years between the Medes and the Sacæ, who were then governed by the famed Zanara, a heroine of great prowess. That princess is no less celebrated by our author for her courage and conduct in war, than for her beauty. She had, according to him, rescued her country from the tyranny of the neighbouring princes, civilized her subjects, and inured them to the military discipline and the toils of war. After she had for many years harassed the Medes, a peace was at last concluded between her and Artynes on the following equitable conditions; that the Partians should submit to the Medes, and the Sacæ and Medes quietly enjoy what they possessed at the beginning of the war.^c (P). Artynes.

HITHERTO we have dwelt on what we may safely call the fabulous history of the Medes; these kings, or most of them, being no where found but in the books, or rather in the imagination of Ctesias, which was very fertile in the production of monsters. We now come to the genuine history of Media, as it has been transmitted to us by authors of a quite different character.

The genuine history of the Medes.

THE Medes having thrown off the Assyrian yoke in the reign of Sennacherib, lived some time without a king; but were again brought under subjection by one of their own country, whose name was Dejoces. He is represented as a subtle, crafty man, and aiming at absolute power, and is said to have compassed his design in the following manner. The Medes were at that time divided into several districts, in one of which lived Dejoces, who seeing all kind of licentiousness prevail over the whole country, applied himself to the administration of justice with great zeal and diligence. The Medes of the same district, observing the equity of his conduct, chose him for their judge; and he, aspiring to the sovereign power, performed that office with all possible regard to justice. By this means he not only acquired a great reputation in his own district, but among those also of the other divisions, who looked upon him as the only impartial judge in the whole nation. Whence such as thought themselves injured by unjust sentences resorted from all parts to him, in order to obtain justice; till at last no one would commit the decision of a difference to any other person. At length the numbers of those, who applied to him for redress increasing in proportion to the great fame of his equity, and the whole care of administering justice being devolved upon him, he unexpectedly absented himself from the place where he used to determine differences, declaring he would no longer perform that office, and submitting it to the judgment of his countrymen, whether it was reasonable that he should neglect his private affairs to attend those of the publick. Hereupon rapine and all manner of wickedness prevailing again to such a degree that it was not safe to live in the country, the Medes called a general assembly of the whole nation to deliberate on the means of reforming the abuses that were daily becoming more frequent. Upon this occasion those who were in the interest of Dejoces observed, that if a stop was not put to the growth of the disorders that had already overspread the whole land, they should soon be obliged to abandon their country to a foreign enemy. They advised therefore their countrymen to appoint a king of their own nation as the only expedient that could rescue their country from impending ruin. Their discourse was received with general approbation, and a king was resolved on. Their next deliberation was concerning the person, whom they should prefer to the crown, when Dejoces was named to the sovereignty, and with universal applause placed on the throne.

THUS was Dejoces created king; and no sooner was he vested with supreme power than he threw off the mask, and commenced tyrant; though the rigour he practised may perhaps have been absolutely necessary to bring the nation, after some years of anarchy, into any order or discipline.

THE first thing he did after his promotion was to command his new subjects to build him a palace suitable to his dignity, and to appoint him guards for the safety of his person. He was obeyed, and on the ground, which he chose, a strong and stately fabrick was erected for his ordinary residence. At the same time he was allowed to chuse for his guard out of the whole nation such as he thought most proper for that trust. Thus settled on the throne, he united the several districts, into which the Medes had been divided during the anarchy, and turned his thoughts towards building a strong city, which might be the metropolis of his new kingdom. To this also his subjects submitted, and the famous city of Ecbatan was built pursuant to his orders and directions, a city which in process of time became very famous in those parts (Q).

considerable conquests, and raised the obscure nation of the Sacæ to a great pitch of glory. Whence her subjects in gratitude for the many advantages they enjoyed by her means erected her a monument after her death of vast dimensions, being three furlongs in breadth, and on the top of which was built a pyramid of a furlong in height. Upon this pyramid she was represented by a golden colossus, and adored by her subjects as a goddess (37).

(Q) Ecbatan in scripture (38) is called Acchmetha; by Ctesias and Stephanus, Agbatan. In the book of Judith it is said to have been built by Arphaxad king of the Medes; but whether Arphaxad and Dejoces be but two names of one and the same person,

Dejoces

- a Dejoces thus lodged in a magnificent and well-defended city, enacted the following laws to be observed by all his subjects of what rank soever: That no one should be admitted to his presence, but transact all things by his servants and ministers; that none should be allowed even to see him, that were not immediately of his household, and that for any who attended him, to laugh or spit in his presence should be accounted a great indecency, and contrary to the respect which is due to a sovereign. These laws he enjoined, that the malecontents might have no opportunity of putting in execution any evil design against his person, not doubting but those, who were debarred from seeing him, would be easily induced to think him of a superior nature to themselves. But though he kept himself thus concealed from the eyes of the people, b yet he was informed of every thing that happened in his dominions, maintaining to that end many emissaries in all the provinces of his government, who brought him a minute account of every transaction. By this means no crime escaped either the knowledge of the prince, or the rigour of the law; and the punishment thus treading upon the heels of the offence, kept the wicked in awe, and stemmed the course of violence and injustice.

Dejoces was so intirely taken up in civilizing his unpolished subjects, and making laws, that he never engaged in any enterprize against his neighbours, though his reign was very long, for he is said to have ruled over the whole nation of the Medes fifty three years.*

- c He was succeeded by his son Pbraortes, who being of a warlike temper, and not satisfied with the kingdom of Media, which his father had left him, invaded Persia, and is said to have brought that nation under subjection to the Medes*. But we are inclined to disagree with our author in this particular, and ascribe the conquest of Persia, not to Pbraortes, but to his son and successor Cyaxares (P). However he subdued several of the neighbouring nations, attacking them one after another, till he made himself master of almost all the upper Asia, lying between mount Taurus and the river Habys. Elated with the good success, that attended his army, at length he invaded Affyria, which was now in its decline, and greatly weakened by the revolt of many nations, who following the example of the Medes, had withdrawn their obedience from the Affyrians. Nabuchadonosor or Chyniladan at that time king of Affyria raised a powerful army to oppose the conqueror, summoning the whole force of his wide spreading dominions, and inviting other nations of the east to his assistance. His ambassadors were received every where with contempt, and no one people obeyed the summons. However Nabuchadonosor took the field with what forces he had, and person, is what we shall examine hereafter. Dr. Prideaux (39) tells us, upon what ground we know not, that Ecbatan was only enlarged and beautified by Dejoces. He will perhaps have Arbaces, whom by an unaccountable inadvertency he confounds with Tiglatb-pileser, to be the founder of it. Josephus (40) acquaints us that the decree of Cyrus about rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem was found at Ecbatan, which plainly proves it to be the same with the Schmetha of scripture, where according to Exra (41) the said decree was lodged.

(P) It seems plain from scripture, that the Persians were not subdued by the Medes till after the taking of Nineveh by the joint forces of Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar. In the fourth year of Jeboiakim, which the Jews reckon to be the first of Nebuchadnezzar, (42) God threatened by his prophet * that he would take all the families of the north and Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and bring them against Judea, and against the nations round about, and utterly destroy those nations, and make them an astonishment and lasting desolations, and cause them all to drink the wine-cup of his fury; and in particular, he names the kings of Judah and Egypt, and those of Edom and Moab, and Ammon and Tyre, and all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of the Medes, &c. Where it is to be observed, that in numbering the nations which were to be subdued, he omits the Affyrians, who must consequently have been already conquered, and names the kings of Elam or Persia, as distinct from those of the Medes, whence we may conclude that the Persians were not yet subdued by the Medes. In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, that is in the ninth year of Nebuchadnezzar, the same prophet foretold the approaching conquest of Persia by the Medes and their confederates: Behold, says he, I will break the bow of Elam—upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of heaven—and there shall be no nation where the outcasts of Elam shall not come—I will set my throne in Elam, and will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the Lord; but it shall come to pass in the latter days (that is, in the reign of Cyrus) that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the Lord (43).

From these words of the prophet it is manifest, that in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, nay after the destruction of Nineveh, the Persians had kings of their own, and consequently could not be subdued by Pbraortes, who was killed before Nebuchadnezzar came to the crown of Babylon (44).

joining battle with Pbraortes in the great plain of Ragau, defeated his cavalry, overturned his chariots, and pursuing the king to the adjacent mountains, whither he had made his retreat, took him prisoner and put him to death. After this victory he entered Media, took many strong holds without opposition, and pushing on his conquests, stormed the famous city of Ecbatan, and levelled it with the ground. Flushed beyond measure by this, perhaps more than expected success, he returned to Nineveh, where he feasted and revelled with those who had attended him in this expedition, for the space of 120 days *. Pbraortes reigned twenty-two years, and was slain near the beginning of the reign of Josiab; for this war was made after Phenice, Moab, Ammon and Egypt had been conquered by Affarbadon, and when the Jews were newly returned from captivity, as is plain from the book b of Judith * (Q).

Cyaxares I.
Year of the
A.D. 2375.
Before Christ
624.

UPON the death of Pbraortes his son Cyaxares was placed on the throne. He was a brave and enterprising prince, and indeed such a man was then more than ever, wanting to save the nation from impending slavery, most part of the kingdom being already possessed by the Affyrians. Having settled himself well in his kingdom, and brought his troops under good discipline (R), he soon recovered what the Affyrians had taken after their victory in the plains of Ragau. What he had next at heart was to avenge the death of his father by the destruction of Nineveh. And accordingly having assembled all his forces, he marched out with a design to treat that city as Nabuchodonosor had treated the metropolis of Media. The Affyrians meeting him on the frontiers with the remains only of that great army which had been destroyed before Bethulia, an engagement ensued, wherein the former were defeated and driven into Nineveh. Cyaxares pursuing his victory, laid close siege to the city; but was soon obliged to give over the enterprize and employ his troops in the defence of his own kingdom †.

The Scythians
Invade Asia.

A FORMIDABLE army of Scythians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, were in full march in pursuit of their flying enemies, and ready to enter Media. They were come from the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and commanded by king Madyes the son of Protothyas. This Madyes can be no other than Indathyrfus the Scythian, who invaded Asia, as Strabo informs us ‡, and having laid waste great d part of that country advanced to the confines of Egypt. Cyaxares no sooner heard of their march, but breaking up the siege of Nineveh, he advanced with all his forces against them. The two armies engaged, and the Medes, though encouraged by the example of their king, who on that occasion gave proofs of an extraordinary valour, were utterly routed. The conquerors having no other enemy to contend with, over-ran not only all Media, but the greater part of upper Asia (S). From thence

(Q) As Arpaxad is said in the first chapter of Judith (45) to have been killed by Nabuchodonosor, and in the very second verse to have built Ecbatan, most writers will have Dijoces, the founder of Ecbatan, and not Pbraortes, to have carried on this unsuccessful war, and lost his life in the mountains of Ragau (46). The passage in Judith, that Arpaxad built a very strong city, and called it Ecbatan, has led them astray, and made them conclude, that Arpaxad must be Dijoces, who was certainly the founder of that city. But the Greek text of Judith, which the vulgate translates edificavit, built, says only, that Arpaxad added new buildings to Ecbatan, ΕΠΕΠΛΗΡΩΣΕΝ ΕΝΙ ΕΚΒΑΤΟΝ. And what can be more natural, than that the son should finish so great a work, which the father had begun, but had not been able to perfect?

(R) He was the first, according to Herodotus (47), that marshalled the people of Asia into distinct bodies of lances, cavalry, and archers; whereas before his time, horse and foot, and pikemen and archers engaged promiscuously. But this we can hardly believe, when we consider that the nations of this part of Asia were engaged in continual wars, and consequently must have been more experienced in the military art.

(S) Eusebius tells us, that Cyaxares took the city of Nineveh before the Scythians invaded Media. But as Herodotus and all the profane historians, without exception, unanimously agree in this point, that the Scythians broke into Media while he was besieging Nineveh, and obliged him to withdraw his troops from thence to the defence of his own kingdom, we have chose to follow them rather than Eusebius, whose authors we are unacquainted with. Touching the expedition of the Scythians, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out by the Scythians invaded and laid waste part of Asia; and that the Scythians not satisfied with driving them from their habitations, followed them, we know not why, into far distant countries, and in this pursuit fell, as it were by chance, upon Media, while the Cimmerians were gone another way into Lydia. As the Cimmerians, Scythians and Samaritans were all of the same race and nation, as will be clearly seen in the history of those people †, we are inclined to think that this pretended expulsion of the Cimmerians was nothing else but the sending of a colony into Asia with an army of Scythians to assist them in acquiring new settlements and establishing plantations in a foreign country. For though the Cimmerians, Scythians and Samaritans were but one people, a thence they extended their conquests into Syria as far as the confines of Egypt. But there Psammiticus king of that country meeting them in person, prevailed upon those barbarians, what by entreaties what by presents, to proceed no farther, and thereby saved his country from the heavy oppression which his neighbours groaned under^a. In this expedition the Scythians possessed themselves of the city Bethsheam in the territories of the tribe of Manasseh on this side the Jordan, and held it as long as they continued in Asia; whence it was called Scythopolis or the city of the Scythians^b. On their return from Egypt as they passed through the land of the Philistines, some of the stragglers plundered the temple of Venus at Ascalon; which was believed the most ancient in the world dedicated to that goddess. To avenge this attempt the goddess is said to have inflicted on those that were concerned in the sacrilege and their posterity the hemorrhoids; which shews that the Philistines still preserved the memory of what they had formerly suffered on account of the ark^c. For from that time they looked, it seems, on this distemper as a punishment from heaven attending such sacrilegious attempts, and therefore in charging the Scythians with this crime took care not to omit in their histories the punishment which their ancestors had suffered for one of the same nature^d.

It is said the Scythians were for the space of twenty-eight years masters of the upper Asia, namely the two Armenias, Cappadocia, Pontus, Colchis, Iberia, and great part of Lydia. Cyaxares finding it impracticable to get rid of his troublesome guests by open force; resolved to try what might be effected by stratagem. And accordingly invited the greatest part of them to a general feast which was given in every family. Each landlord made his guests drunk, and in that condition were the Scythians massacred, and the kingdom delivered from a long and cruel bondage (T). The people, yet they were distinguished in name according to their different tribes, professions, and perhaps dialects. Such another expedition the same people undertook some ages after, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they came from the countries bordering on the lake Maeotis; they were then likewise assisted, as Plutarch informs us (48), by their neighbours the Scythians, and had in their army above 300,000 men, besides a great multitude of women and children. They wandered over many countries, bearing all down before them, and finally designing to settle in Italy, divided into several bodies to facilitate their passage thither; but were all cut off in three battles by the Roman consuls. Mere necessity obliged these poor nations to infect their neighbours and expose themselves to such dangers. For their country abounding more in men than in sustenance, and shut up in the north by intolerable cold; they were compelled to discharge their overgrown numbers on the southern countries, and drive others, right or wrong, from their possessions, as being entitled to what others had, because they had nothing themselves. As they were a warlike race and inured to hardships, they generally prevailed, their next neighbours giving them a free passage that they might the sooner get rid of them; others supplying them with provisions and guides to lead them to more wealthy countries.

The first body of these mentioned by Herodotus took the way of the Euxine sea, which they had on the left, as mount Caucasus on their right. They passed through Colchis, and Pontus, and arriving in Paphlagonia fortified the promontory, whereon Synope was afterwards built by the Greeks. Here they left under a strong guard such as were unfit for service and great part of their baggage, and then continued their march into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, having now no mountains or deep rivers to stop their march; for the Iris and the Halys they had already passed. We shall give an account of their wars with the Lydians in the history of Lydia.

As the Cimmerians held their course westerly along the shore of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians took the other way, and having the Caspian on their left, passed between that sea and the Caucasus, thro' Albania, Colchene and other obscure nations, till they came into Media, where they engaged and routed Cyaxares, as we have said. To this overthrow of Cyaxares some Commentators refer that prophecy of Nabum (49); He (that is Cyaxares) besieging Nineveh shall recount his worthies; they shall stumble in their walks (that is, in the walk or perambulation of the Scythians, whose coming at this time into Asia may well be so termed, since it was rather a passing thro' than any settlement; for in the short space of twenty-eight years they over-ran, conquered, and lost Media, Assyria, and all the upper Asia): they shall make haste to the wall therefore, and the defence shall be prepared; that is, they shall hasten to Nineveh as if they intended to deliver it from the Medes besieging it^e.

(T) We do not find, that the Scythians, who escaped this bloody feast, raised any commotions in Media, or that they ever afterwards, either in revenge of this treachery, or on any other pretence, troubled the Medes. Which seems the more strange, as we know from Herodotus himself (50), that the army returning out of Media was very strong and numerous; and met with greater opposition at home than they had found abroad. We are therefore apt to believe, that the stratagem of Cyaxares was attended with less bloodshed than is commonly supposed. For by cutting off the chief men among them, he might have brought the others to reasonable terms. It is not improbable that in the space of twenty-eight years, many had settled themselves so well, that they were willing to live in subjection to Cyaxares, provided they might peaceably enjoy what they possessed; many who had enriched themselves with the spoils of Asia were willing to return home to their wives and families with the booty, and such as were not pleased with either of these two courses might join their companions in Lydia and Parthia, Medes then repossessed themselves of the provinces they had lost, and once more extended their empire to the banks of the Hahs, which was their ancient boundary westward ^a.

Cyaxares having thus freed his country from the oppression of the Scythians, found himself soon after engaged in a war with the Lydians. The occasion of this war is thus related by Herodotus ^d. Upon a sedition which happened among the Scythian Nomades, a party of them made their escape into Media, where they were not only entertained with great humanity by Cyaxares, but entrusted with the education of divers youths, whom they were to instruct in the use of the bow; and in the Scythian language. These strangers went frequently to hunt, and were ever accustomed to return with some game. But one day happening to come home with empty hands, Cyaxares whom they used daily to present with some venison, treated them with most opprobrious language; this they resented, and agreed among themselves to kill one of the youths committed to their care, dress his flesh like venison, and serve it up to Cyaxares and his guests. They executed what they proposed, and then flying to Sardis, implored the protection of Halyattes king of Lydia. Cyaxares immediately dispatched ambassadors to demand the Scythians, but they not being able to prevail with the king of Lydia to deliver them up, a war of 5 years ensued between the two nations with various success (U). The battle fought in the sixth year of this war was very remarkable on account of a total eclipse of the sun, which happened during the engagement, and is said to have been foretold by Thales the Milesian (W). The Medes and Lydians who were then in the heat of the battle, equally terrified with this unforeseen event, which they looked upon as a sign of the anger of the gods, immediately retreated, and soon after concluded a peace by the mediation of Labyntus, that is, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and Syennefis king of Cilicia. This peace was strengthened by a marriage between Aryenis the daughter of Halyattes, and Astyages the eldest son of Cyaxares. Of which marriage was born the ensuing year Cyaxares, who in the book of Daniel is called Darius the Mede ^e.

Cyaxares's first care, as soon as he was disengaged from the Lydian war, was to resume the siege of Nineveh, which the eruption of the Scythians had obliged him to raise. Having with this view entered into a strait alliance with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and confirmed it by a marriage between that prince and his daughter Amyle (X), he returned in conjunction with the Babylonians before Nineveh, took the or seek their fortunes in other countries. We read in scripture that all the families of the north were with Nebuchadnezzar; which may well be understood of these brave northern nations settling in his dominions, after they were driven out of Media and Lydia. 'Tis certain that after this expulsion of the Scythians, the Babylonians, who never before had been a match for the Egyptians, in all engagements with them carried the day; which may be ascribed to this new addition of forces.

(U) This Herodotus delivers as the occasion of a war between the Medes and Lydians; the one king demanding the fugitives, and the other refusing to deliver up such as had put themselves under his protection. But to us, we must own, it does not at all seem probable that the Scythians should have sheltered themselves from their own countrymen in the dominions of either prince, considering how odious the Scythian name must at this time have been in both kingdoms. As to Cyaxares, they had particular reasons to distrust him for the treachery he had shewn towards their countrymen, as we have related above. Some writers therefore with greater probability suppose that the Scythians, who retired into Lydia, were such as had escaped the massacre in Media, and not any other new colony; for that universal slaughter being fresh in their memories, it is very unlikely that other Scythians would have come to settle in the very country where it had been so lately perpetrated.

(W) That this eclipse fell out while Cyaxares the father of Astyages and Halyattes the father of Cyaxares were engaged in a battle, is confirmed by Endemus in his astronomical history. Pliny likewise (51) in speaking of eclipses, acquaints us, that Thales the Milesian was the first that foretold an eclipse of the sun; and adds, that the eclipse foretold by him happened in the fourth year of the forty-eighth olympiad in the reign of Halyattes (and not of Astyages, as we find in some modern copies) 170 years after the foundation of Rome. Clemens Alexandrinus (52) places this battle and the eclipse of the sun in the 50th olympiad, wherein he differs widely from Endemus, whom he quotes and pretends to follow. The time assigned both by him and Pliny does not suit with the reign of Cyaxares, but with that of his successor Astyages. The solar and lunar tables of Ptolemy, which are the same with those of Hipparchus, place this eclipse on the fourth year of the 44th olympiad, and on the 4th day of the Egyptian month Pachon (or the 20th day of September, according to the Julian calendar, on a Sunday) three hours, thirty-five minutes before noon. But according to Sir Isaac Newton it fell upon the 28th of May, in the year of Nabonassar 163, forty-seven years before the taking of Babylon (53) and 585 before Christ.

(X) Some will have Amyle to be the daughter of Astyages and grand-daughter of Cyaxares. But Astyages could not at that time have a daughter marriage-

a the place, slew Sarac the king, and levelled that mighty City with the ground. Thus was the proud metropolis of the Assyrian empire laid in ashes, pursuant to the prophecies uttered above an hundred years before. *Woe to the bloody, it is all full of lies and robbery; he that dashes in pieces is come up before thy face. The Lord cometh to avenge the cruelties done to Jacob and to Israel. I bear already the noise of the whisp, and the noise of the rattling of the wheels, and of the prancing horses and of the jumping chariots. The horseman lifteth up both the bright sword, and the glittering spear. The shield of his mighty men is made red: the valiant men are in scarlet. They shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightning. God is jealous; the Lord revengeth, and is furious. The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burnt at his presence: who can stand before his indignation? and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? Behold I am against thee, saith the Lord of hosts: I will strip thee of all thy ornaments. Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end of the store and glory out of all the present furniture. She is empty, and void, and waste. Nineveh is destroyed; she is overthrown; she is desolate. The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. And Huzzab shall be led away captive; she shall be brought up, and her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves taboring upon her breasts. I see a multitude of slain, and a great number of carcases; and there is no end of their corpses; they stumble upon their corpses. Where is the dwelling of the lions, and the feeding place of the young lions, where the lion, even the old lion walketh, and the lions whelp, and none made them afraid: where the lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses, and filled his holes with prey, and his dens with rapine? The Lord shall destroy Assur^f. He shall depopulate the city, which was so beautiful, and turn it into a land where no man cometh, and into a desert. It shall be a dwelling place for wild-beasts, and the birds of night shall lurk therein. Behold, shall it be said, see that proud city, which was so stately and so exalted, which said in her heart, I am the only city, and besides me there is no other. All they that pass by her shall scoff at her, and shall insult her with hissings and contemptuous gestures^g (Y).*

THIS victory with the destruction of Nineveh the Jews ascribe to the Chaldeans; the Greeks to the Medes; Tobit, Polybistor, Josephus, and Ctesias to both. It gave d a beginning to the great successes of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyaxares, and laid the foundation of the two collateral empires, as we may call them, of the Medes and Babylonians, which rose on the ruins of the Assyrian monarchy.

AFTER the reduction of Nineveh the two conquerors prosecuting their victory led the confederate army against Pharaoh Necbo king of Egypt, who had some time before routed the king of Assyria and taken Carchemish. Pharaoh met them near the Euphrates, was defeated, and forced to abandon whatever he had formerly taken from the marriageable, and Nebuchadnezzar, had he married her, must have been at the time of his death at least eighty-five years old, and Assyria much older. In the book of Tobit the destruction of Nineveh is ascribed to Abasuerus king of Media, and Nebuchadonisor king of Babylon^a. This Abasuerus can be no other than Cyaxares, who, as Sir Isaac Newton shews, was called Achshuerus, Assuerus, Oxyares, Axeres, prince Axeres or Cy-Axeres, the word Cy signifying a prince in the Median language (54). By Nabuchadonisor is meant Nebuchadnezzar the great, both these names being given by the Babylonians to their kings, as that of Pharaoh was by the Egyptians to theirs. That Nabopallassar the father of Nebuchadnezzar was called by both these names, is plain from the books of the Rabbi's, and from Josephus. R. Juchasin calls Nebuchadnezzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar (55); and David Ganz calls the father Nebuchadnezzar the first, and the son Nebuchadnezzar the second (56). Josephus in speaking of Nabopallassar sometimes calls him Nabuchadonisor (57), and sometimes Nabulassar (59), which is a contraction of Nabopallassar. It is certain that the books of Tobit and Judith cannot be reconciled with any other ancient writings sacred or profane relating to those times, unless we allow the name of Nebuchadonisor to have been common to the kings of Babylon.

(Y) On the ruins of the old Nineveh another city was raised, which for a long time bore the same name, but never attained to the grandeur and glory of the former. It is now called Mosul (60), and situated on the west side of the Tigris, where was anciently only a part of the suburbs of old Nineveh; for the city itself stood on the east side of the river. The circuit of Nineveh was, according to Diodorus Siculus (61), 480 furlongs, that is sixty of our miles. Hence it is said by Jonah (62) to be a city of three days journey, that is in compass. For twenty miles is as much as a man can well walk in one day. Strabo (63) tells us, that it was much bigger than Babylon, and in the same place says that the circuit of Babylon was 385 furlongs, that is 48 of our miles. The other twelve miles make it, as Strabo says, much bigger than Babylon. We have formerly fixed the æra of its destruction; to which the reader is referred †.

Affyrians^b, as we have seen in a former volume *: for what had once belonged to them, Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar looked upon now as theirs by right of conquest (Z). After this victory they seized on the important place of Carchemish, reduced all Cale-Syria and Phœnice, and then with an army of Babylonians, Medes, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, to the number of 10,000 chariots, 180,000 foot, and 120,000 horse, invaded and laid waste Samaria, Galilee, Scythopolis, &c. and at last besieged Jerusalem, and took king Jeboiakim prisonerⁱ. Enriched with the spoils of the conquered nations, they divided their forces, Nebuchadnezzar pursuing his conquests in the west, and Cyaxares falling upon the Affyrian provinces of Armenia, Pontus and Cappadocia, which he subdued with great slaughter of the inhabitants. After this they united their forces once more, and by the reduction of Persis (A) and Susiana accomplished the conquest of the Affyrian empire.

THE prophet Ezekiel^k enumerates the chief nations that were subdued and slaughtered by the two conquerors Cyaxares and Nebuchadnezzar. Asbur is there and all her company, viz. in Hades or the lower parts of the earth, where the dead Bodies lay buried, his graves are about him: all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused their terror in the land of the living. There is Elam, and all her multitude round about her grave, all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which are gone down uncircumcised into the nether parts of the earth, which caused their terror in the land of the living: yet have they born their shame with them that go down into the pit.—There is Meshech,^c Tubal, and all her multitude (viz. the Scythians); her graves are round about him: all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword, though they caused their terror in the land of the living.—There is Edom, her kings and all her princes, which with their might are laid by them that were slain by the sword.—There be the princes of the north all of them, and all the Zidonians, which with their terror are gone down with the slain. By the princes of the north are meant such as were on the north of Judea, namely the princes of Armenia and Cappadocia, who fell in the wars which Cyaxares waged in reducing those provinces after the destruction of Nineveh.

Cyaxares having thus erected the kingdom of Media into a powerful empire, and shared the new acquisitions with his Babylonian ally, died in the fortieth year of his d reign^l, and was succeeded by his son

Astyages, who in scripture is called Abasuerus^m. This prince had by Aryenis, the daughter of Halyattes king of Lydia, Cyaxares II. called in scripture Darius the Mede, and who was sixty two years old when Belshazzar was slain at the taking of *Babylon*ⁿ. The same year that Cyaxares was born, Astyages gave his daughter Mandane, whom he had by a former wife, to Cambyfes a Persian; from which marriage sprung Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy, and the restorer of the Jews to their country, to their temple and former condition. He was born but one year after the birth of his uncle Cyaxares, and consequently was in the sixty-first year of his age when Babylon was taken. Whether his Father Cambyfes was king of Persia, as Xenophon^o would e have it, or only a nobleman of that country, as we read in Herodotus^p, is what

(Z) From this time the Jewish computation of the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign begins, that is, from the end of the third year of Jeboiakim, and therefore the fourth year of Jeboiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar was by his father taken into partnership of the empire, is according to the Jews (64) the first year of his reign. But according to the Babylonian computation his reign is not reckoned to begin till his father's death, which happened two years after. As both these computations are found in scripture, we thought it necessary to say thus much in order to reconcile them. We must further observe, that as the Chaldean astronomers counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Nabonassar, beginning with the month Tbeth; so the Jews counted the reigns of their kings by the years of Moses, beginning with the month Nisan; inasmuch that if any king began his reign but a few days before the first of the month Nisan, those few days were reckoned a whole year, and the beginning of this month was accounted the beginning of his second year (65).

(A) While the Affyrians reigned at Nineveh, Persia was divided into several kingdoms. Amongst others there was a kingdom of Elam, which flourished in the days of Hezekiah, Mannasseh, Josiah, and Jeboiakim kings of Judah, and fell in the reign of Zedekiah (66). This kingdom seems to have been very powerful, Isaiab foretelling the siege of Babylon, joins Elam, and Media, among the besiegers^q; and Jeremiah threatens the former with a terrible downfall[†], which we therefore suppose to have been accomplished by the Medes and Babylonians. Which confirms what we have said before, viz. that the Persians were not subdued by Pbraortes, as Herodotus would have it, but by Cyaxares in conjunction with the Babylonians.

- a we shall examine hereafter. Though the reign of Astyages was very long, having lasted thirty-five years^a, yet we find no particulars of it recorded in history, except his repelling the Babylonians, who under the conduct of Evil-merodach the son of Nebuchadnezzar, had made an inroad into his country; as we have related at length elsewhere^b. The victory, which he gained on this occasion, was in great part owing to the valour and conduct of Cyrus, who attended his grandfather in this expedition, and though at that time but sixteen years of age signalized himself in a very particular manner^c, pursuing the Babylonian with great slaughter quite home to his own borders. This rash, and seemingly unjust, undertaking of Evil-merodach laid the foundation of that animosity between the Medes and Babylonians, which ended b at last in the ruin of Babylon. From hence we may infer, that Evil-merodach was not the son of Nebuchadnezzar by Amyite the daughter of Cyaxares, or as others will have it, of Astyages, but by some other wife; it not being likely, that they would have thus engaged in war against each other had they been so nearly related. It is still more improbable that Evil-merodach should undertake such hostilities while he was on the point of marrying Nitocris, as is commonly reported, who was by birth a Mede.

- Astyages* after a reign of thirty-five Years was succeeded by his son Cyaxares uncle to Cyrus. This prince was scarce warm on his throne, when he found himself engaged in a bloody war with Neriglissar, who had murdered Evil-merodach and usurped the crown of Babylon. This war was carried on with great slaughter on both sides c by Cyaxares and Cyrus, during the reigns of the usurper Neriglissar, of his son Laborosoarchad, and of Nabonadius the son of Evil-merodach and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose time Babylon was taken, and the Babylonian empire utterly ruined. But as this war, which lasted twenty years, was entirely managed by Cyrus, we shall defer the relating of these important events till the reign of that great and glorious prince, which, as he was the founder of the Persian monarchy, we shall reserve to the history of that empire.

- As for Cyaxares, he is said in scripture to have taken the kingdom after the reduction of Babylon and death of Belshazzar^d. For Cyrus, as long as his uncle lived, held the empire only in partnership with him, though he had entirely acquired it by his own valour. Nay, so far did he carry his complaisance, that he let him enjoy the first rank. But the command of the army, and the whole management of affairs being vested in Cyrus, he alone was looked upon as the supreme governor of the empire. And hence it is, that in Ptolemy's canon no notice is taken of Cyaxares, but immediately after the death of Nabonadius, Cyrus is placed there as the next successor. But that a Mede reigned at Babylon after the death of Nabonadius, or as Herodotus calls him Labyntus, the last Babylonian king in the canon, is plain both from Xenophon^e and scripture. The former tells us, that after the taking of Babylon, Cyrus f went to the king of the Medes at Ecbatan, and succeeded him in the kingdom: and we read in scripture, that Babylon was destroyed by the Medes^g; by the kings of the Medes, and the captains and rulers thereof, and all the land of his dominion^h; that the kingdom of Babylon was numbered and finished and broken and given to the Medes and *Persians*ⁱ; first to the Medes under Darius; and then to the Persians under Cyrus: for Darius reigned over Babylon like a conqueror, not observing the laws of the Babylonians, but introducing the immutable laws of the conquering nations the Medes and Persians^k. In his reign the Medes, as we have observed elsewhere, are constantly placed before the Persians^l; as the Persians in the reign of Cyrus and his successors, are placed before the Medes^m; which shews that, according to scripture, a Mede reigned at Babylon between the last Babylonish king in Ptolemy's canon and Cyrus. This king can be no other than Cyaxares, as Xenophon calls himⁿ, or Darius the Mede, as he is stiled by Daniel. The scripture ascribes the destruction of Babylon chiefly to Cyaxares, whereof St. Hierom alledges three reasons^o; 1. because Darius or Cyaxares was the elder of the two; 2. in regard the Medes were at that time more famous than the Persians; and lastly, because the uncle ought to be preferred to the nephew. On the other hand, that few of the Greek writers take any notice of Cyaxares, may easily be accounted for. The Persians desirous to magnify and extol Cyrus their countryman, gave him all the glory of that great conquest, ^a and from them the Greeks borrowed their relations. Besides, Cyrus alone was employed in the siege of Babylon, Darius being then absent, and the confederate army under his conduct stormed the town, and put an end to the empire of Babylon. We may add, that as Darius did not reign at Babylon full two Years, before the fame of this great conquest was spread abroad in distant countries, Cyrus was in the entire possession of the Babylonian empire, whence they looked upon him as the great hero, who had alone performed such extraordinary feats. But Josephus, who was better informed, tells us^e, that Darius with his ally Cyrus destroyed the kingdom of Babylon. The same author adds, that this Darius was the son of Astyages, and that he was known to the Greeks by another name. Now if we ask the Greeks the name ^b of Astyages's son, Xenophon^f will tell us, that he was called Cyaxares. As for the name of Darius, it was preserved in the Darics or Stateres Darici, those famous pieces of gold, which for several ages were preferred by the eastern nations to any other coin: for we are told^g that these were coined not by the father of Xerxes, but by an earlier Darius, the first king of the Medes and Persians that coined gold. But no Darius, more ancient than the father of Xerxes, is any where said to have reigned, except this Darius, whom the scripture calls Darius the Mede.

AFTER the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares in concert with Cyrus settled the affairs of their new empire, dividing it into 120 provinces^h, which were governed by those who had distinguished themselves during the war. Over these governors were appointed three presidents, who were constantly to reside at court, and receiving accounts of what happened in the several provinces, dispatch the king's orders to the immediate officers; so that these three principal ministers had the super-intendency over, and the chief administration of, the most weighty affairs of the whole kingdom. Of these Daniel was appointed the chief, an honour, which he highly deserved, not only on account of his great wisdom, but likewise of his age and consummate experience. For he had now served the kings of Babylon full sixty-five years in the quality of prime minister. As this employment advanced him to be the next person to the king, it raised no small jealousy in the other courtiers, who conspiring against him would have compassed his ruin, had he not been miraculously ^d preserved by that providence, which is ever watching over the safety of the just. As the only thing they could lay hold of to disgrace him at court, and make him incur the king's displeasure, was the law of his God, to which they knew him inviolably attached, they prevailed with Darius to issue out a proclamation forbidding all persons to put up any petition whatsoever to God or man, except to the king, for the space of thirty days, upon pain of being cast into the lions den. Now as Daniel was saying his usual prayers, with his face turned towards Jerusalem, he was surprised, accused, and, as the laws of the Medes were unalterable, condemned to be devoured by the lions. But being miraculously delivered from their jaws, this malicious contrivance ended in the destruction of its authors, and greatly raised, ^e as we may well imagine, Daniel's reputation both with Darius and *Cyrus*ⁱ. This probably happened, while Cyrus was in Syria; for after having settled his affairs at Babylon, and furnished the garrisons with such troops as were necessary for the defence of the several parts of the empire, he marched with the remainder into Syria, which he brought under subjection with the other adjacent countries, extending his conquests as far as the Red Sea, and the confines of Aethiopia. In the mean time Darius remained at Babylon, managed the civil affairs of the empire; and in this interval was Daniel cast into the lions den. The Darics were, perhaps, coined much about the same time out of the gold of the conquered Lydians (B). But in the reign of Cyrus we shall give a more distinct account of several particulars relating to his two predecessors Cyaxares and Astyages. We have hitherto supposed the former to be Daniel's Darius the Mede, and Nabonadius his Belsazzar; but as both these points are controverted by writers of no mean characters, before we dismiss the history of

(C) As the whole history of Babylon from the death of Nebuchadnezzar to the reduction of that city by Cyrus is overcall, we may say, with an impenetrable mist, writers are strangely puzzled to find out Daniel's Belshazzar among the last kings that reigned there, and equally at a loss concerning his Darius the Mede, who was in that kingdom succeeded by Cyrus. To proceed with all the perspicuity we can in so perplexed a subject, we shall, 1st, produce what we read in the prophecies of Daniel relating to the last kings of Babylon; 2. what is allowed on all hands to be certain, and is confirmed by the concurrence of all the profane historians; and lastly, the various opinions of modern writers, with the arguments they alledge to support them.

The prophet Daniel after mentioning what had happened in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, relates the visions he had in the first and third year of Belshazzar, and the fatal end of that prince in the following manner (68). Belshazzar having made a great feast, commanded the vessels of gold and silver to be brought to him, which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple of Jerusalem. He drank in them, and his wives and his concubines, and the lords of his court. In the same hour an hand appeared, and wrote over-against the candlestick on the plaister of the wall of the king's palace. The king, who saw the motion of the hand, was greatly frightened, and commanded his wife-men and sooth-sayers to be sent for. But none of them being able to explain the writing, Daniel was immediately sent for at the suggestion of the queen, who on the alarm which that prodigy had occasioned, entered the banquetting-room and acquainted the king with the great abilities of Daniel in such matters. The prophet, after reproaching the king for profaning the holy vessels, reads the writing, and informs him that the words are Mene Mene, Tekel Upharsin, which he thus interprets: Mene, God has numbered thy kingdom and finished it; Tekel, thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting; Peres, thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. The prophet adds, that in that night Belshazzar, king of the Chaldeans was slain, and that Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.

The same prophet informs us next (69) what order Darius established in the realm, and relates the visions which he had in the first year of Darius, and in the third of Cyrus. It is manifest that Daniel speaks here of three kings succeeding each other to the crown of Babylon; namely, Belshazzar, Darius the Mede, and Cyrus. The last is well known; but the question is, who the two others were? a question which we must endeavour to solve, in order to reconcile Daniel and the profane historians.

Most historians agree that Nebuchadnezzar after a reign of forty-three years (or forty-five if we compute the two years which he reigned jointly with his father) was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach, who reigned two complete years, and was murdered in the beginning of his third by Neriglissar. Neriglissar ruled four years, and was succeeded by his son Laborfarched, who was murdered after a short reign of nine months. Nabonadius came to the crown next, and reigned seventeen years. In his time the city of Babylon was taken by Cyrus, and the empire overturned.

'Tis manifest that Belshazzar was one of the four last kings of Babylon, and that he was of the race of Nebuchadnezzar, since in scripture he is often called his son; but authors are strangely puzzled to determine which of the four bears this name in Daniel's prophecies.

Sir John Marsham takes Belshazzar to be Evil-merodach the son of Nebuchadnezzar; he founds his opinion on the authority of scripture, where Nebuchadnezzar is often called the father of Belshazzar, and Belshazzar the son of Nebuchadnezzar. Several other circumstances concur to prove that Evil-merodach and Belshazzar must be one and the same person. Berosus (70) represents Evil-merodach as a lewd and wicked prince; Belshazzar in scripture bears the same character. Berosus tells us that Evil-merodach was killed at a banquet by some of his lords (71); the scripture says, that Belshazzar was murdered at a great entertainment which he gave to 1000 of his lords. However convincing these proofs may seem, and consonant to scripture, yet upon examination we shall find them to be of no force, and quite inconsistent with what we read in holy writ. The prophet Daniel, after relating what happened to Belshazzar at his grand entertainment, adds, and in that night Belshazzar, king of the Chaldeans was slain, and Darius the Median took the kingdom. From these words it is plain, that immediately after the death of Belshazzar the kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians (73). But this did not happen upon the death of Evil-merodach, who was succeeded, according to Berosus and Megasthenes (74) and Sir John Marsham himself, by Neriglissar his sister's husband, who was at the head of the conspiracy against him. This objection seemed of such weight to Sir John Marsham, that in order to elude it, and maintain his assertion without contradicting the scripture, he was forced to suppose Neriglissar to be Darius the Mede, and the Medo-Persian empire to have begun in him; a supposition which we shall confute when we come to speak of Darius the Mede. To what we have alledged out of Daniel against our learned author's system, we shall add a proof no less convincing from the prophet Jeremiah, who foretold (75), that all nations should serve him (Nebuchadnezzar) and his son, and his son's son. If the kingdom was transferred from his son to the Medes and Persians, as Sir John Marsham would have it, it is manifest that this prophecy was never fulfilled. What that author urges in defence of his opinion, viz. that Belshazzar might be, according to scripture, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, tho' true in a more extensive sense, wherein any descendant is called son, and any ancestor, father, according to the stile of the scripture; yet is not so in the literal one, in which the prophet seems to have couched it, as will appear further by and by.

To Evil-merodach succeeded, as we have hinted above, Neriglissar, who had married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter. We have not yet met with any author that ever asserted him to be Daniel's Belshazzar. He reigned four years, and left a son, named Laborfarched according to Berosus, or Labaassarasc, as Megasthenes is pleased to call him (76). This prince came very young to the crown, and betraying a most vicious turn of mind, was murdered by his own subjects after he had reigned only nine months (77). And this is the reason, why he is omitted in Ptolemy's canon, where the whole year is reckoned to the king that begins it, how soon soever he dies after. If a king died but a few days after the beginning of the month Tatb, he was said to have reigned that whole year; and if any other reigned in the interim, but did not live to the beginning of the said month, his name was omitted in the canon. And this was the case of Laborsarchod.

But to return to our subject; Joseph Scaliger (78) will have Laborsarchod to be Daniel's Belshazzar, and sounds his opinion on the following arguments, viz. that he was the last of Nebuchadnezzar's race; that he was killed by conspirators, and that his kingdom devolved to Nabonadius or Labyntus, who was, according to Megasthenes (79), a stranger to the family of Nebuchadnezzar. He adds a circumstance out of Daniel, which he takes to be of great weight; the queen advised Belshazzar to consult Daniel; this queen, says he, could not be the king's wife; for his wives and concubines were at the feast; 'twas therefore the queen mother, which suits well with the character of Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, who was regent. If we object against this hypothesis, that Laborsarchod reigned only nine months, whereas it is plain from Daniel, that Belshazzar reigned some years; his answer is, that the scripture ascribes to Laborsarchod or Belshazzar the whole four years which the canon accounts to Neriglissar or Nerissalassar, as he is there called, because Neriglissar reigned only as his guardian. And hence it is, that we hear of the first and third year of Belshazzar in Daniel (80), though Laborsarchod reigned alone no more than nine months.

This opinion too is clogged with two unsurmountable difficulties, which, in few words, are; 1. That it supposes Nabonadius to be Darius the Mede, a supposition which we shall plainly prove from holy writ to be false; 2. That it falsifies the prophecy of Jeremiah promising the empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his son, and his son's son; whereas Laborsarchod was his daughter's son. This difficulty Scaliger seems not to have been aware of, since he takes no notice of it in solving the objections that may be brought against his opinion.

If neither Evil-merodach, nor Neriglissar, nor Laborsarchod were Daniel's Belshazzar, it follows that Nabonadius was the king who in scripture bears that name. This will appear more plain if we consider, 1. That he is on all hands agreed to have been the last of the Babylonian kings, and therefore must be the same, who in scripture is called Belshazzar; for immediately after the death of Belshazzar the kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians (81). 2. That he was of the race of Nebuchadnezzar, for he is by Daniel often called his son, and in the Chronicles (82) it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar and his children or offspring reigned at Babylon till the kingdom of Persia; 3. That the nations of the east were to serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah (83); he must therefore have been succeeded by a son and a son's son to the crown of Babylon. Evil-merodach was his son, and of all the kings that reigned after him none but Belshazzar could be his son's son. For Neriglissar was only his daughter's husband, and Laborsarchod his daughter's son. 4. Herodotus tells us, that the last king of Babylon was son to the celebrated queen Nitocris; and it is plain that by Evil-merodach alone she could have a son, who was son's son to Nebuchadnezzar. This opinion seems to us the least perplexed with difficulties, and of all others the most agreeable to what we read both in scripture and in the profane historians; and therefore we have, upon maturer consideration, preferred it to that of Sir John Marsham, which we were more inclined to embrace in our history of Babylon.

Authors are no less divided in their opinions touching Daniel's Darius the Mede, than they are about his Belshazzar. Sir John Marsham (84), as we have hinted above, stands up for Neriglissar, and will have the Medo-Persian empire to have begun in him. He supposes Neriglissar to have been a Mede, for no other reason, but because he married the sister of Evil-merodach, whose mother was a Mede. We are unwilling to quarrel with him on account of this supposition, or rather conjecture; but should be glad to know how, even according to this supposition, the kingdom of Babylon was upon the death of Belshazzar, that is according to him of Evil-merodach, divided and given to the Medes and Persians? It is not equally certain that Belshazzar was killed, as that his kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians; and that this happened immediately upon the death of that king, as the words of the prophet plainly insinuate; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians.—In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. And Darius the Median took the kingdom (85). Besides, it is very plain from the whole sixth chapter of Daniel that Darius the Mede was king of Media. He introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians, which would have been very impolitic in him, had he usurped the crown without any friends or troops to rely on, except the Babylonians, whose laws he trod under foot and annulled. And this, if we suppose him to be Neriglissar, was his case; for he introduced the laws of the Medes and Persians, was at war with both nations, and had no friends to depend upon except his own subjects, who naturally must have hated him, without any further provocation, as a stranger, as an usurper, and as the murderer of their lawful prince. To all this we may add, that if the Medo-Persian empire began in Neriglissar, Cyrus did not destroy the Babylonian but the Medo-Persian empire, which no author ever asserted. But the strongest proof, in our opinion, that can be produced against this system, and that also of Scaliger, who takes Nabonadius to be Darius the Mede, is, that Darius is said to have divided his empire into 120 provinces (86), which must be understood, not of the Babylonian, which was never so extensive, but of the Persian empire. The latter on the conquest of Egypt by Cambysis, and of Thrace and India by Darius Hystaspes, had seven other provinces added to its former number. Whence in the time of Ezra it consisted of 127 provinces. If this was the division of the Persian empire in her time, the former must necessarily have been that of the same empire. For if the Persian empire from India to Ethiopia contained but 127 provinces, the empire of Babylon alone, which was hardly the seventh part of the other, could not contain 120. It is not therefore to be doubted, but Darius the Mede was lord, not of the Babylonian only, but of the Persian empire, which cannot be said either of Neriglissar or Nabonadius.

Scaliger (87) maintains Nabonadius to be Daniel's Darius, adding that he was by nation a Mede, and no way related to Nebuchadnezzar, but freely elected king by the same Babylonian lords who put Laborsarchod to death. That he was freely elected he endeavours to prove from the words of the prophet Daniel saying that he took the kingdom, which imply a free election, and not a forcible invasion. That he was a Mede he pretends to evince from a prophecy which Megasthenes (88) relates Nebuchadnezzar to have uttered before his death, foretelling to the Babylonians, that a great calamity was to fall fall on them, which neither Belus, nor queen Belshazzar could avert; that a Persian must bring the Babylonians under subjection, being assisted by a Mede. The Persian must be Cyrus, he being the issue of a Persian and a Mede; the Mede, who assisted him, was Nabonadius. If we ask Scaliger how Nabonadius can be said to have assisted Cyrus in destroying the city and kingdom of Babylon, since he waged war with him in defence of both, and was vanquished and killed; his answer is, that Nabonadius forwarded the destruction of Babylon by being conquered and slain, and that in this sense, (if in this there be any sense) he concurred with Cyrus in the overturning of the Babylonian empire. This argument needs no answer, it is sufficiently refuted by being related. And therefore Isaac Vossius well observes (89), that the arguments produced by Scaliger to support this wild opinion are unworthy of Scaliger. As to his other proof, viz. that Darius took the kingdom; they imply, we own, no violence, on the part of Darius, who cannot properly be said to have stormed the town or won it by dint of arms; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though with the joint forces of the Medes and Persians. This city being thus reduced by the troops of Darius and by Cyrus his general, Darius without any further opposition took possession of the empire as conquered by his forces. It is not by any means probable, that the Babylonian lords after murdering their king should place a Mede on the throne, while they were at open war with that nation; nor can the division of the kingdom of Babylon between the Medes and Persians foretold by Daniel be meant of a king, who, though by nation a Mede, should be elected by the Babylonians, and peaceably enjoy the kingdom till driven out by the Persians. This division must have been made after the empire was destroyed and the city taken. To conclude; this system contradicts not only the prophecy of Daniel touching the division of the empire between the Babylonians and Medes, but that likewise of Jeremiah, where it is said, that all nations should serve him (Nebuchadnezzar) and his son, and his son's son. If Nabonadius was Darius, who of all the kings of Babylon was Nebuchadnezzar's son's son? Since Scaliger could not answer this question, it was well done of him to take no notice of it in displaying and solving, in the best manner he could, several difficulties that others might have started against his assertion. He commonly adopts the sentiments of Berosus; but here he even forsakes him; for Berosus tells us (90) that Nabonadius was a Babylonian. 'Tis true, he seems afterwards concerned for having thus slighted the authority of such an unerring guide, and is inclined to make him a Babylonian. But how can this be reconciled with scripture, where he is ever styled Darius the Median? He has a salve for this fore too: the word Median or Mede is not, says he, the national name, as the whole tribe of chronologers and interpreters, simple well-meaning men, have imagined, but the surname of Darius. But it is very unlucky for Joseph that Daniel should begin his 9th chapter thus: In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans. He was therefore by nation a Mede and the son of a king of Media. But our writer seems to have been more conversant in the mangled fragments of Berosus, than in the books of the prophets, from which there is no appeal: and doth, on that very account, richly deserve the compliments which he ironically bestows on such as are unwilling to adopt his wild notions. But we will not press this further; contradiction and an over-bearing positiveness are but too well known to have been the essential ingredients of his character; and had he not in most things been singular, in all peremptory, he had neither been a Scaliger, nor the son of Julius.

The difficulties we have objected against the two foregoing opinions have made other writers look for Darius the Mede elsewhere. They suppose, that there was one Darius a Mede king of Persia before Cambyges the father of Cyrus, who was also, according to Xenophon, king of Persia. This conjecture is supported by a passage out of Æschylus (91), where that poet seemingly supposes the first king of Persia there mentioned to have been a Mede, who with a powerful army took Susa. Next to him he places his son, whom he does not name, and in the third place Cyrus, whom he calls a happy prince. This Darius who took Susa and waged war with the Babylonians, they will have to be Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus. This opinion is liable to one strong objection, namely, that Darius the grandfather of Cyrus could not be alive when Babylon was taken, Cyrus himself being then, as it is agreed on all hands, and we shall shew in the history of Persia, sixty-one years old.

Other writers, following Xenophon's account, maintain Cyaxares the son of Astyages, and uncle of Cyrus, to be Darius the Mede. He succeeded Astyages in the kingdom of Media, as Cyrus did Cambyges in that of Persia. These two kings with joint forces invaded the kingdom of Babylon, and took the city. Cyaxares reigned two years at Babylon, and at his death Cyrus became master of the whole empire. This hypothesis is entirely agreeable to scripture, and free from those unsurmountable difficulties, which attend the others, as is allowed even by those who reject it. Their only exception to this system is, that neither Herodotus, Berosus nor Megasthenes knew of any such king as Darius or Cyaxares II. nay, Herodotus tells us in express words, that Astyages was succeeded by his grandson Cyrus. This immediate succession of Cyrus to his grandfather is vouched by Diodorus, Justin, Strabo, Polyænus, Africanus, Clement Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, Hieron, Austin, &c. but these, as they have only copied after Herodotus, add no new weight to the scale. The abovementioned writers, we own, give Astyages no other successor than Cyrus; but Xenophon (92) does, and likewise Josephus (93) forsaking herein Berosus, whom he often quotes and ever follows where his authority does not clash with scripture. Xenophon calls the successor of Astyages Cyaxares, and Josephus gives him the name of Darius, adding that he overturned the kingdom of Babylon, being in that enterprize assisted by his nephew Cyrus (94), which is consonant both to scripture and chronology; whereas the contrary opinion, though perhaps not repugnant to holy writ, cannot by any means be reconciled with chronology. For if we suppose that Astyages had no other successor but Cyrus, we must allow him to have lived a hundred years and upwards. For he gave his daughter in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar, as the sticklers for Herodotus tell us, before the siege of Nineveh, that is, seventy-three years before the reduction of Babylon. He must have been at that time at least thirty years old, and two years more he reigned at Babylon. Could we but prevail upon ourselves to believe that Astyages lived to so great an age, we should willingly follow Herodotus, having a great respect for that venerable and by some much injured historian. His system is no ways repugnant to scripture, where nothing is said of Darius the Mede, which may not be as well applied to Astyages himself as to his son.

A modern writer (95), so prepossessed in favour of Herodotus as not to call in question any thing that author asserts, endeavours to support his system with a passage from the Apocryphal of Daniel xiii. 65. where it is said, And king Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received the kingdom. His quotation is right according to the vulgate, which is the standard in the church of Rome. But as they are not to be met with in the original, but only in that Apocryphal part called the history of Bel and the Dragon, ver. 1. we shall not take the pains of confusing our author, nor follow any longer a wild-goose chase, into which they must infallibly run, who leave the most beaten path, for the sake of being singular; but endeavour to close this note with an observation of greater moment and profit: which is, that this great event, this total end and final destruction of the Babylonish monarchy, was literally and circumstantially fulfilled according to the prophecies that had gone long before of it, as the reader may see by comparing the one with the other in the following instances among many more. It was foretold, 18. That proud city was to be besieged by the Medes (96), in conjunction with other nations (97); that the passes and fords should be seized, the mighty men cast into the greatest dread and confusion (98), that the rivers should be dried up (99), that the city should be surprized in the midst of their mirth and jollity, and her princes and captains in the height of their carousing, and be cast from their drunkenness into an eternal sleep (100); and lastly, that that once so potent and glorious city, should certainly become utterly waste, and an habitation for owls, bitterns, and other such ominous birds (101): all which was exactly verified, as we have seen. Thus much we have thought necessary to say on a subject, which has occasioned endless disputes among the learned, and hope that the reader will not think we have trespassed on his patience, when he reflects that we have brought within the compass of one note what has supplied matter for whole volumes.

Its several names.

THIS country like many others has in different ages been called by different names, and tho' to some the settling of these may seem a dry and useless task, yet inasmuch as the subsequent history will be much enlightened thereby, we shall give the reader as distinct and accurate an account of them as we can. The most ancient name of Persia is that by which it is called by Moses^a, viz. Elam, or, as some write it, Ælam, from Elam the son of Shem, the father of its first inhabitants. ^b Herodotus calls its inhabitants Cephenes, and in very ancient times the people of this country are said to have called themselves Artai, and the region wherein they dwelt Artea. In the books of ^c Daniel, ^d Esdras, &c. we find it called Paras, agreeable to the Persian denomination of Pars, or Pbârs, by which the proper Persia is called at this time. It has been also called Achæmenia and Arfaca from its ancient kings. In ^e Oriental writers it is called Agjem, Irân, and Shabistân, which last signifies the dominions of the Shâh. It is true that strictly speaking Achæmenia and Iran are not general names of Persia, but rather of parts thereof; yet as they are frequently used in authors to signify that country which we call Persia, they may well enough be comprehended in this list of names (A).

It was foretold, 18. That proud city was to be

^a THE extent of Persia has been in different ages as various as its names; ^b*Ptolemy* Extent. bounds it thus: on the north it hath Media, on the east Caramania, on the west Susiana, on the south the Persian gulph; but this relates to Persia as a province. We consider it in another light, and therefore to speak as clearly and distinctly as we may, let us first assign the boundaries of the Persian empire as they stood anciently, when it extended farthest; let us next settle the boundaries of the modern Persian empire, and thirdly let us review the several provinces mentioned by ancient writers, and as we go on take some account of the condition they are now in.

As to the ancient empire of the Persians it reached in length from the Hellepont ^{Boundaries.} to the mouth of the river Indus about 2800 English miles, in breadth from Pontus to the mouth of the Arabian gulph about 2000 miles.

^b THE modern Persia, that is the dominions of the Persian crown, extend in length from the mouth of the river Araxes, to the mouth of the river Indus about 1840 of our miles, and in breadth from the river Oxus to the Persian gulph, about 1080 of our miles, bounded thus; on the north, by the Caspian sea, the river Oxus, and mount Caucasus; on the east, by the river Indus, and the dominions of the Great Mogul, as he is commonly call'd; on the south, by the Persian gulph, and the Indian ocean, and on the west by the dominions of the Grand Signior (B).

after denouncing many judgments against this country, adds these words, But it shall come to pass in the latter days that I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith THE LORD (2); he is always understood to mean the restoration of the kingdom of the Persians by Cyrus who subdued the Babylonians, as these had before subdued the Persians and made them subject to their empire (3). As to the word 𐎱𐎠𐎼𐎿 Paras, authors are not very well agreed as to its etymology or signification; some are for deriving it from the Arabick word Pharis, which signifies a horse. Some Persian historians say that Phari is a proper name, and that the person so called was the son of Arsham, i. e. Arpaxad the son of Shem; others make this Phari the son of Japhet, &c. Some again who seem to be nearest the truth, say that he was the son of Elam the son of Shem (4). It is evident however that the Greek word Persis and the Latin word Persia are derived from this oriental denomination, and not from this country's being conquered by Persians. The name Artaxi is thought to be derived from the Persian word Ardor or Ari, which signifies strong, brave, magnanimous, intimating that the people of this country were such in their dispositions (5). Arbæmenia, as Stephanus Byzantius (6) informs us, was only a part of Persia, Strabo (7) says nearly the same thing; yet sometimes it is used to signify Persia in general, as particularly by Herodotus (8), who makes Cambyses in an oration call his people Arbæmenides. In the Armenian language Persians I have said is stiled Shabistân, i. e. the country of the Shâd (9). The Arabians gave the name of Agemissân to Persia, because in their language Agem signifies stranger or rather Barbarian, which with great modesty they impose on every other nation but their own; hence the distinction of Arak-Arab and Arak-Agem, which signifies as much as the Towns of the Arabs and the Towns of the Barbarians. The Persians themselves call their country generally Iran, and Iran; for this reason they say that under the reign of king Efrasiab their empire contained all the countries between the Caspian sea and China. This monarch divided his mighty empire into two parts, calling that on the other side of the river Oxus, Turan, and this Iran, i. e. on the other side of the river, and on this side of the river; whence in the ancient Persian histories Key Iran and Key Turan signified the king of Persia and the king of Tartary. At this day the Persian monarch is stiled Padishah-Iran, and the grand vizier of Persia, Iran-Medary, i. e. the pole of Persia (10).

(B) The ingenious Sir John Chardin tells us that " Persia is the greatest empire in the world, if we consider it according to the geographical descriptions of the Persians, for they represent its ancient boundaries to have been the four following great seas, viz. the Black-Sea, the Red-Sea, the Caspian-Sea, and the Persian gulph; and also these six rivers almost as well known as seas, Euphrates, Araxis, Tigris, Phasis, Oxus, and Indus. It is indeed impossible to mark precisely the limits of this vast kingdom, for it is not with it as with the dominions of some petty sovereigns, where a rivulet or pillar marks the frontier: Persia has on every side a space of three or four days' journey utterly uninhabited, though the soil is in some places the best in the world; the Persians look on it as a mark of true grandeur, the leaving such deserts between great empires, it hinders say they all disputes about limits, and they serve like walls to separate one kingdom from another. The seas and rivers before mentioned are far from being the boundaries of Persia at this day, yet the latest Persian writers describe always their empire within these limits; for they insist that of right all the countries between them belong to them, and that they want only such another brave king as Abbas the great to restore them to the possession of their ancient territory. Persia in the state I saw it, taking it from Georgia, i. e. from the 45th deg. of latitude to the 80th, and from the river Indus to the mountains of Ararat, that is from the 77th to the 112th deg. of longitude, contains in length about 550 Persian leagues which makes 750 French leagues, and in breadth about 400 (11)". We have chosen to make use of the testimony of this traveller preferable to others, because he seems to have taken great pains in the description which he has given us of this country, and since it must be allowed that his long stay therein, his great parts and general knowledge qualified him perfectly for such a work; if we cannot credit him, it is hard to know on whom we may rely.

Gedrosia.

IN our account of the provinces into which the country we are speaking of was ^a anciently divided, we shall begin with Gedrosia, mentioned by *Pliny*¹, Strabo, and other writers. It is bounded on the west by Carmania, on the north by Drangiana, and Arachosia, on the east by Guzarat a province of India, on the south by the Indian ocean; it is call'd at present Makran, of old it was inhabited by the Arbitæ, Parfiræ, Musarmæi, and the Rhamusæ; its principal cities were Pasis, Arbis, and Cuni. Ptolemy places here a celebrated Emporium call'd the haven of women, the principal modern cities are Firbh^m, Cbalak, and the port of Guadal (C).

Carmania.

Carmania is divided into Carmania the desert, and Carmania proper. Carmania^a the desert is bounded on the north by Parthia, on the west by Persis, on the east by Drangiana, on the south by Carmania proper. Carmania^b proper bath on the south the Indian ocean, on the west Persis and the gulph of Persia, on the east Gedrosia, and on the north Carmania the desert; it contains the modern provinces of Chirman and Ormas; it was inhabited by the Isaticheæ, Zutbi, Gadanopydræ, Camelobosæi, Agdonites, Rbudiansæ, Ares, Charadesæ, Pasargadæ, and Armozæi. Its ancient cities were Carmanæ, now Kbirman, still a considerable place, and famous for the excellent scymiters made there, Alexandria built by Alexander the great, Armuzæ or Armuzum, on the shore of the gulph, giving name to a promontory, and to the island of Ormuz. The modern places of note besides are Kbirman, Bermazir^v, Kubestek and Iasquez, which gives name to a cape or promontory shooting into the Persian gulph (D).

(C) As it would have swelled this chapter to an exetive bulk if we had in the text been very particular as to the respective provinces of Persia, to to avoid obscurity on the other hand we have thought it necessary to add such a description of each province in these notes as may suffice to give the reader a competent idea of its situation, extent and productions. This being premised, let us proceed in the order observed in the text.

Tho' Gedrosia be constantly so called by Strabo and Ptolemy, yet (12) Diodorus Siculus, (13) Suidas, and some manuscripts of (14) Ammianus Marcellinus read Cedrosia. The extent of this province cannot easily be assigned, because though in general terms its boundaries be pretty well settled, yet how to fix these at this distance of time is a question not readily resolved. Mount Betius or rather a ridge of mountains run through the middle of this province, and from them springs the celebrated river Arbis or Arabis, which after a short course runs into the Indian ocean. At the mouth of this river stood the Turaxuv Ἀμυν, or port of women, of Ptolemy (15), mentioned also by Arrian in his Indian history, who tells us that this place was so called because originally it was governed by women (16). The soil of this province was sandy and barren, very deficient in water, and the air intemperately hot, so that Alexander's army suffered excessively here notwithstanding they built their huts with aromattick wood, and met with spices in profusion (17). Ptolemy mentions two islands dependant on this province, Astia and Codane (18). Arrian speaking of the voyage of Nearchus, tells us he observed several others (19).

(D) Though other authors speak of Carmania in general, yet Ptolemy makes not only the difference before noted in the text, but interposes the description of Arabia Felix between Carmania Deserta, and Carmania the proper. As to the first it is very truly what Ptolemy calls it, having scarce a town or a village in it, its soil being an inhospitable sand, its air hot and unhealthy, and the whole province in a manner destitute of water (21). Carmania proper is a better country, having in it several rivers, particularly the Andamis mentioned by Pliny (22), and Ptolemy (23). It is however mountainous, though with this advantage, that these mountains have mines of copper and iron; the people anciently however lived in no very desirable condition if the description given us by Pomponius Mela be true: "The Carmanians, said he, have neither fruits nor raiment, nor house, nor cattle, but cover themselves with skins of fish, and feeding on them for the most part, the bodies as well as heads of these people are covered with hair (24)." It may be Pomponius Mela confounds the Carmanians with a nation inhabiting the sea-coast, and called from their manner of living Icthyophagi, mentioned both by Strabo (25) and Arrian (26), and who are said not only to have fed on fish, but to have erected huts with their bones. Ammianus Marcellinus (27) gives Carmania a better character. At this day this province is particularly remarkable for producing sheep which bear the finest wool in the world; they have this peculiar property, that having fed upon new grass from January to May, their fleece falls off of itself and leaves the sheep quite naked; the wool being gathered and beaten, the coarse breaks, and the fine only remains. The Gauri have the whole manufacture of this wool in their hands, which consists chiefly in girdles much esteemed through the east, and in a sort of serges which are as soft and almost as fine as silk (28). Dependant on this province is the little but famous island of Ormuz, in compass about 20 miles, stony and full of rocks, barren and destitute of all necessaries except salt, of which there is such plenty and so hard, that it is said houses are built thereof. The soil is composed of a white sand formerly imported into Europe. Water (except such as after rains was preserved in cisterns) it had none, so that even in its most flourishing times, when it was the emporium

a * Drangiana bounded on the south by Gedrosia, on the east by Arachosia, on the north by Aria, on the west by Carmania the desert, derived its name, as some say, from the river Drangius, and is called by the modern Persians, Sigistan, it was antiently peopled by the Daranda and the Batrij; Ptolemy reckons ten considerable cities in this province, the most famous of which were Ariaspe and Prophtbasia; those now of any note are * Sistan, supposed by some to be the antient city last mentioned; Cbalak, and Kets. * Some writers speak of a certain valley in this province called Mulebat, improved by a prince called Aladin, into a paradise, though for very bad purposes (E).

b Arachosia is bounded on the west by Drangiana, on the north by Paropamisus, on the east by the river Indus, on the South by Gedrosia. Its modern name is not well settled, it was inhabited of old by the Arimaspi, who were afterwards called Margyete, and then Euergete, the Sydri, Roplute, and Eorte. Ptolemy reckons up thirteen cities in this province, we shall content ourselves with mentioning only three; Arachotus built on a lake of the same name by the famous Semiramis, who is said to have given it the name of Copbes; Alexandria built by Alexander the great, and by some thought to be the same with the city now called * Cabul; and Arbaca supposed to have derived its name from some of the kings of Parthia called Arbaces. As to modern towns of note, we know of none (F).

of this part of the world, its inhabitants had not only their victuals but the very water they used from the continent. The air in summer was so excessively sultry, that people were forced to live in grots, and to lie in water (29). At present there is nothing on it but a fort; but of its antient kingdom and of the several revolutions which happened therein, we shall treat in its proper place.

(E) (30) Strabo, Ptolemy (31), and Pliny (32), agree in calling this province Drangiana; Diodorus calls it Drangina, and its inhabitants Drangi (33). A ridge of mountains, the principal of which is called Bagrus, runs through this country, and from thence some have fancied that there ran a river called Drangius, from whence this country took its name, but of this there is no certainty; the province is not large, and every where hilly, far from abounding with any rich commodities, and therefore never very famous either in antient or modern times. At present it is only so, from its being reported to have been the birth-place of Raslan the celebrated hero of Oriental romances. As to the valley of Mulebat or paradise of Sultan Aladin mentioned above, its history runs thus: A petty prince of this name caused this valley to be adorned in the most elegant manner he could contrive, furnishing it especially with airy pavillions, fine women, rich sherbet, and delicate provisions; he then shut up its entrance with a strong fort, and whenever he had any dangerous exploit to perform, for it seems he was but a kind of a free-booter, he chose out some strong able young man, and having first got him to drink to such a degree as to lose his senses, he caused him while in that condition to be removed into this paradise of his, where having suffered him to remain for two or three days, he then directed him to be lulled asleep in the same manner, and so sent home to his own house: then under promise of sending him for ever to dwell in that Paradise the joys of which he had tasted, Aladin quickly drew the deluded wretch to perpetrate the most barbarous and bloody fact that could be thought of (34).

(F) It is on the authority of Mont. Tavernier that we have told our readers there are now no towns of note in this province (35), by which we mean, none that are exactly known to stand within the limits of the antient Arachosia; however, since some writers are positive that the antient city of Arachotus or rather Arachotes, for it is a Greek appellation, was seated where now stands the city of Cabul (36), we will take this opportunity of inserting a description of that city and the parts adjacent, which may perhaps prove as useful and must of necessity be more entertaining to our readers than a dry recital of the conjectures of geographers relating to this province. " Cabul is a large city, the metropolis of the province of Caboulistan, or Caboul. " It hath two castles well fortified, and because " several kings have held their courts there, and " many princes successively have had it for their " portion, there are a great many palaces in it; it " lies in 33 deg. of north latitude. The mountains " about it produce plenty of Mirobalans, which " from thence the eastern people call Cabuly, several sorts of drugs, and some spices, which with " the iron mines in them yield a great profit to the " inhabitants. In this town they maintain a great " trade with Tartary, the country of the Usbecks, and " the Indies. The Usbecks alone sell yearly in this " town above sixty thousand horses, and the Persians bring hither great numbers of sheep and other " cattle, by which means they are much enriched. " Wine is to be had, and provisions are cheap, tho' " the country about it is but cold and barren, unless in some places which are sheltered by the " mountains, being rendered little the more fruitful by the two rivers that water it, and have their " source in the mountains. From this province " especially come the large canes, of which they " make halberds and lances; and they have many " grounds planted with them. The inhabitants of " the city and province are most of them heathens, " and therefore in all towns and villages are many " pagoda. They reckon the months by moons, " and with great devotion celebrate the feast called " Houly, which lasts two days, at the full moon in " February. At this feast they are all clothed in a " dark red, and after they have prayed in the temple, and made their oblations, they spend the " rest of the time in dancing by companies in the " streets, Paropamisus. Paropamisus bounded on the west by Aria, on the north by Bactria, on the east by the dominions of the Mogul, on the south by Arachosia. It is called by the moderns "Sablestan", including likewise the kingdom of Candabar; its ancient inhabitants were the Bolise, Aristophili, Ambante, Pariete and Parfii, its chief cities Ortospanum and Naulibis; modern cities there are many of great note, such as Beckfabat, Asbe, * Bust strengthened with one of the finest castles in Persia, and adorned with various beautiful Karavanferas (G).

Bactria. * Bactriana or Bactria, now called Chorassan, anciently inhabited by the Sala-tare, Zariaspe, Chomatri, Comi, Acinaca, Tambyzi, Thocare, a powerful people, and several other nations of less note; it was in the first ages of the world a kingdom, and a very famous one too, in latter times it boasted a thousand cities, the chief of these were Bactra and Ebusini, both royal cities as Ptolemy tells us, Maracanda and Charracharta; its modern cities of note are also numerous, but we shall not mention them here, because we shall have occasion hereafter to consider this country more particularly.

Margiana. Margiana is bounded on the west by Hyrcania, on the north by Tartary, on the south by Aria, and on the east by Bactria, now called Estarabad. It is divided from Tartary by the river Oxus, called by the modern Persians * Ratb-khané-kurkan, and was inhabited anciently by the Derbica, the Massagetae, who came hither from Scythia, the Parni, the Dae, and the Tapurni. * Among its cities of note we may reckon Alexandria, one of the six cities of that name in Persia, afterwards called Antiochia, and after that Selucia, Nigaa, or rather Nysaa, mentioned by Ptolemy; as to modern places of note, Estarabad, Amul, and Damkau, deserve chiefly to be mentioned (H).

Hyrcania. * Hyrcania is bounded on the north by the Caspian sea, called sometimes Mare Hyrcanum from its washing the shore of this province, on the west by Media, on the south by Partbia, and on the east by Margiana, called now Mazandran, and including likewise the province of Kylan. The old inhabitants of this country were the Maxerae, Astabeni, and Cbrindi; its ancient capital was called Hyrcania as well as the province, nor has it at this distance of time much changed its name, since it is still called Hyrcan. Tambrace was likewise a considerable and very strong place at the time when Arfaces began to lay the foundation of his empire. Modern places of note are
* Ferb-abada a port seated on a navigable arm of the Caspian sea, a fine city much frequented by Russian merchants, as being not above a fortnight's sail from Astracan; Giru, Talarapset, Ciarman, and Escres, are also places of note in this country (I).

" streets, to the sound of trumpets, visiting their " friends, and eating together every tribe by itself.
" The Great Mogul's revenue from this country is " 4 or 5 millions yearly (37)." Yet after all it is far from being certain, whether Cabul has any thing to do with the ancient province of Arachosia, since Caboulistan lies beyond Candabar, and is generally reckoned part of the Mogul's dominions.

(G) The name of this province is differently written, generally Paropamisus, sometimes Parapa- misi, and again Paropamisi (38), deriving this denomination from the mountain Paropamisus, which is a part of Taurus, but was falsely stiled Caucasus, to flatter Alexander the Great, that it might be said of him that he had passed that famous ridge of mountains; a strange vanity! and scarce to be credited, if it were not supported by the authority of writers of the highest credit (39). The soil of this country in general is not over fruitful, the province being full of hills, which however, by overhadowing the valleys, render them cool and pleasant. We have observed above that the kingdom of Candabar is included within the ancient province of Parapo- misi. This little realm hath for its capital a city of the same name, which is looked upon to be the best fortified place in all this part of Asia; as the caravans do pass constantly through it in going to or coming from India, it is consequently a place rich and full of trade. Tavernier has given us an ample description of it at the end of the 5th book of his travels; as to the history of its princes and of the various fortunes it has sustained, we shall give the reader a distinct view of them, when we have deduced the Persian history as low as to the erecting of this little kingdom.

(H) Many ancient authors agree in commending the situation of this province, begirt, as it is, with high mountains watered with pleasant rivers, amongst the rest with the noble river Oxus, so famous in Greek and Latin authors. It is likewise celebrated for its fertility in vines of such an extraordinary size, that two men can scarce fathom the trunk of one of them, bearing clusters, some of which are two ca-bits long. Antiochus Soter was so much pleased with the beauty of this country, that he not only built a magnificent city therein, but even inclosed the whole plain, watered by the rivers Griai and Margue, with a wall 1500 stadia in circuit (40).
Estarabad its present capital is chiefly remarkable for the fine druggets and other excellent woollen goods manufactured there (41).

(I) Ancient writers agree in representing Hyrcania as a country fruitful in wine, wheat, figs, and all other

- a * Aria, bounded on the north by Margiana and Bactria, on the west by Parthia Aria, and Carmania the desert, on the south by Drangiana, on the east by Paropamisus, now comprehended under the province of Chorasan. It was anciently inhabited by the Nisai, Aghaveni, Musdorani, Cassirota, Obares, Elymandri, and the Borgi; its principal cities of old were Aria, seated on the river Arias, mentioned by Pliny, thought to be the same city which is still famous under the name of Heri, or Herat, rebuilt and splendidly adorned by the Sultan Heussien-Mirza, Alexandria built by Alexander, who settled a colony of Macedonians therein; Artacanda, called by * Strabo Artacama, and Bisana (K).
- b * Parthia, bounded on the west by Media, on the north by Hyrkania, on the east Parthia, by Aria, on the south by Carmania the desert, surrounded with mountains which serve for boundaries on every side at this day called Erak or Arak, and to distinguish it from Chaldea, which is likewise called Erak, this is styled Erac-Agami. The ancient Parthians are said to have been originally Celts, of whom we shall speak in the sequel; who being driven out of their own country, settled here and had this name given them, which in their own, that is in the Celtic language, signified separated, or put away. Ptolemy reckons 25 large cities within this province, and it must certainly have been very populous, since many cities and about 2000 villages are reckoned to have been destroyed by earth-quakes. Its capital was Hecatompylus, so called from its having a hundred gates, a noble and magnificent place, and so lucky as some think to remain still the capital of Persia, under the name of Hispahan, or rather Spahbawn. Modern towns of note are * Toubercan and Hamadan

other kind of fruits, here and there however interspersed with meadows and pasture lands, and in some places with the less pleasant prospect of thick woods abounding with wild beasts of almost every kind, even to a proverb. As to its present condition, nothing can be more amazing than the wide difference there is between the accounts given us by persons of credit and capacity, and who have had equal opportunities of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the things of which they discourse. The reader will the better judge of this, if he takes the trouble of comparing the following passage, extracted from the travels of the duke of Holslein's ambassadors, with what we shall hereafter give him from Sir John Chardin, in speaking of the air of Persia. "It must be confessed by all those who have travelled in these parts, that the province of Kilan is a terrestrial paradise, abounding in silk, oil, wine, rice, tobacco, lemons, oranges, pomgranates, and all sorts of other fruits; the vines (which spread themselves with their branches up the trees) being very excellent here, are as big in compals as a man in the waist. The Caspian sea, as well as the rivers belonging to this province, afford to the inhabitants prodigious quantities of fish, as their pasture grounds furnish them with great store of cattle, and their forests with venison and wild fowl, which makes me admire how John de Laet, who follows the footsteps of Johannes de Persia, could assert with so much confidence, that Alexanderum (part of the province of Kilan) lies under so cold a climate, that the fruits there seldom come to full maturity, when it is confessed by all that have any right knowledge of those parts, that among all the provinces of that vast empire, there is none that challenge prerogative for a temperate and benign air, before that of Alexanderum, which beyond all dispute produces the best fruits of all Persia. Schach Abas was so well convinced of this point, that he gave the preference in his opinion to this province before any other of all his dominions, which made him lay the foundation "of the city of Fernabath, his ordinary residence where he died (43)."

(K) It is not easy to determine whether Aria and Ariana were the same province, or if they were not, how they differed: To discuss so perplexed a question here, and to endeavour to solve what to the best geographers has appeared an inexplicable doubt, would be at once an act of vanity and rashness. It is better therefore to refer the learned reader to the authors cited at the bottom of the page, from whom he may receive all the satisfaction the nature of the thing will admit (44). In our description in the text we have followed Ptolemy exactly, as knowing no better guide, though we must at the same time allow that some things there are in his description of this province which are not easily understood, such as the several fountains from whence he derives the stream of the river Arias, and the lake which he says it forms (45). Of the thirty-five cities mentioned by that author, we cannot find above five or six mentioned by any other ancient writer, and of these the greatest part are found all together in a paragraph of Amianus Marcellinus (46). It was anciently a very populous country, though much subject to heats, and intermixed with deserts, heaths, and forests near the mountains; however where the heat of the sun is a little rebated, they have very fruitful plains, which among other things produce grapes, the wine of which bath so strong a body as to keep four-score or a hundred years without diminution of colour or flavour. The ancient city of Aria, now known by the name of Heri or Herat, is still large and populous. Sir Thomas Herbert in his travels tells us, that when he was there he found it under a governor of its own, and adds that the adjoining country abounds with roses, of which they make a water much stronger in its smell than that made in Europe. There are likewise, says another eminent traveller, admirable tapestries made in the neighbourhood of this place, such as transcend not only the tapestries of Europe, but even those that come from the rest of the Persian looms (47).

a very considerable place, and especially noted for great herds of cattle fed in its neighbourhood, producing great quantities of butter, cheese, and hides, Chachan, Com, Casbin, &c. (L) and some others less considerable.

Persis

(L) The mighty reputation which the kings of Parthia by their military virtues obtained will oblige us to speak hereafter of this province more accurately, than in this general description of the Persian dominions it was proper for us to do. As to what we have advanced concerning the origin of the Parthians, it may not be amiss to give the reader here the words of that author on whose authority we took it, bating that he has confounded the Scythians and Celtes, or mistaken the one for the other, as shall be further proved in the history of those two nations.

“The Parthians (says he) are also derived from the Scythians: for they were exiles of that country as their very name testifies. For in the Scythian language banished men are called Parthians. These in like manner with the Bactrians being by civil wars driven out of Scythia first fixed themselves by stealth in the country adjoining to Hyrcania, and afterwards obtained by force more extended dominions (48).” Though in latter ages Parthia became the mistress of her neighbours, and shared with Rome the empire of the world, yet under the ancient Persian, and even under the Macedonian monarchs it was so little considered that it remained an adjunct of Hyrcania, and was not made a particular province. It is not easy to fix the derivation of the capital of Parthia; in ancient time, Polybius says, that it was called Hecatompylos, because all the roads through the Parthian dominion centered here (49). Curtius says it was built by the Greeks, but by whom or at what time he informs us not (50). It should seem that Hecatompylos is rather a Greek interpretation of the true name of this city than the real name thereof, but then what name this was in the Parthian language we pretend not to say, it not having been recorded by any author we have met with.

In respect to what has been observed in the text of Spauhawm’s being founded on the ruins of the ancient Hecatompylos, there are many authorities to bear us out, though I do not find any certain grounds whereon to found this opinion (51). It is unanimously acknowledged, that the present city is of no great antiquity, and the two parts into which it is divided preserve the names of two contiguous towns from the junction of which it was formed. These are Heider, and Neamet-Olabi. The inhabitants of these places notwithstanding their neighbourhood bore a mortal hatred to each other which they have transmitted to their successors, who tho’ they live in the same city, shew notwithstanding on all publick occasions a warm and inveterate antipathy one towards the other. Some indeed ascribe this enmity to another cause; they say, that Heider and Neamet-Olabi are the names of two princes who reigned anciently over Persia, and who divided their subjects into two parties, which are said to have subsisted ever since, not only in Spauhawm but in all the towns of Persia. Such as say this, however own, that the city we are speaking of was composed of two distinct towns called by them Deredchte and Joubare. It may be wondered that their magistrates in the course of ages have not subdued these unnatural feuds, for which no good reason can be assigned, except that which our author intimates (52), viz. the gain which those magistrates made of their frequent quarrels and broils.

It is not very clear at what time the towns before mentioned were united, or when this city received the name by which it is now known. Some say this happened before the reign of the famous Timour Beg, corruptly called Tamerlane, who destroyed it twice. Certain it is that Spauhawm owes the glory it now possesses to the great Shâh Abas, who after the conquest of the kingdoms of Lar and Ormus charmed with the situation of this place, made it the capital of his empire between the year 1610 and 1628. There is perhaps no city in the world, the name of which is so differently written as this of the capital of Persia (53), among Europeans it is usually written Hispahan, or Ispahan, it is also called Spaha, Spachea, Aspahan, Izpaan, and Spaben. The Nubian geographer calls it Aspabawm, and the Persians themselves pronounce it, as it is written in the text Spauhawm, which orthography we have taken the freedom to introduce, since the best writers are divided on this head; Tavernier and Sir John Chardin write it Ispahan, Dr. Gemelli Carreri, Spaben, M. le Brun, Spaban; but all these authors agree that the inhabitants pronounce it in the manner we have spelled it. The etymology of the word is no less difficult to be discovered than the manner in which it should be wrote. Before the time of Tamerlane it is said to have been called Sipaban, from the prodigious number of its inhabitants; Sipe in the old Persic and Usbeque language signifying an army, and the plural thereof Sipaban, consequently signifying armies. Another derivation there is from an Arabic word signifying a battalion (54), but it is time to quit these dry enquiries for something more useful as well as more entertaining, since in the description of Persia it would be an unpardonable fault to omit an exact account of its capital, especially as we are so well furnished with noble materials in the travels of Sir Thomas Herbert, the Holstein ambassador, M. Tavernier, Sir John Chardin, Dr. Gemelli Carreri, M. le Brun, and others. Chardin and le Brun have each of them given us a copious description thereof adorned with copper plates, from whence it is as easy to form a just idea of it as of London or Paris. All who speak of Spauhawm are agreed that nothing can be more beautiful in nature than the situation thereof: it stands in a plain spacious and fertile, surrounded with mountains, which defend it alike from the sultry heats of summer, and the piercing winds of the winter season. Through this plain run several rivers which water Spauhawm, and contribute alike to its ornament and use. The first of these is the river Zenderoud, over which there are three fine bridges; this river takes its rise in the mountains of Jayabat, three days journey from the city, and is but a small stream of itself, but Abas the Great cut a channel, whereby he brought a brisker and more considerable stream to fall into this river, for the greater convenience of his favourite metropolis, by which contrivance the Zenderoud is as broad at Spauhawm in the spring as the Seine is at Paris in the winter. The united waters of these rivers are sweet, pleasant and wholesome almost beyond comparison, as indeed are all the springs which are found in the gardens belonging to the houses of Spauhawm. The river brought by Abas into the Zenderoud is called Mahmoud; we shall have occasion to speak both of it and the Zenderoud in another

Antient cities of note were Persopolis, the noble metropolis of the antient Persian empire; Axima; Marasium, called now Marazu; Teace, the capital of a district of the same name; Parfagada, a noble city built by Cyrus, and honour'd with his tomb^c. As to modern cities there are many of great note, and amongst these Schiras another place. Besides these there are two other streams which run very near each other, and are both comprehended under the name of Abcorrege: One of these is pretty considerable, its waters being at all times deep, and generally speaking equal, for which reason several attempts have been made to bring it to enter the Zenderoud. King Tahmas in the XVth century expended an excessive sum of money on a project of this sort without success. Abas the great did the same thing on another project, but without effect, which did not however discourage Abas the second from twice endeavouring at the same thing, in which likewise failing, it is now looked on as a thing impracticable (55). The extent of Spaubarun is very great, not less perhaps than twenty miles within the walls. These are of earth, poorly built, and so covered with houses and shaded with gardens, that in many places it is a difficult thing to discover them; which is a defect not peculiar to this city, but is common to most of the great towns in Persia, whence many travellers have been led to represent them as not walled at all. The Persians themselves are wont to say Spaubarun Nispe gebon, i. e. Spaubarun is half the world. It is certainly a very large and populous city, but never were there seen wider accounts than those which different authors give us of the number of souls in this city. Sir Thomas Herbert says in his time there were 200,000 (56). Sir John Chardin says that some have reckoned eleven-hundred thousand (57); but he is himself of opinion that it is not more populous than London. At a distance the city is not easily distinguished, for the streets being many of them adorned with plantanes, and every house having its garden, the whole looks like a wood. The streets in general are neither broad nor convenient, there being three great evils which attend them; the first is, that being built on common sewers, these are frequently broke up, which is very dangerous, considering that most people ride; the second is, that there are frequent wells or pits in the streets, which are no less dangerous; the third arises from the people's emptying all their ordure from the tops of their houses. This last is indeed in some measure qualified by the dryness of the air, and by its being quickly removed by the peasants, who carry it away to dung their grounds. Sir John Chardin reckons eight gates; four looking to the east and south, and four to the west and north, viz. the gate of Hassen-Abad, the gate of Joubare called also the gate of Abas, the gate of Selabmedion, the Derwaze-deulet, that is the imperial gate, the gate of Lombon, the gate of Takchi, and the gate Deradechte: he reckons also six posterns. Other authors say there are ten gates, but it is agreed that there is no difficulty of entering Spaubarun at any hour of the day or night. Whoever has a mind to make himself perfectly master of the names of the streets, and even of the houses of this vast city, may satisfy his curiosity, and be very agreeably entertained by perusing Chardin's elegant description of it, which is at once pleasant and exact, and equally fitted to amuse and to instruct the reader. The compass of this note will not allow us so much as to abridge his curious account, we shall therefore content ourselves with mentioning only the principal things in Spaubarun, as they are described by that gentleman and M. le Brun. To begin then with the royal palace, which is three quarters of a league in circumference: It has six gates, the first called Ali Kapefie, that is the gate of Ali. The second Haram Kapefie, or the gate of the Seraglio; the third Mosbag Kapefie, the gate of the kitchen; the fourth Gandag Kapefie, or the garden gate, through which none passes but the king himself, and his kapaters or eunuchs who attend his women; the fifth Ghajatganna Kapefie, or the gate of the taylor, because those belonging to his majesty have apartments near it. The sixth Ghanna Kapefie, or the gate of the secretary. The grandees of the kingdom, when they go to pay their court, generally enter the palace by the two gates first mentioned. 2. The Mey-doen, which is one of the principal ornaments of this great city. It is a grand market 710 paces long from east to west, and 210 broad from north to south. On the south side stands the royal palace, and on the north the Nachroo-choue, a building wherein are placed the king's band of musick. On one side of the Mey-doen stands the mosque called Sijg-loff-olla, so called from one of their doctors who is reputed a saint. It has a fine dome adorned with green and blue stones encrusted with gold, having on the top a pyramid, on which are placed three balls of the same metal. On the west side of the Mey-doen stands the royal mosque extremely magnificent. At some distance from thence appears the gate called Ali-Kapife, and between these stand a range of fine buildings adorned with portico's full of shops. The middle space is taken up in a great measure with tents, under which all sorts of goods are sold; but these are taken away in the evening to make room for the guards, who with their great dogs attend there all night long. In this space the mountebanks erect stages, distribute their packets, and with their antick tricks divert the populace. In the middle stands a pillar, on the summit of which the prize is placed when tournaments are celebrated here; this prize generally is either a cup of gold, or something of the same value, and none are suffered to contend for it but persons of very high quality. On the feast of Nourae, or the beginning of the year, all the tents are taken away, and every thing is made clear for the more commodious celebration of the carousals which are then performed in the presence of the king, who is seated in a kind of gallery or theatre called Tuluel, very curiously adorned on the gate of Ali. 3. Next to this noble market place we ought to mention the principal street of Spaubarun, called Chiaer-baeg, i. e. four gardens, one of the grandest ornaments of this city; the shops therein being wonderfully magnificent, and the disposition thereof in every respect convenient and pleasant. 4. From thence runs the bridge of Alawirdie-Chan over the river Zenderoud, 540 paces long, and 17 broad, built with large stones; it has three and thirty arches, some of which are founded on the sand, which is firm and stable; and through these when it is high enough, the water flows. There are ninety-three niches upon this bridge.

bridge, some shut, some open, and the corners thereof are flanked with four towers. It has a wall or parapet of brick which openings at certain distances, which afford the finest prospect in the world. In the neighbourhood of this bridge are divers pleasure-houses belonging to the king, and gardens stored with fruit-trees, and adorned with every thing else that can contribute to the making them worthy of their possessor. There are some other bridges, mosques and publick structures which deserve to be particularized if this note were not already too long: Let us conclude it then with observing that the citadel or fortress called by the Persians Tabarock is a very mean structure and in as mean a condition, its walls being in such a ruinous state, that though there are some cannon mounted upon them, yet they are never made use of from an apprehension that the walls would fall if those pieces were discharged (59).

(M) This country is very frequently mentioned in ancient authors, and therefore we are the better enabled to give an account of its former as well as present state (60). Such parts of it as lie towards the north are hilly and barren, bearing neither fruit nor corn, sufficient for the use of the inhabitants; some emeralds indeed are there found, but of no great value. On the coast of the Persian gulph the soil is as bad, though of a different nature, being hot and sandy, and producing few other trees than *Palm*s; but between these there lies a rich and pleasant region abounding with corn, fruit and cattle, and better watered, though but by small rivers, than most of the other regions within this wide empire. The entrance of this country is narrow and difficult, defended formerly against Alexander the Great by Artabazanes, a noble Persian, who gave a check to that conqueror's progress, and immortalized his name by this gallant performance in the service of his country. As to Persepolis the ancient capital of this province, and of the old empire of the Persians, Diodorus Siculus informs us, that it was the richest city in the world at the time that it was subdued by Alexander, whose soldiers taking it by storm put all the men to the sword, rifled their houses, and carried off immense quantities of gold and silver, Alexander reserving to himself the treasures in the citadel which had been amassing there from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire. If this author's computation be right, he took thence a hundred and twenty thousand talents of gold: in fine, the spoil was so great, that the neighbouring countries were constrained to furnish mules and other beasts of burthen, besides three thousand camels, to carry it off; for he had conceived such a dislike to the inhabitants of this city, that he was resolved to leave them nothing of value; and thus, as the same writer observes, Persepolis, once so famous for its magnificence, became no less remarkable for its calamity (61). Among the cities of note at this time the principal is Schiras, which, with the adjacent country, is thus described by a famous traveller, in his account of the road from Spauhaum to the Indies: "From thence (i. e. Tebel-minar) to Schiras is an hard day's journey, especially when the snow melts, for then the road is like a sea. The city of Schiras which many will have to be the ancient Cyropolis, the metropolis of the province of Persia, lies in 78 deg. 15 miles long. and 29 deg. 36 miles latitude. It is seated in a plain about four leagues in extent from north to south, and about five leagues from east to west. Upon the south-east is a lake of salt water about four leagues in compass. The soil about it is very "good and fruitful, and is famous for the best wines in Persia. The city itself has nothing handsome in it, for it looks more like a ruined town than a city. It has no walls but a bad ditch, and the houses are built of earth dried in the sun, and whitened over with lime; so that when they are well moistened with rain, they often fall down of themselves, only the college which Iman Kouli-Kan built, and some of the mosques are of brick; and the best of these mosques which is called Shah Shiraque, is kept in something better repair than ordinary out of a particular devotion; but there is nothing worth taking notice of in it. On the north-east stands an high mountain which is covered with several sorts of fruit-trees, of which there are some orange, lemons, and cypresses, and at the foot of it a stone bridge, from whence there is a street which goes in a strait line quite through the city. This street is walled on both sides, and at certain spaces are several great gates which have neat little houses built upon them, from which is a pleasant prospect into the gardens planted with rows of cypresses. The streets of Schiras are somewhat narrow; but there are some fair ones, having in the midst of them lovely canals, and basons of water very pleasant. There are a great many fair covered bazars or markets with great shops well furnished with all sorts of Indian and Turkish commodities, and every commodity has its particular bazar. In the college there are professors who have salaries for teaching theology, philosophy, and medicine, and 'tis said it has sometimes 500 students in it. There are in this city three or four glass-houses where they make great and small bottles to transport the sweet waters made in this city, as also several other vessels to put their pickled fruits in, which they send in great quantities into India, Sumatra, Batavia, and other places. They make their glass of a white stone almost as hard as marble, which they fetch from an hill four days journey from Schiras, and 'tis as clear and delicate as any glass in the world. It is wonderful how they blow their great bottles called Caraba, which are a finger thick, and hold near 30 quarts of wine. They have no manufactures at Schiras but a few coarse painted cloths, and used only by the meaner sort. On the north-west side is the king's garden called Bay-sha, which is indeed well planted with fruit-trees, roses and jasmins, but for want of order it looks like a wilderness. From this garden to the hills is a vineyard belonging to several persons two leagues long and one broad, which is watered with the river Bendimir, which is sometimes dry in summer, because it never rains there but in spring and autumn. The wines made here are the best in all Persia, but they make no great quantities of them, because they dry and pickle good part of their grapes. 'Tis an excellent stomach wine, but very strong, so that, without spoiling the taste of it, it will carry two thirds of water. They sell their wine by weight, and not by measure, and putting it in chests send a great deal yearly to Spauhaum and the Indies. The people of Schiras are very witty, and most of the best poets in Persia were born here. In an ancient mosque here lies Scheich Sadi one of the best of their poets, whom they honour as a saint. The soil about this city is very good, and produces plenty of all things. They have all the fruits

- a Sufana bounded on the north by Affyria, on the west by Chaldea, on the east Sufana by Persia, on the south by the Persian gulph, is believed by some to have been the land of Havilah, called now Chusistan, inhabited by the two nations following, viz, the Elymei, and Cossæi. Its capital was the famous city of Susa, the Sbusan of the scriptures; and Tariana, called by Ammianus Tarfiana^a. The modern towns of note are ^a Abawas, Scabar, and Ram-bormus (N).

There are two other provinces of the Persian empire, which need not be described here, because they have been treated of elsewhere already. These are ^a Curdistan, containing the ancient Affyria, and ^b Schirwan, of old styled Media. A famous modern traveller^c tells us, that there are reckoned in the dominions of Persia upwards of five hundred considerable places, walled towns and castles, about sixty thousand villages, and forty millions of souls.

- As to the air and climate of this country, considering the great extent thereof, it cannot be otherwise than varied, according to the situation of the several parts thereof, some being frozen with cold, and others burnt with heat at the same time of the year; which cannot be thought wonderful, since there is nothing in it but what is natural, and easily accounted for. The air, where-ever it is cold, is dry; but where it is extremely hot, it is sometimes moist. In order to give the reader a just notion of this, it will be necessary to observe that all along the coast of the Persian gulph, from west to east, to the very mouth of the river Indus, the heat is for four months so excessive, that even those who are born in the country are unable to bear it, but are forced to quit their houses, and retire to the mountains; so that such as travel in these parts at that season, find none in the villages, but wretched poor creatures left there to watch the effects of the rich, at the expence of their own health. The extreme heat of the air as it renders it insupportable, so it makes it also prodigiously unwholesome, strangers frequently falling sick there, and seldom escaping. The eastern provinces of Persia, from the river Indus to the borders of Tartary, are subject to great heats, but not quite so unwholesome as on the coasts of the Indian ocean and Persian gulph; but in the northern provinces, on the coast of the Caspian sea, the heat is full as great, and though attended with moisture, as unwholesome as on the coast before-mentioned. From October to May there is no country in the world more pleasant than this; but the people carry in their faces indelible marks of the malign influence of their summers, looking all of them of a faint yellow, and having neither strength nor spirits, though about the end of

" that we have, and oranges and lemons in abundance. They have vast quantities of roses, from which they draw such great plenty of rose-water that they furnish all the Indies with it. They have a great deal of corn, but give much to their horses to be eaten in the blade, because they say that for want of water it would never come to maturity. There is a great deal of opium made at Schiras, for round about the town are large fields sown with white poppies; they have also store of capers which they send into all parts (62).

(N) Sufana, as described by Ptolemy, includes the province styled Elymais (63), which Pliny also observes to have lain within the bounds of this province, and to have been sever'd from it by the river Eulæus (64). It received its name from Susa, the capital thereof, once the royal seat of the Persian kings, who were wont to reside one part of the year here, and the other at Ecbatan. Pliny says, that it was founded by Darius the son of Hystaspes (65); but this is not to be taken strictly, for certain it is that the Darius he speaks of could only be its restorer, since Strabo positively affirms, that it was built by Tithonus the father of Memnon (66); and Herodotus long before says, that Susa was called the city of Memnon (67). 'Tis difficult to determine whether in pleasantness, magnificence or strength this noble city excelled; seated it was, as sacred and prophane authors agree, on the river Ulai or Eulæus, called also the Choaspes, or rather on the confluence of these two rivers; for the Eulæus and the Choaspes meeting at Susa, run together in one stream, and are afterwards styled sometimes by one name, sometimes by the other. As to its beauty, Diodorus affirms that when Alexander seized the palace here, he took possession of the noblest mansion in the universe. Here were preserved the records of the Persian empire; and here were laid up the treasures of the kingdom, that they might be made use of on any emergency, and not be squandered away at the will of the prince. Alexander took from hence nine thousand talents of coined gold, and forty thousand talents of gold and silver bullion (68). The modern name of this celebrated city differs not much from that by which it was formerly called; the city of Sbusan being by some travellers conceived to be built at least very near the place where Susa of old stood. April they abandon their houses, and retire to the mountains, which are five and a twenty or thirty leagues from the sea. In a word, the unhealthiness of this place is so notorious, that when a person is sent to the government of Keilan, it is generally looked on as a kind of disgrace, and the people at Spaubawn are apt to ask whether he has robbed or murdered to deserve such a commission. But this moistness in the air is only in these parts, the rest of Persia enjoys a dry air, the sky being perfectly serene, and hardly so much as a cloud seen to fly therein. To say the truth, the purity of this element is the greatest blessing the inhabitants enjoy, deriving from thence a clear and florid complexion, together with an excellent habit of body. It rains seldom, but it does not follow that the heat admits of no mitigation; for in the night, though not a cloud be seen, the sky being so clear that the stars alone afford a light sufficient to travel by, yet there is a brisk wind which lasts till within an hour of the morning, and gives such a coolness to the air, that a man may dispense with a tolerable warm garment. The seasons in general, and in the middle of this kingdom, happen thus; the winter beginning in November and lasting till March, is very sharp and rude, attended with frost and snow which last falls in great flakes on the mountains, but never descends on the plains. There are mountains three days journey to the west of Spaubawn, on which the snow, lies for eight months of the year. It is said that they find there white worms as big as one's little finger, which if crushed feel colder than the snow itself. From the month of March to that of May, there are brisk winds; from May to September, the air is serene and dry, refreshed by pleasant gales which blow in the night, at evening and morning, and in September and November the winds blow as in spring. It is to be observed that in summer the nights are about ten hours long, the twilight being very short, which joined to the coolness of the night, renders the heat of the day to moderate, that this season is as supportable at Spaubawn as at Paris. The great dryness of its air exempts Persia from thunder and earthquakes. In the spring indeed there sometimes falls hail, and as the harvest is then pretty far advanced, it does a great deal of mischief. The rainbow is seldom seen in this country because there rise not there vapours sufficient to form it; but in the night there are seen rays of light shooting through the firmament, and followed, as it were, by a train of smoke. The winds, however brisk, seldom swell into storms or tempests; but on the other hand they are sometimes poisonous and infectious on the shore of the Gulph, as all travellers agree (O).

Mountains.

THERE is perhaps no country in the world, which, generally speaking, is more mountainous than Persia; but these mountains are far from being advantageous, since many of them yield neither springs nor metals, and but a few are shaded with trees. It is true, that many of them are situated on the frontiers, and serve as a

(O) As to the air and clime of Persia, we have chiefly followed the so often commended Sir John Chardin, but never without comparing what he says with what is said by other writers the most esteemed on the same subject. M. Tavernier and he both agree in reporting, that at Spaubawn it is usual to enquire whether a man has robbed or murdered who is sent to Keilan (70); which makes it the more strange, that intelligent persons, who have also been on the spot, should report directly the contrary, as has been remarked in a former note; yet after all some account may be given of this matter, nay, it is to be hoped, such a one as will satisfy even a critical reader. There are a few months in the year in which the account given by Olearius is still found strictly true; but, alas! the rest of the year the people are in a wretched condition, fly from their habitations, and scarce know where to seek for rest. It was in the best season of the year that the Hofsein ambassadors, and their retinue, crossed this country, and thus, it seems, it came to pass, that they represented it as a paradise, not suspecting that at another season of the year it could be so intolerable a place as it really is. As to the insupportable heat at Gambroon, all authors are agreed about it.

M. Tavernier says, that people often find themselves struck by a south wind in such a manner, that they cry I burn, and immediately fall down dead (71). M. le Brun says, that he was greatly incommoded therewith while he was there, and that the people assured him that the weather was at some times too excessively sultry as to melt the seals of letters. At this time the people go in their shifts, and are continually sprinkled with cold water; nay, the interpreter belonging to M. le Brun, and his company, had a well in which he passed some part of the day. Among the inconveniences consequent from this malign disposition of the air, one of the most terrible is the ingendering in the arms and legs a kind of long small worms, which are not to be withdrawn without great danger of breaking them, upon which a mortification ensues. Our author last mentioned has therefore just reason to say, that a severer punishment could not be inflicted even on a heinous offender than the leaving him in such a place as this; and yet, as he observes, there are many people of worth and good sense, who for the sake of acquiring large fortunes in a short time, hazard themselves here, and rarely live to enjoy the riches which they have got (72).

- a kind of natural Bastions or Ramparts to this vast region, and, it is very likely, contribute in other places to make the country wholesome, by sheltering the vallies under them from excessive heat. On some of these hills there is found a sort of mineral salt, which is sold very cheap^{*}. As for particular mountains we have already mentioned most of them, which deserved to be taken notice of in our description of the several provinces of Persia.

In respect to rivers it has been already observed, that except the Araxis, there is not ^{Rivers.} one navigable stream in all this country. There are indeed in most of its provinces some little rivers which run short courses, and would be more considerable than they are, if through want of water the inhabitants were not forced to divert their streams by small channels in order to fructify their grounds. An eminent traveller informs us that this was practised anciently much more than of late years, and that from hence in a great measure arises the mighty difference between the productions of ancient and modern Persia. He affirms that a Persian of great quality, and who was perfectly acquainted with this matter, informed him that within the space of 24 years, no less than fourscore channels had been choaked up and lost in the territory of Tauris[†]. As to seas, the northern provinces of the Persian empire lie on the Caspian lake or sea, of which an ample description has been already given at the beginning of this volume †. On the south the Persian shore is washed by the Indian ocean, and by the waters of the ^c Persian gulph, or gulph of Balsora, flowing out of the Indian ocean near the isle of Ormuz, from the south east to the north west, having Persia on the east, and Arabia on the west, it runs as high as the ancient Chaldea, where it receives the Euphrates and the Tigris united in one stream, and very few rivers of note besides. It may not be amiss to take notice here, that the gulph is sometimes stiled the red sea, as well as the gulph of Aden (P).

(P) As we have remarked that there is not above one navigable river in Persia, the reader need not be surprized that we say so little of the several streams which water that country; one of them we shall have occasion to speak of under the head of natural rarities, but the river Araxis deserves to be further considered on account of the mistakes which some writers have been guilty of in relation thereto, occasioned chiefly by the giving this name to two different rivers. Olearius gives us a very distinct account of this matter, which we shall therefore recite in his own words. "The 17th we cross'd the famous river of Aras (Araxes) by the means of a bridge of boats near Tzanat: Q. Curtius speaking of this river in two different passages, and in a different sense, has not a little puzzled the ancient historians and geographers, who indeed for the most part put it in the same province, but can't agree in the description of its course; for Q. Curtius in his fifth book puts it in Persia, and says its course is to the south, whereas in his seventh book he makes it pass through Media, and to disembogue itself in the Caspian sea. Strabo is no less dubious, and Raderus endeavouring to dissolve this knot by asserting that the river Medus before it is joined with Araxes, has its course to the south, and afterwards exonerates itself into the Caspian sea, is fallen into a gross mistake; for how is it to be conceived that the river should make its way through the vast mountain Taurus, which is so many leagues in breadth, and divides not only all Persia but even Asia itself, and so continue its current from Persopolis to the Caspian sea. The foundation of the whole mistake lay here, that there are two rivers which bear the name of Araxes in Persia, one in Media, the other in Persia, to the last which washes the walls of Persopolis (now called Sebiras) Q. Curtius has left the right name of Araxes, but has taken the liberty to impose the name of Tanais upon the Jaxartes, which passes through Sythia, as he has given the name of Caucasus to the eastern branch of the mountain Taurus, but with what reason I am not able to determine. That which passes through Persia is by the Persians called Bend-Emer, from a signal miracle there performed by Ali, and disembogues in the ocean in the Persian gulph; that which we speak of now, keeps its ancient name, and rises out of the mountains of Armenia behind the great Ararat, and being joined by many other rivers, the chiefest whereof are Karafu, Senki, Kerni and Arpa, it turns its channel near Karaju deep into the country, and afterwards near Ordabath falls with a great noise, which is heard two leagues thence in the plain of Mokan. Its course there is very slow, and after having received into its channel about twelve leagues above Tzanat the river Cur or Cyrus, (as large a river as itself, coming northward out of Georgia) it exonerates itself into the Caspian sea. This sufficiently refutes Ptolemy and those who follow his footsteps, who make the Araxes and the Cyrus fall by two different channels into the Caspian sea. Thus they would have Cyropolis called Scamachie, which Maginus would infer from the degrees of latitude given by Ptolemy. But according to that supposition these two rivers must not be placed above but below the city towards the south, it being certain that when we travelled in those parts, we found the conflux of those two rivers at 39 deg. 54 min. and the city of Scamachie at 40 deg. 50 min. which is 13 leagues thence and under another meridian. Neither is there any other river within 19 days journey of Scamachie on either side, which bears the least comparison in bigness or otherwise to this river (73). We should not have introduced so long a quotation if it had not been a matter of consequence, as will appear in the subsequent history, where this account will serve to rectify some points which have hitherto confounded even the best authors. It is but just to add, that M. Le Brun in his travels confirms precisely what this author has said (74). As to the Persian gulph it

Soil.

AFTER this account of mountains and rivers, and after affirming that there are many of the former, and but a very few to be met with of the latter, the reader will easily comprehend, that the soil cannot be generally rich or fruitful, but on the contrary sandy and barren; however, here and there, there are vallies fruitful and pleasant enough. The earth in some places is sandy and stony, in others heavy and hard, but every where so dry that if it be not watered it produces nothing, no not so much as grass. Rain is not wholly wanting here, but it rains however very seldom, and not enough to keep even the best lands in a condition of bearing corn or fruits without farther help; and even in the winter the beams of the sun are so brisk and so drying, that the rain has not much effect. But wherever the soil is sufficiently moistened, either by natural or artificial means, it bears wonderfully well. If it should be asked, how this description suits with what we find recorded in ancient authors, of the luxury and profuseness of the Persians, such a question is capable of various answers; for first, Persia is not now near so much peopled as it was heretofore, and consequently there cannot be so great a number of labourers, which must induce barrenness in a country, where the soil produces nothing without cultivation. Again, it may be said, that the alteration of government, and of religion, has in a great measure produced this difference, the ancient kings of Persia were mild and beneficent to their subjects, whereas the Mohammedan princes have been always proud, over-bearing and cruel. According to the opinion of the Persees or Gaurs it was meritorious to render barren fields fertile, whereas the Persians like other Mohammedans are satisfied with what good things they find, and will not give themselves the trouble to labour for posterity. They look upon life as a great road, wherein men ought to content themselves with such things as fall into their way, and in consequence of such notions, there is no great wonder that sterility has ensued, and that modern travellers do not speak in the same language with Quintus Curtius, Ammianus Marcellinus, and other such like authors. Sir John Chardin therefore delivers it as his opinion, that if the Turks were to inhabit this country, it would grow still poorer than it is; whereas if the Armenians or the Persees were to become masters thereof, it would from their industry quickly recover its ancient fertility. It must not however be imagined that there is not still at this day the same variety in point of fruitfulness among the provinces of this extensive country as heretofore. Media, Iberia, Hyrcania, Bactria, are still in a great measure what they were, and surpass most of the other provinces in their productions. As along the coasts of the Persian gulph the soil is still more barren, cattle less plenty, and every thing in a worse condition than any where else. Before we part with this subject, we think proper to remark, that the Persians are so sensible of the snow's fertilizing their land, that they examine very curiously how high it rises every year, there being a stone on the top of a mountain four leagues from Spawbaun, between two and three foot high, over which when once the snow rises, the Peasant who first brings the news to court, receives a considerable reward for his pains. But it is now time for us to speak more particularly of the productions of the earth.

Trees.

AMONG the trees that are most common in Persia, we may reckon the plantane, the willow, the fir and cornil called by the Arabs Seder, and by the Persians Conar, from whence probably came the Latin Cornus, and thence our cornil. It is a received opinion in this country that the plantane has a singular virtue against the plague, and it is not to be questioned, but that the antients stiled it as well as the gulph of Arabia the Red-sea; what renders it most remarkable now, is its pearl-fishery, of which no doubt the reader will expect some account. They fish for them in many places of the gulph, but especially about the islands of Baba in. This fishery produces a prodigious quantity of pearl, Sir John Chardin says, more than a million in a year: the largest weigh generally from ten to twelve grains, and if by chance any are taken of greater weight, the fishers are directed under great penalties to bring them to the king's exchequer, which it is however believed they do not always do (75). This fishing is performed by divers, who being carried down to the bottom of the sea in five fathom water by the weight of a stone fixed to their toes, they pick up there all the shells they can see as fast as they can, and put them into a basket they carry down with them on purpose, and then rise up again to take breath, and refresh themselves with a pipe of tobacco; those who are in the boat pull up the baskets, the divers work but from one to eleven, and from eight to three. They fish for pearls from the end of June to the end of September; besides the pearl oylers, they catch others in this sea excellent for eating (76).

- a all other infectious diseases, and they positively assert that there has been no contagion at Spaubawn, since the planting vast numbers of these trees in its streets and gardens. The tree which bears Gall Nuts grows in several parts of Persia, but particularly in Kourestan. The trees which produce Gums, Mastick, and Incense, are found very commonly in most parts of Persia, that however which bears Incense is particularly found in Carmania the desert, resembling in form a large Pear-Tree; Turpentine Trees, and Almond Trees, with the wild Chestnut are common. The tree which bears Manna is also frequent, but there are also several sorts of Manna in Persia, the best is of a yellowish colour, and of a large grain, it comes from Nichapour, which is a part of Bactria. There is another sort called the Manna of
- b Tamarisk because it is gathered from that tree, all the different sorts of Manna are used to the same end in medicine, and are therefore gathered with like care, being esteemed a valuable commodity, as well as one easily disposed of. The herbs in Persia, especially such as are aromatick, exceed those of other countries; roots, pulse, ^{Herbs and} and salleting are larger, fairer, and better tasted than elsewhere, and are eaten raw without danger of their creating any crudities in the stomach; most of our European roots, greens, &c. flourish here in great perfection, and they would certainly be more cultivated than they are, if, as in Europe, men were by religion restrained from eating flesh. As to drugs Persia produces as many as any country in Asia; for besides Manna, Cassia, Sena, the Nux Vomica, are common in most provinces, gum ammoniac called by the Persians Ouscioc, is found in abundance on the confines of Parthia towards the South. Rhubarb grows commonly in Corasson or the ancient Sogdiana, but it is not so good as that which is brought from the country of the Tartars between the Caspian Sea and China, and for this reason they endeavour to confound both under the name of Rivend-tchini, i. e. rhubarb of China; in Corasson they eat it commonly as we do beet roots. The poppy of Persia is esteemed the finest in the world, not only in respect to its beauty, but because its juice is by far stronger than the juice of the same plant elsewhere. The Persians call this juice Afioun, from whence our word opium; the best is made in the territory of Lingan, six miles from Spaubawn, though others prefer the Afioun of Cazeron, which is towards the
- d Persian gulph, as being less apt to ingender crudities in the stomach. Tobacco grows all over Persia, especially about Hammadan, which is the ancient Susa, and in Courdestan near the Persian gulph, which is esteemed the finest; the Persians themselves however, who are great smokers, prefer what they call Tambacou Inglest or English tobacco to their own; but Sir John Chardin says, that this tobacco which was no other than brazil, being kept at too high a price, the demand for it is now quite lost. Saffron is cultivated in many provinces, and especially about the Caspian sea and in the neighbourhood of Hammadan, and is much esteemed. The plant called by the Persians Hillet, and supposed to be the lazerpithium or silphium of Dioscorides from whence drops the Assa-fatida, is common every where, but abounds most
- e in Sogdiana: there are two sorts of it, the white and black, the white is the least esteemed, because less strong than the black; this juice or gum is all over the east called King, and the Indians consume vast quantities of it, mixing it in all their ragouts and sauces; it has by far the strongest odour of any thing hitherto discovered, since places where it has been kept will retain its scent for whole years, and the vessels in which it is transported to India are so thoroughly impregnated therewith, that no other goods can be put on board them without acquiring its scent, however carefully packed. Mummy of both sorts is a great Persian commodity; the first is taken from embalmed bodies, or such as are dried in the sands, the other is a precious gum which distils out of a rock; there are two mines or sources
- f of it in Persia, the one in Carmania the desert in the country of Sar, which is the best, for it is certain that there is no bruise, cut, or wound, which a dram of this precious gum will not cure in twenty-four hours. The other mine is in Corasson, the rocks from whence it distils belong to the king, and all that issues from thence is for his use; they are inclosed with walls, the gates of which are secured by the seals of the five principal officers in the province, once a year each mine is opened in their presence, and all the mummy that is then found or at least the greatest part of it is sent to the king's treasure. It derives its name from the Persian word Moum, which signifies literally an unguent, the Hebrews and the Arabs make use of the same term, the Persians say, that the prophet Daniel taught them the use and preparation of mummy. Cotton is very common over all Persia, but there is a tree which somewhat

- a transplant it root by root into fields which are well watered, otherwise it would never attain that perfection in which we find it there, since it is foster, sooner boiled, and more delicious to the taste than the same grain in any other part of the world: it may be its taste is in some measure heightened by a practice they make use of to give it a glossy whiteness, viz. by cleansing it after its being beaten out of the husks with a mixture of flour and salt *.

- There are in Persia all the sorts of flowers which are to be found in Europe, but Flowers. they are not equally common in all the provinces of this empire; for there are fewer sorts of them, and fewer of each sort in the southern provinces than in the rest, excessive heat being more destructive to them than frost; which is the reason that in India they have fewer than in Persia, and that those in Persia have more vivid and delightful colours than those either in India or Europe. Hyrcania in this respect excels the rest of Persia as much as Persia does other countries; there are there whole forests of oranges, the jessamin single and double; and there all the flowers we have in Europe, with many we have not, are profusely scattered by nature. The most eastern part of this country, which is called Mazenderan, is a perfect parterre; from September to the end of April the whole country is covered with flowers as with a carpet, and the fruits are then in their best season, the excessive heat and the malignity of the air destroying them in succeeding months. Towards Media, and on the northern frontiers of Arabia, the fields are adorned with tulips, anemonies, ranunculus's, of the brightest red, all springing of themselves; in other places, as in the neighbourhood of Spaubann, jonquils grow wild and subsist all the winter. To recite all that is said on this subject by such as have travelled through Persia would not be agreeable to the design of this work; let us content ourselves therefore with adding that roses of uncommon beauty are frequent here, the bushes bearing often three different coloured roses on one branch, viz. yellow, yellow and black, and red. Pietro della Valle, who reports that the Persians are wont to make use of art in dying their roots, in order to give different colours to their flowers, is in this circumstance contradicted by Sir John Chardin, who affirms on the contrary, that their gardeners have little or no skill, and that the nobility of Persia are so far from being curious in such things, that they take no pleasure in walking in their gardens, however beautifully and richly adorned, but content themselves with singling out some spot or other on their first coming in, where they sit down, and smoke, and drink coffee as long as they remain there (Q) *.

- METALS of all sorts are frequently found in Persia, especially of late years; and Metals or minerals since the reign of Abas the Great, who was at immense pains to search them out, and to make the best use of mines wherever they were discovered, iron, copper, and lead are become very common, but of gold and silver there are no mines open at present. As Persia is a very mountainous country, and as those mountains produce sulphur and salt-petre, if the inhabitants of this country were as active and inquisitive as amongst us, there is no doubt to be made, but that gold and silver both might be found in some part or other of the Persian dominions. In the country of Guendamar, near a town called Kervan, four leagues from Spaubann, there is a silver mine, which has been formerly wrought, but through the scarcity of wood its produce has never equalled its expence; and it is therefore become a proverb in Persia to signify an unlucky undertaking, that it is like the mine of Kervan, where they lay out ten to receive none. There were also silver mines in Kirman and Mazenderan, but they are now abandoned for the same reason. Mines of iron are found in Hyrcania, in the northern Media, in Parthia and Babylonia, but it is not so pliable as some European iron. This may be owing indeed to the unskillfulness of their workmen, and may be likewise the reason why the steel that is made from it (and which some of our travellers have improperly

(Q) Though there is scarce a province in Persia which does not produce wine, yet the wine of some provinces is much more esteemed than the wine of others; but Schiras wine is universally allowed to be the very best in Persia, inasmuch that it is a common proverb there, that to live happily one must eat the bread of Perse and drink the wine of Schiras. They do not make use in this country of wooden vessels, as we do, for keeping their wine, but preserve it in earthen vessels, which they take care to have well glazed; otherwise they would imbibit a great quantity of the wine. Their pots are set in very handsome order in their caves or cellars, these too being as much adorned as such places will admit of, and have always a reservoir of water in the middle of them, thus upon occasion people may be entertained there, and drink wine out of the reach of the sun (77).

called their mines of steel, there being no mines of that metal, but it being all done by art) is there so brittle and useless, Sir John Chardin tells us, it is not worth above sixpence a pound; and is so full of sulphur, that if you cast some of the filings of it into the fire, they make a report as loud as gunpowder. It is fine and close, and almost as hard as a diamond, but on the other hand it is so very brittle that the Persian artists, who know not how to correct this, are able to make no very valuable instruments thereof. It has moreover this ill quality, that by giving it too fierce a fire it may be burnt and destroyed. The Persians call both this and the steel of the Indies steel of Damascus, in order to distinguish it from European steel. Copper is found in greatest quantity at Sary in the mountains of Mazanderan; there are also mines of it in Bactriana, and towards Casbin; it is however poor and not fit for use till minged with either Swedish copper or copper of Japan. The lead mines are towards Kirman and Yesde. Minerals are also found in Persia in vast abundance; sulphur and salt-petre are taken out of the mountain of Damavend, which separates Hyrcania from Parthia. Salt is made here by nature without the least assistance of art, as are also sulphur and alom. There are two sorts of salt in Persia, that found on the earth and rock salt; nothing is more common than to meet in this country with plains sometimes ten leagues in length covered intirely with salt, and others covered in like manner with sulphur or alom. In Media and at Spaubawn the salt is dug out of mines, and is as hard and firm as fire-stone, nay in Carmania the desert, the people actually use it as such in building their houses. Marble, free-stone, and slate, are found in great plenty about Hamadan; the marble is of four colours, white, or statuary, black, read and black, and white and black; the best is found about Tauris, it is almost as transparent as crystal; its colour is white mingled with a pale green, but it is so soft that some have questioned whether it be real marble or a kind of alabaster. In the neighbourhood of the same city they find azure, but it is not so good as that of Tartary. In Hyrcania, and especially in Mazanderan, the Petroleum or Naptbe is met with, of two sorts, black and white, but the richest mine in Persia is the Turquoise; there are two sorts of this precious stone, one at Nichapour in Corasson, and the other in Pbirous-Cou, or mount Pbirous, between Hyrcania and Parthia, four leagues journey from the Caspian sea. This mountain derives its name from an ancient king of Persia, who subdued this country, and in whose time the mine was found: nay, the very stones carry his name also, for though we call them Turquoises because they come from the true and proper Turkey, yet throughout the east they are styled Firouze. They have of late years discovered another mine of the same sort of stones, but they are by no means so valuable, but are distinguished amongst us by the name of Turquoises of the new rock, to distinguish them from those taken out of the ancient mines, which belong entirely to the king, who after selecting the most beautiful, sells the rest to merchants. The reason why these late discovered turquoises are less valued than those of the old mines, is because they are less beautiful in their colour, and what colour they have is not thoroughly fixed, but grows paler by degrees, and at last wears almost quite out.

and wild.

THE horses of Persia are the most beautiful in the east, though they are not so much esteemed as those of Arabia; they are higher than our saddle-horses, and their limbs as well proportioned as can be imagined. Though there are great numbers of them, yet considering how much they are used, and the great demand made for them by the subjects of the Mogul on one side, and of the Grand Signior on the other, they are held at a very great price, a fine horse being sometimes valued at a thousand crowns. Next to horses we may reckon mules which are much esteemed here, and are very fine, and next to these we may justly place asses; of which they have in this country two sorts, the first bred in Persia, heavy and doctish as asses in other countries are; the other originally of an Arabian breed, the most docile and useful creature of its kind in the world; these are used wholly for the saddle, and are very frequently adorned with fine accoutrements because of their easy manner of going, and their being very sure footed. The clergy that have not great benefices, affect to ride much on these Arabian asses, and on this account these animals also are kept at a high rate, a good ass being worth at Spaubawn twenty-five pistoles. Camels are numerous in Persia, and so much in esteem that they are called Kechty-krouch-konion, i. e. the ships of the land, because the inland trade is carried on by the help of these camels, as the foreign by ships: To describe this animal particularly here, would be im-

- proper, since they are rather more in use among the Arabians than among the Persians; we shall only observe, that the Persians make use of three sorts, a smaller, a larger, and a swifter kind of camel, than are common elsewhere. The largest camels will travel with a load of twelve or thirteen hundred weight, the swifter kind of camel is called Revatrie, i. e. the goer, because they trot as fast as a horse can gallop. It is worthy of notice, that these creatures are managed entirely by the voice, those who direct them making use of a kind of song, and according as they keep a quicker or slower time, the camel moves brisker, or at its ordinary pace. As beef is little eat in Persia, their oxen are generally employed in ploughing and other sorts of labour. Hogs are no where bred in Persia, if we except a province
- b or two on the borders of the Caspian sea; sheep and deer are very common throughout all Persia; and as to the former Sir John Chardin assures us, that he has seen flocks of them which covered four or five leagues of pasturage. As to beasts of chase, they are not so common here as in most of the countries of Europe, because it is generally speaking devoid of woods; but in Hyrkania, which abounds with them, deer of all sorts and gazels are found in great abundance. The gazel is a creature common throughout the east, and so many of them have been brought into Europe, that they need not any description. As to wild beasts, there are not a great number of them in this country, for the same reason which has been before assigned with respect to beasts of chase, except in Hyrkania, where in the woods there are great numbers of
- c lions, bears, tygers, leopards, &c. so that the ancients spoke very truly of Hyrkania, when they called it the country of wild beasts. One thing however is to be remarked, that neither here, nor throughout all Persia, are there any wolves; but the chakal or jackal (a creature which makes a terrible noise, and which many good writers take for the Hyena,) are common every where, and have this peculiar quality, that they tear up dead bodies, if the graves are not carefully watched. As to insects the dryness of the air prevents our having much to say about them; there are however in some provinces prodigious numbers of locusts or grass-hoppers, which come in such clouds as to obscure the air. In certain parts of the Persian dominions they have large black scorpions, so venomous, that such as are stung by them die in
- d a few hours; in others they have lizards frightfully ugly, which are an ell long, and as thick as a large toad, their skins being as hard and tough as that of the sea-dog; they are said to attack and kill men sometimes, but that may be doubted. Among the reptiles of this country there is a long worm called by the inhabitants Hazar-pey, i. e. thousand feet; its whole body is stuck with small feet, with which it runs prodigiously fast; it is longer and smaller than a caterpillar, and its bite is dangerous, and even mortal, if it get into the ear.

THERE are in Persia all the several sorts of fowl which we have in Europe, but not Birds. in such quantities, because they are chiefly bred and taken care of by the Armenians, who have frequently capons fattened to such a degree, that they are killed for nothing but their grease. There are however vast numbers of pigeons wild and tame; and as e the dung of pigeons is the best manure for melons, they keep great stocks of them all over the kingdom, so that it may be on just grounds presumed, that no country in the world has such a number of pigeon-houses; they are most of them six times as large as any we have in Europe, they are built of brick and plaistered on the outside, every thing being disposed in the most convenient manner possible for the preservation of these creatures. In the neighbourhood of Spaubawn they reckon more than three thousand of these pigeon-houses, chiefly erected for the preservation of the dung, which is sold for about three-pence the dozen pound. The Persians call this manure Tchalgous, i. e. enlivening. It is a great diversion among the lower sort of people in town and country to catch pigeons, though it be forbidden; for this

f purpose they have pigeons so taught, that flying in one flock, they surround such wild ones as they find in a field and bring them back with them to their masters. People who follow this trade are called kefter-perron, or pigeon-stealers, and there are some so addicted to it, that they will lie out whole days in the very depth of winter, in order to carry on this foolish and wicked employment; for under the notion of wild pigeons they take every body's pigeons they can find. The partridges of this country are the largest and finest in the world, being generally of the size of our fowls. As to water-fowl, they have geese, ducks, cranes, herons, and many other sorts, but they are more plenty in the northern than the southern provinces. The singing-birds here are of the same kinds we have in Europe; the nightingale is heard there all the year, but chiefly in the spring; martlets, which learn whatever words are taught them; and another bird of the same size, called by them Noura, which chatters continually, and repeats very pleasantly whatever it hears. As to birds of a larger size, the most considerable is the Pelican called by the Persians Tacab, i. e. water-carrier, and also Misc, i. e. sheep, because it is as large as one of those animals. Its feathers are white and soft like those of a goose, its head is much larger in proportion than its body, and its beak from eighteen to twenty inches long, and as thick as one's arm; under this beak it has a sack or pouch, in which it preserves a quantity of water for moistening its food; it usually rests this long beak on its back, which would otherwise incommode it very much. The Pelican lives chiefly upon fish, in taking of which it shews an admirable contrivance, by placing its beak in such a manner under the water, as to catch them as it were in a net; when it opens its throat, the passage is large enough for a lamb. It is called the water-carrier, because in Arabia and other places where water is hard to be had, it makes its nest at a great distance from streams or wells, foreseeing as is supposed that there will be less danger of disturbance in such places, though this situation obliges the bird to fly sometimes two days journey for a supply of water for her young, which she brings in the sack before-mentioned; and hence the fables of the ancients of the pelican's tearing her breast open to feed her young. There are in Persia various birds of prey, and in the mountains about fifteen or twenty leagues from Scbiras, there are some of the largest and finest in the world. The people take great pains in teaching them to fly at game, and the king has generally eight hundred of these birds, each of which has a person to attend it. The Persian lords are likewise great lovers of falconry, and even the common people practise it much; for neither this, nor shooting, nor hunting with dogs, is forbid to the meanest man in Persia.

Fishes.

We shall divide the fishes of Persia into fresh and salt water fish: As to the first they are not very plenty, because there are no great rivers in Persia; however there are of these three kinds, those of the lakes, of the rivers, and of the kerises or subterraneous passages. Those in the lakes are carps and shads; the river fish is chiefly barbel, which is also the sort of fish commonly met with in the subterraneous channels; they are very large, but they are by no means good, and their eggs are particularly dangerous, which is generally attributed to their never beholding the light of the sun, but living altogether in these foul and cold streams. There are in the river at Spaubawn a great number of crabs, which crawl up the trees, and live night and day under the leaves whence they are taken, and are esteemed a very delicious food. As to sea-fish, no country is better served; the Caspian sea, as we have seen before, contains very fine fish on one side, and the Persian gulph on the other is believed to have more fish in it than any other sea in the world. They fish there twice a day morning and evening, and such fish as are not sold by ten o'clock in the morning, or before sun-set, are thrown back into the sea. There are taken on the coasts of this gulph a sort of fish, for which they have no particular name, its flesh is of a red colour, very delicious, and some of them weigh two or three hundred pounds; its flesh will take salt like beef, but it cannot be kept long, because the salt in this country is very corrosive: for which reason, whenever they intend to keep either fish or flesh, the inhabitants content themselves with drying it either in the air, or by the help of smoke.

Natural rarities.

As we have now examined the productions of the air, earth, and waters of Persia, we are next to speak of the natural rarities which are to be found in this large empire. Of these the first we are to take notice of is a certain poisonous shrub or plant, called by the Arabians Ghork, by the Persians Gulhad-Samour, i. e. the wind-poisoning flower; it flowers like the thistle, and has pods filled with a thick white liquor of the consistence of cream, sharp and sour to the taste; it is affirmed, that where-ever the wind blows over a number of these plants, as it does frequently in Carmania the desert, it thence contracts a poisonous quality, which proves mortal to the oxen that respire it. There is likewise another shrub in the same country, viz. Carmania the desert, singularly noxious; it is called Kerzihre, i. e. asses poison, be-

- a cause those creatures are apt to eat of its fruit which generally proves mortal. The very water that washes its roots is likewise held to be poisonous, the trunk of this shrub is as large as one's leg, and it sometimes grows to the height of six feet; its bark is remarkably rough, and of a bright green colour, its leaves perfectly round with a rising point in the middle; it bears a sort of flower exactly resembling the rose, of a kind of flesh-colour, whence it is apprehended that the Greeks called it Rhododendron; the Arabians as well as the Persians call it the gall or poison of an ass. Some are of opinion, that it is the Nerium of our herbalists, and the same plant that is called in French Rosage *. The goats both wild and tame which feed on the shore of the Persian gulph afford the bezoar so much esteemed in medicine, but the very best is taken out of these creatures, in the province of Corasson or Bactria, and is thought to excel by far the bezoar of Golebonda, and the rest of the Indies. The naturalists in Persia give it as their opinion, that the more dry and hard the food is, on which the animal lives, the more salutiferous and efficacious the bezoar found in it proves. Corasson and the coasts of the Persian gulph are allowed to produce the dryest herbage in the world. It is no fable, what has been reported, as to the formation of bezoar, for there is generally found in the core of such stones one or more pebbles, a little sprig of bramble or other bush, sometimes a thorn-stick, &c. round which by a continual accession of matter the ball of bezoar conglomerates and is formed; this stone is here found in sheep as well as in goats, but it is not so in the Indies. Its very name is of oriental extract, and should be wrote Pe-zaor, i. e. poison-killing, for the eastern people held it heretofore to be one of the strongest counter-poisons; quacks however were those who commended it most, and its virtues were rather taken upon trust, than supported by experience: the number of the credulous, however, being great, raised its price very high: but of late years it is much sunk in its reputation, as well in the east as in Europe, it being now regarded chiefly as a sudorifick, and even reckoned no very extraordinary thing in that class. The manner of giving it in Persia, is thus, they either scrape or powder it, and put about two or three grains for a dose into a spoonful of rose-water. While it was dear, it was often counterfeited, and the materials made use of to this end, were, generally speaking, some alexipharmic powders mingled with resin and Spanish wax. It may not be amiss to observe, that the polish which bezoar stones generally have is artificial; for when they are taken out of the creature, their outside is of a rough greenish hue, just as the stone appears within †. The Abmelec, or eater of locusts, or grasshoppers, is a bird which deserves to be described better perhaps than most others of which travellers have given us an account, because the facts relating to it are not only strange in themselves, but are also so well and so distinctly attested, that however surprizing they may seem, we cannot but afford them our belief. The food of this creature is the locust, or grasshopper. It is of the size of an ordinary hen, its feathers black, its wings large, and its flesh of a greyish colour; they fly generally in great flocks, as the starlings are wont to do with us: but the thing which renders these birds wonderful is, that they are so fond of the water of a certain fountain in Corasson, or Bactria, that wherever that water is carried, they follow; on which account it is carefully preserved; for wherever the locusts fall, the Armenian priests who are provided with this water, bring a quantity of it, and place it in jars, or pour it into little channels in the fields, the next day whole troops of these birds arrive, and quickly deliver the people from the locust ‡, (R). The river Mahmoudker, i. e. Mahmoud the deaf, is

(R) Sir John Chardin has given us in his description of Persia, the following passage from an ancient (77) traveller in relation to this bird. "In Cyprus, about the time that the corn was ripe for the sickle, the earth produced such a quantity of cavaletes, or locusts, that they obscured sometimes the splendor of the sun. Where-ever these came they burnt and eat up all; for this there was no remedy, since as fast as they were destroyed the earth produced more: God however raised them up a means for their deliverance, which happened thus. In

Persia, near the city of Cuerch, there is a fountain of water, which has a wonderful property of destroying these insects: for a pitcher full of this, being carried in the open air, without passing through house or vault, and being set on a high place, certain birds which follow it, and fly and cry after the men who carry it from the fountain, come to the place where it is fixed; these birds are red and black, and fly in great flocks together like starlings, the Turks and Persians call them Musulmans. These birds no sooner came to Cyprus, but they destroyed the locusts

a surprizing natural rarity. At some distance from Spaubaw there is a range of rocks, plain and equal for a considerable space, except that here and there they have openings, like the embrasures in bastions, through which the winds pass, with surprizing velocity; through these rocks falls the river we mentioned into a noble bason, partly wrought by the water itself, and partly formed by art. As one ascends the mountain, certain natural chinks shew the water at the bottom of it, like a sleeping lake covered with rocks and mountains; it is thought to be of unfathomable depth, and when stones are thrown into it, they cause a most amazing noise, which almost deafen the hearers, whence this river is supposed to derive its name. After its descent from the bason before-mentioned, it rould along the plain, till at last it falls into the river Zenderoud. Some are of opinion that this river does not derive its water from springs, but from the snow on the tops of the mountains, which melting gradually, distills through the chinks of the rocks into the vast lake before-mentioned; and this they think is in some measure proved from the acrimonious taste of these waters, which is however lost after it joins the Zenderoud. Under a certain mountain called Tagte-Rustan, so called from the ruins of a building on the summit thereof, supposed to have been erected by the great Rustan, there runs a grotto, which deserves a place among the natural rarities of Persia. From the top of this grot there distills through the whole mountain, in two or three places, fresh water, which falling into proper receptacles, forms two or three distinct streams, which issue from thence to water the plain. In this grotto, about the beginning of April, a great number of Indians assemble to celebrate a feast in honour of a hermit or saint of theirs, who lived long here, and the whole cave is full of shreds or rags of people's garments, who have come hither to be cured of their diseases, and have found relief. Not far from hence there is a mountain, where they pick up a sort of blue stones, very hard and shining, which they make use of in adorning their mosques, tombs, and other publick buildings. We might add a multitude of other articles of this nature, if the description of Persia did not already begin to swell under our hands; though we have used all the caution in our power to prevent its containing any thing, which may not be useful and instructive, as well as entertaining to the reader. Let us now pass to the artificial rarities of the country.

A description of Persepolis.

To begin then with the ancient Persepolis, the ruins of which still testify the truth of what some ancient writers have affirmed, that in the times of its prosperity it was one of the most august cities in the world; nay, when we consider all things, when we compare the descriptions of travellers one with another; when we consider what is recorded of other cities, and what is still to be seen of those that were most famed; we shall be induced to confess that the Persian empire in all its grandeur could boast of nothing more glorious, nor have left any thing more astonishing to posterity, than the venerable ruins of this city. Should we pretend to give a full account of these noble remains, it would extend much farther than it is reasonable this chapter should go. We are writing a geographical description of Persia; in which we ought to omit nothing that may give the reader a distinct idea of this country, or which may give him a clearer light into the history which is to follow; but in doing this we are to remember that this geographical description, and this history are but sections of a far greater work, and therefore we must have a care that it be of a piece, and not resemble a statue, with the body and arms of a man, and the hands or even the fingers of a giant. For this reason we shall contract the many and diffusive accounts, which have been given us, by eye-witnesses of these noble remains, into such a compass as may give our readers an idea of their grandeur and magnificence, and shew them at the same time, how useful fine draughts and exact relations of them may be towards settling many points of ancient history, and giving us just notions of the spirit and genius of that nation, whose metropolis this was. In doing this we shall not involve ourselves in the disputes of travellers, or attempt a to decide whether Le Brun be in the right in his criticisms, or whether they be not rather invectives against Sir John Chardin; our business is to give a succinct prospect of what has been said of Persepolis, by authors antient and modern; and as to what is controverted among them, we shall give it in a note (S) to avoid both the swelling of the description, and interrupting the thread of the history.

(S) In order to give the reader some idea of the difficulty we have met with in collecting this article, we shall here give him a concise account of such authors as have written on this subject, and whose descriptions we have perused. The first is Sir Thomas Herbert, who in his travels has a long relation not only of what himself saw at Persepolis, but of what has been said by ancient authors on that head. He has given us also a specimen of the characters which are to be seen in the tablets belonging to these ruins, which agrees perfectly well with the drawings of Le Brun. He has likewise inserted his conjectures concerning these antiquities which are neither improbable nor injudicious, but as we shall be obliged to mention most of these from M. Le Brun, it would be unnecessary to trouble the reader with them here; we shall therefore only add to what we have already said concerning the remarks of our worthy countryman, that the draught which he has left us of these ruins is far from being exact, and can hardly be said to bear any resemblance to the accurate descriptions of Chardin and Le Brun (79). Prior in point of time to Sir Thomas Herbert, but far inferior to him in every other respect, is the concise description of these remains of antiquity given by our countryman M. Gessy Duckett, who in 1568 passed this way. The main of what he says may be reduced to this, that Persepolis was 12 miles broad from gate to gate; whether this deserves any credit, or whether it was the slip of an inadvertent author, or credulous relator, we will not pretend to determine (80). John Albert de Mandelslo, who observed these ruins in the year 1638, has left us a better description of them than most of the writers who went before him; and as there is something very plain and instructive in what he writes on this subject, it cannot but be agreeable to the reader to compare what he has said with what we have recorded in the text. "The foundation or ground-work on which this vast structure was erected is raised 22 geometrical feet, having at each of its four corners a pair of stairs of white marble of 95 steps, so flat and broad that twelve horses may go up conveniently together in a breast. Before you come to the main body of the structure itself you pass through a square, where you see the ruins of a wall and the remainders of two great gates, each of which have a horse harnessed and saddled after a very antick manner, carved on one side, and on the other two creatures resembling a horse, except that they have wings on each side, and the head is crowned, and like that of a lion. On the one side you see the ruins of 19 pillars of white and black marble, the least of which are 8, and some 10 ells high without the bases; but whether they had been intended for the support of some large hall, or were built purely in the air, is not to be distinguished at this time." The same author speaking of some unintelligible characters engraven on a square pillar tells us, there are twelve lines of them so well proportioned and nicely engraven, that they carry not in them the least mark of barbarity, but seem rather to have been wrought in a nice well-judging age; he complains of the rudeness of the inhabitants, who without the least regard to so noble and so ancient a palace, carry away large quantities of marble and other stone for the quicker dispatch of common and private buildings; he also deplores the want of perfect draughts of these wonderful fragments of the ancient magnificence of Persia (81). Sir John Chardin in the year 1674, took a view of these ruins, examined them with great care and pains, as appears from the large and particular account of them inserted in the second volume of his travels. It is true, M. Le Brun who stayed there a much longer time than he, and who had consequently a better opportunity of studying and describing what he saw than this gentleman had, attacks him very warmly on the head of his description; but whoever reads with calmness and candour, what Sir John Chardin with great perspicuity and without the least affectation of learning has delivered on this head, will be of opinion, that how much nicer and more exact soever the descriptions of M. Le Brun may be, yet both the narration and the cuts of Sir John Chardin are excellent in their kind, and serve to communicate to us a multitude of useful particulars which are no where else recorded (82). Dr. Gemelli Carreri has written a whole chapter under the title of a description of the palace of Darius, and the ruins of the ancient Persepolis; it is concise as all his descriptions are, and the observations he makes are short and weighty, according to the custom of Italian authors. He has illustrated his narration with a few prints which serve to give a competent idea of the magnificence of this ancient city, and to demonstrate the conformity there is between the several accounts of these ruins contained in the works of intelligent writers (83). M. Le Brun, who arrogates to himself a great superiority over all the writers on this subject, spent a long time in surveying, measuring, and drawing views of these fragments of antiquity, he has taken up upwards of thirty folio pages in describing what he saw, and remarking on the intentions of those who designed the several figures, of which he has given us copies which are certainly very useful, as well as very beautiful ornaments to his book. Besides, he has written a long dissertation on the difference between his account and that of Sir John Chardin, wherein the antiquities of Persepolis are farther explained (84). From these materials a very copious description and very curious observations might have been thrown together, especially when we consider, that besides travellers, several other writers of great eminence have left us their thoughts on this subject; such as the most judicious doctor Hyde in his learned book of the religion of the ancient Persians, wherein he has explained with great knowledge and learning some of the enigmatical figures represented on the walls and pillars of these ancient buildings (85); but it is our business to hint only where the curious and inquisitive reader may be informed at large, as to all the extraordinary particulars relating to these monuments of the Persian glory, our description being no more than the outlines of a regular dissertation on this head, for which what has been said above, and what we have advanced in this note, will, we hope, serve for a sufficient apology.

Persepolis.

THE plain in which this famous city stood, is one of the finest in Perfia, and indeed in all the east; its length is eighteen or nineteen leagues, its breadth in some places two, in others four, and in some places six; it is watered by the great river Araxis or Bendemir, and by a multitude of rivulets besides. Within the compass of this plain, there are between a thousand and fifteen hundred villages, without reckoning those in the mountains, all adorned with pleasant gardens, and planted with shady trees. The entrance of this plain on the west side has received as much grandeur from nature, as the city it covers could do from industry or art. It consists of a range of mountains steep and high, four leagues in length, and about two miles broad, forming two flat banks, with a rising terrace in the middle, the summit of which is perfectly plain, and even all of native rock. In this there are such openings, and the terraces are so fine, and so even, that one would be tempted to think the whole the work of art, if the great extent, and prodigious elevation thereof did not convince one, that it is a wonder too great for aught but nature to produce. Undoubtedly these banks were the very places where the advanced guards from Persepolis took post, and from which Alexander found it so difficult to dislodge them. One cannot from hence descry the ruins of the city, because the banks are too high to be overlooked, but one can perceive on every side the ruins of walls and of edifices, which heretofore adorned the range of mountains, of which we are speaking. On the west and on the north this city is defended in the like manner, so that considering the height, and evenness of these banks, one may safely say with a late ingenious traveller, that there is not in the world a place so fortified by nature. The ancient palace of the kings of Perfia, called by the inhabitants Cbil-minar, i. e. forty columns, is situated at the foot of the mountain; the walls of this stately building are still standing on three sides, and it has the mountain on the east. The front is in extent six hundred paces from north to south, and three hundred and ninety from east to west, quite to the rock, without any stair-case on that side; till one comes to the mountain, where, by the help of certain ragged stones, it is easy to get to the lowest part of the wall, where it is not above eighteen feet seven inches in height, and in some places not so high. This curtain is four hundred and ten paces in length, on the north, and one and twenty foot high in some places; but in most thirty quite to the mountain, where there is still a corner of wall, and in the middle an entrance, by which one may get up to the top by broken pieces of the rock. One finds also before the west side several rocks, which rise towards the north, till they are even with the wall, appearing like a kind of platform, extending eighty paces before it. It seems as if there had been a stair-case anciently on this side, and some buildings without this curtain, the rocks being very smooth in many places. On the top of this edifice there is a platform of 400 paces, which extends itself in the middle of the front-wall, quite to the mountain. Along this wall, and all the three sides, runs a pavement of two stones joined together, which fill up a space eight foot broad; part of these stones are eight, nine, and ten feet long, and six in breadth, but the rest are smaller. The principal stair-case is not placed in the middle of the front, but much nearer the north end than the south, being six hundred paces distant from this, and only a hundred and sixty-five from that; this stair-case is composed of two flights of stairs, forty-two feet asunder at bottom. Its depth is 25 feet 7 inches to the wall, from whence proceed the steps, which are as long as the stair-case is deep, within two inches; each of these steps is four inches high, and fourteen in breadth, so that nothing can be more commodious. There are fifty-five on the north side, and fifty-three on the south, but the latter are not so whole as the former. Ascending thus high, one meets with a landing-place, fifty one feet four inches broad, proportioned exactly to the breadth of the stair-case; the stones of this landing place are of an extraordinary size. The two flights of the stair-case are separated by the wall of the front, but in such a manner, that they decline from each other from the bottom up to the middle, and incline towards each other from the middle to the top, which has a wonderful effect on the eye, and suits perfectly well with that magnificence which reigns throughout every other part of the building.

The upper part of this stair-case consists of 48 steps on one side, and on the other, some of which are damaged, notwithstanding they are cut in the rock. At the a top of these there is another landing-place, between the flights of stairs 75 feet broad, paved with great stones, some 13 or 14 feet long, and 7 or 8 broad¹, (T).

To speak now of what is to be seen when one is amongst these ruins: The first thing that salutes the eye in a strait line, 42 feet distant from the front, before described, are two great porticoes and two columns. The pavement of the first is much damaged by time, and the second is sunk five feet lower than the former, these porticoes are 22 feet 4 inches in depth, and 13 feet 4 inches in breadth. One sees in the front of each pilaster a large figure cut in bas-relief, 22 feet in length b from its fore to its hind feet, and 14 feet and a half high. The heads of these animals are entirely destroyed; their breast and feet project from the pilaster, and their bodies are very much damaged. Those of the first portico front towards the stair-case, and those of the second, which have wings on their bodies, towards the mountains. One sees above the pilasters certain characters, but they are so small and so high that one can make nothing of them. The first portico is still 39 feet high, and the second 28. The bases of the pilasters are five feet two inches high. The animals are not carved out of one stone, but out of three joined together for that purpose. In the present condition, it is not easy to decide what they were intended for, though many authors have given the world their conjectures, of which c the reader will find some account in the authors cited at the bottom of the page, and will judge for himself which is the most probable of those taken notice of there.

THE two columns which stand between the two porticoes are more entire than any other part of the ruins. They are of white marble fluted, and wonderfully beautiful, that is as to their chapiters and other ornaments, for as to their bases they are covered with earth; they are 26 feet from the first portico, and 56 from the second, 14 feet in circumference, and 54 high. There were certainly two others between these and the last portico, of which there are still some remains, great pieces of marble lying about half buried in the earth: 52 feet from the last mentioned portico southward, there is a large cistern cut out of a whole stone 20 d feet long, 17 feet 5 inches broad, and three feet above the earth. From thence to the wall there is a space of about 150 paces, in which one finds nothing but broken pieces of stone, and the remains of a column which appears to have been

(T) In the description in our text we have adhered pretty closely to M. Le Brun, and that for many reasons; first, because his profession, which was that of a painter, rendered him more capable of describing minutely, and of designing exactly all the wonders of Persepolis, than any former traveller whom either business or curiosity had led that way. Secondly, this gentleman had, as we have more than once hinted, determined with himself to consider more attentively, and to examine more nicely these relics of Persian architecture than any other author had done. Thirdly, he had not only all the authors we have mentioned in our last note, but Mons. Chardin's curious plans to direct him, and it may be to correct him in his notions on this head. Fourthly, there is such an agreement, in material points at least, between his accounts and those of Chardin, notwithstanding his affecting on all occasions to quarrel with that gentleman's sentiments, that we did not think it at all necessary to trouble the reader with any particulars of a dispute of no great importance in itself, and which, though prosecuted with warmth, seems to have been commenced out of vanity. It may not be amiss to observe here, that the fame of these ruins has for the two or three last centuries been so great, and the desires of the Virtuosi to see exact plans of them so strong, that some have ventured to publish the conceptions of their own brains for the antiquities of Chelminar. Such was the view of Persepolis sent into the world by Sebastiano Serlio an Italian architect, in his account noble buildings ancient and modern, since therein are found just forty columns adorned with chapiters of the Corinthian order, which no traveller ever had the happiness to see. In the voyages of John Struts, amongst a multitude of other strange things, and temerarious assertions, we have a wild description of these ruins and a wilder plan, said in the title-page of the book to be drawn by the author's own hand, which if it were, he certainly drew by guess; since it is not only quite different from the plans published by others, but contains also such palpable mistakes, as never could have been committed by an eye-witness of these noble works, especially one who looked on them with a design of describing them to the rest of mankind. We are not however to fancy that where-ever travellers differ in their accounts, one of them must be mistaken. M. Le Brun and Sir John Chardin vary very little in what they say relating to the pillars yet standing at Persepolis; but there is a considerable difference on this head between what they say, and what we find recorded in the writings of Figueras, Herbert, and Thevenot, all of whom testify nearly to the same point. Time and the barbarity of the modern Persians, who make very little account of these ruins, have made considerable alterations since they were first described; and it is very probable that whoever, sees them twenty years hence, will find them not exactly answerable to what is said of them by M. Le Brun (86).

unfluted, and therein differs from all the rest; it is about two feet in compass, and 12 and a half long: from it to the mountain, there is nothing to be met with but wild heaps of broken stones.

TURNING from these porticoes to the south, one sees at the distance of 172 feet another stair-case, consisting of two flights of steps in the same manner as the former, one fronting towards the east, the other towards the west. The wall is still about six feet 7 inches high, but in the middle 'tis almost entirely ruined. The extent is 83 feet of the east flight of stairs, and it is evident enough from the lowermost of them, that they were adorned with figures in bas-relief. On the top of the stair-case are still some foliages visible, with figures in bas-relief, of a lion tearing a bull, larger than the life. The stair-case is half buried in earth, and one sees certain small figures on the wall, on both sides. The west flight consists of 28 steps; the other having suffered more by the accession of the earth, has now but 18, each 17 feet long, three inches high, 14 inches and a half broad. There are many of these towards the top broken, and two or three entirely destroyed, though cut out of the rock. At the end of the landing-place, from this stair-case, there is another front, whereon there are three rows of small figures, one above another; of the first row there is nothing now to be seen but the parts below the girdle, the rest being destroyed by time; the second row, which is the best preserved, has notwithstanding received great injuries; and as to the third, there is nothing now above ground but their heads. These figures are two feet nine inches high, and the wall, of which there is still five feet 3 inches above ground, is 98 feet in extent from the first step to its left corner, where there is another stair-case, the steps of which are exactly of the same size with those before described. From what remains of the inner wall it appears that it also was covered with small figures. At the end of the stair-case there is another wall which extends 90 feet beyond the landing-place; the corner turns a little to the south, and goes no farther, because the earth is there at the same height; returning to the west flight of steps of the stair-case before mentioned, we meet with a wall 45 feet in length, beyond the bottom of the stair-case, with an interval of 67 feet to the west front. This side like the former is adorned with three rows of figures, and a lion tearing a bull or an ass, with a horn in its forehead; between these animals and the figures there is a square space filled with characters, of which the highest are quite effaced; the figures on this side are fairer than on the other, the ground being less elevated; there are 25 steps here. The wall from the stair-case westward extends quite to the front; but beyond the stair-case, is unadorned with figures.

AT the step of the stair-case, between the two flights of stairs there is an open place, paved with very large stones between the stair-case and the first columns, which are 22 feet and two inches distant; they stand in two rows, each consisting of six columns, of which there is only one remaining entire, eight bases and some broken pieces of the rest. There are six rows of columns 70 feet eight inches distant from these, each row consisting of six columns. These thirty-six columns are 22 feet two inches one from the other, as the former are. There are still seven of these entire, with the bases of all the rest, but much broken and defaced. Of those which are left, there is one of the first row, one of the second, two of the third, and one of each of the rest. One finds between these columns, and those before mentioned, several large stones, heretofore part of some subterraneous building. Seventy feet eight inches west from these columns towards the front of the stair-case, there were 12 columns more disposed in two rows, of which there are only five remaining. The bases of seven more are visible, and the ground is covered with ruins of those which are decayed. One can discover however among the fragments of those ornaments, which lie half interred, that each of these columns was surmounted by the figure of a camel kneeling. To the south of these columns stands the edifice most elevated of any in these ruins; but it is necessary for us to observe, that on the east there are still discernable two rows of columns, consisting of six each, of which the bases of four or five remain still above the earth, and in all appearance these were opposed to other rows of columns which were in the front. Advancing still towards the mountain, one finds the ruins of many buildings, consisting of porticoes, passages and windows, the porticoes are adorned with figures, and these ruins take up a great space; but to return to the edifice spoken of before, it extends 118 feet from the columns, and the wall of its front is yet five feet seven inches high, composed a of one row of stones only; some of which are eight feet broad, extending from east to west 113 feet. There is before the edifice certain stone foundations still visible, but what end they served cannot be guessed, since there is no stair-case on this side. This wall is adorned with no sort of ornament as the rest are; there are, however, The view of Persepolis. two stair-cases, one on the north, the other on the south side, but almost entirely ruined; on the landing-place, however, we still discover the remains of porticoes which an earthquake threw down; all the rest of the building, which consists of great and little porticoes, is entirely ruined, the ground covered with the fragments is about 147 feet in length, and nearly square. On the north there are two porticoes, and three niches or windows walled up, and on the south a portico and four windows

b open. There are two other porticoes which are not covered on the west, with two openings; and a third to the east with three niches or windows walled up. Six of these openings are without cornices, and there remains but half a one to the east. One sees under the two porticoes on the north, on each side, the figure of a man, and two women from the knees upwards, their legs being covered with earth; under one of those on the west side, there is the figure of a man fighting a bull, which has a horn in its forehead, the man holds this with his left hand, and strikes a poignard into the belly of the beast with his right; on the other side the figures are the same, excepting only that the man holds the horn with his right hand, and stabs the beast with his left. In the second portico there is the figure of a man holding a beast, resembling either a deer or a lion, by such a horn in its forehead, c and with wings upon its back. Under the portico to the north, the same figures are visible, only the man combats here a true lion, which he holds by the mane; these figures have half their legs buried under the earth. On both sides of the portico towards the south, there is the figure of a man with an ornament on his head; resembling a crown, attended by two women, one of whom holds an umbrella over his head, and the other has some ensign of authority in her hand. Above these figures are three niches full of characters. On the pilasters of the first portico, which are out of their places, and lie near the flight of stairs last mentioned, there are two men each armed with a lance, which the one holds with both hands, the other only in his left; one of these only is entire. Behind this edifice one finds d another of much the same kind, except that it is 38 feet longer, with a niche or window blocked up, and another open, with two stones standing up, one on the right hand, the other on the left: Of these, that towards the east is broken, the other towards the west is still 28 feet high. There are on the top of this stone three niches or tablets full of characters, and a fourth below, which seems to have been cut after the rest. The like inscriptions are seen in the niches or windows before-mentioned, each tablet consisting of one stone only. To the south there are two flights of stairs, the one to the east, the other to the west; but of these only five steps are remaining; and on the wings as well as on the wall which separates them, there are still visible some small figures and foliages, though half buried in the e ground: a hundred feet from thence to the south, the last ruins are found of these edifices, consisting chiefly of porticoes and enclosed spaces of ground, and between these two heaps of ruins another stair-case, of which only seven steps are remaining, which serve however to shew that anciently they were adorned with figures and foliages. On the east side of this stair-case there are certain subterraneous passages in which the inhabitants imagine great treasures are hid. M. Le Brun entered them; as several travellers have done before, but was quickly obliged to return without making any discoveries, the passages being so narrow, and so dark and moist, that it was impossible to go far. However, even these experiments are sufficient to shew that the conjectures of the inhabitants are very indifferently founded, since from f the structure of these vaults, we are left to judge they were rather intended for carrying off water, or some such like purpose, than to be made the repositories of royal treasures*.

THERE would be no difficulty in following M. Le Brun's description much farther, or in adding thereto his particular delineations of the pillars, niches and figures spoken of before; but for the reasons already given we shall stop here, that we may have room to say somewhat as to the conjectures of the learned, concerning these remains of the magnificence of ancient times. The processions delineated on the walls, the vases in the hands of many of the figures, the several tablets of unknown characters, and the many hieroglyphical representations which are still seen in these ruins, have led some great men into an opinion that this ancient structure was a temple, dedicated to the deities worshiped in Perfia. Others, with much greater reason, have delivered it as their sentiment, that these ruins are the sad remains of the ancient palace of Persepolis, which they think strongly confirm'd by the descriptions left us by ancient authors of that noble pile of building. As to the figures in procession, those who adhere to this notion, say that they represent a birth-day feast of one of the Persian emperors, when his courtiers were wont to bring him presents; as to the inscriptions they are, generally speaking, illegible even by the Persees or ancient Persians themselves, so that hardly any argument can be deduced from them. The hieroglyphicks might as well serve for ornaments to a palace as to a temple, and, it may be, were some of the spoils of Egypt, brought thence by Cambyzes's army, led by Smerdis the Magian. However this be, certain it is, that the habits of these figures agree perfectly well with the descriptions of the old Median and Persian robes, as they are recorded in Greek writers. On the whole therefore, it may be presumed that whatever this edifice was, it was actually erected by the kings of the first race, since nothing seen there carries the aspect of latter times; but whether Cyrus was the founder, or whether this palace was begun by Darius, and finished by Xerxes, is a point not easily, if at all, to be determined. From a view of the figures visible on the walls, pillars, &c. it seems probable to us, that they were enigmatical representations, at least for the most part, of the course of the heavenly bodies, and of the effects produced by them; but of this and of the reasons which incline us to believe it, we shall take occasion to discourse more largely in our section on the religion of the ancient Persians. The traditions of the natives in respect to these antiquities are generally represented by travellers, as confused, extravagant, and not to be depended on. This may however in some measure arise from their want of acquaintance with oriental history, which is not always so fabulous and incoherent as it is represented to be; there are and there ever will be a wide difference between the narrative style of these eastern nations, and that in use amongst us; but as we shall elsewhere shew, even in respect to these ruins, certainty may be deduced as well from the hyperbolical relations of eastern writers, as from the artful memoirs of some of our western historians (V).

At

(V) In this note we intend to examine, in as short a compass as possible, what ancient writers have delivered concerning the city and palace of Persepolis; to begin then with what is said by Diodorus Siculus (87) on this subject. He relates that after passing the river Araxes, Alexander met with near 800 Greeks, most of them old men, some having their hands, others their feet, some their ears, and some their noses cut off, which had been done by the Persians of that district. This sight so incensed him, especially against the inhabitants of Persepolis, that he called, says our author, the Macedonians together and told them, "That Persepolis, the metropolis of Perfia, of all the cities of Asia, had done most mischief to the Grecians, and therefore he gave it up to the plunder and spoil of the soldiers, except the king's palace. This was the richest city of any under the sun, and for many ages all the private houses were full of all sorts of wealth, and whatever was desirable. The Macedonians therefore forcing into the city put all the men to the sword, and rifled and carried away every man's goods and estate, amongst which was abundance of rich and costly furniture, and ornaments of all sorts. From this place were hurried away here and there vast quantities of silver and gold, great numbers of rich garments, some of purple, others embroidered with gold, all which became a plentiful prey to the ravenous soldiers. And thus the royal seat of the Persians, once famous throughout the world, was now exposed to scorn and contempt, and rifled from top to bottom. For though every place was full of rich spoil, yet the covetousness of the Macedonians was insatiably still thirsting after more. And "they were so eager in plundering, that they "fought one with another with drawn swords,

"and many who were conceived to have got a "greater share than the rest, were killed in the quar"rel. Some things that were of extraordinary value
"they divided with their swords, and each took "a share; others in rage cut off the hands of such "as laid hold upon a thing that was in dispute.
"They first ravished the women as they were in "their jewels and rich attire, and then sold them
"for slaves. So that by how much Persepolis ex"celled all the other cities in glory and worldly fel"licity, by so much more was the measure of their "misery and calamity. Then Alexander seized upon "all the treasures in the citadel, which was a vast "quantity of gold and silver, of the publick reve"nues that had been heaping up, and deposited there
"from the time of Cyrus, the first king of Perfia,
"to that day. For there was found an hundred "and twenty thousand talents, reckoning the gold
"after the rate of silver. Part of this treasure he "took for the use of the war, and ordered ano"ther part of it to be treasured up at Susa. To "this purpose, he ordered that a multitude of mules
"both for draught and carriage, and three thousand "camels with pack-saddles should be brought out "of Babylon, Mesopotamia, and Susa, and with these
"he conveyed all the treasures to the several places
"he had appointed. For by reason of his great "hatred to the inhabitants, he was resolved not to "trust them with any thing, but utterly to ruin
"and destroy Persepolis: Of whose palace in regard
"of its stately structure, we conceive it will not "be impertinent if we say something. This stately "fabrick or citadel was surrounded with a treble
"wall:

At two leagues distance from these ruins, there is a famous mountain seated between two of the finest plains in the world, and which is called by the inhabitants by several names; sometimes they stile it Kabreston-Gauron, i. e. the sepulchres of the Gaurs; sometimes Nachs Rustan the pictures of Rustan, and sometimes Takt-Rustan, i. e. the throne of Rustan. This Rustan, as we have observed before, is the Hercules of the east, or rather the Amadis, for the stories they tell of him are alike fabulous and romantick. Our business however is not with them, but with the mountain, which is an entire rock, harder and capable of a better polish than marble; it is levelled by art, its sides are perfectly perpendicular, so that it looks like a large wall, and upon it there are figures represented in half-relief with great skill and beauty. The first of these, which is about the height of a pike from the ground, represents b a combat between two knights; mounted on horseback; each of them having an iron mace in his left hand. He on the right has a bonnet on his head, and holds out in his right hand a large ring of iron, of which the other knight seems to take hold with his right hand; at the foot of each of their horses lies a man grovelling on the ground. All these figures, as well of horses as of men, are gigantick; and as to the meaning of the piece, if we trust tradition and the Persian poets, it is thus to be understood; they say, that one of these cavaliers was Rustan or Rustem the son of Sal the white, the son of Sam, the son of Noraman King of the Indies; the second Rustan or Rustem, the son of Tadmour king of Persia: These two princes are said to have been engaged in long and bloody wars, and at last to have agreed to determine their
 c quarrels by a combat. The manner in which this was to be performed was thus: one extended a ring of iron in his right hand, which the other laid hold of, it being previously agreed that whoever could wrench from the other this iron ring, should be esteemed the conqueror, and should be obeyed for the future by him who lost it; they say too, that the king of Persia, who is the person represented by the figure, having a long beard, vanquished the king of the Indies in this engagement. Besides this ring and mace, these combatants have iron bullets hanging by chains at the sides of their horses, which it is to be supposed they let fly at each other in the same manner as peasants sometimes fight with their flails. Joining to this figure there is another, wherein the men are represented as of a less stature than in that before described, d viz. not above seven foot high; there is a person represented in the middle of the piece armed from head to foot, leaning on a naked sabre with both his hands; he is

" wall: the first was sixteen cubits high, adorned " with many sumptuous buildings, and lofty tur" rets. The second was like to the first, but as high
 " again. The third was drawn like a quadrant four " square, sixty cubits high, all of the hardest mar" ble, and so cemented as to continue to the latest " time. On the four sides are brazen gates, near " to which there are curtains or palliades of the " same metal, twenty cubits high, these were raised
 " as well to strike the beholder with terror, as the " strengthening and security of the place. On the " east side of the citadel about four hundred feet " distant stood a mount called the royal mount, for
 " here are all the sepulchres of the kings, many " apartments and little cells, being cut into the " midst of the rock; into which cells there is made
 " no direct passage, but the coffins with the dead " bodies are by machines hoisted up and so let down " into these vaults. In this citadel were many state" ly lodgings both for the king and his soldiers, of " excellent workmanship, and treasury chambers
 " most commodiously contrived for the laying up " of money. Here Alexander made a sumptuous " feast for the entertainment of his friends, in com" memoration of his victory, and offered magnifi" cent sacrifices to the gods. At this feast were " entertained whores who prostituted their bodies
 " for hire, where the cups went so high, and the " reins so let loose to drunkenness and debauchery, " that many were both drunk and mad. Among " the rest there was at that time a cutesman called " Thais an Athenian, that said Alexander would per" form the most glorious act of any that ever he " had done, if while he was feasting with them he " would burn the palace, and so the glory and re" nown of Persia might be said to be brought to " nothing in a moment by the hands of women.

 " This spreading abroad, and coming to the ears of " the young men (who commonly make little use " of reason when drunk is in their heads) one of them
 " presently cried out, Come on, bring us fire-brands,
 " and so incites the rest to fire the citadel, to revenge
 " that impiety the Persians had committed in de" stroying the temples of the Grecians. At this
 " others with joy set up a shout, but said, that so " brave an exploit belonged only to Alexander to " perform. The king started up at these words " embraced the motion, upon which as many as " were present left their cups and leaped from the " table, and said that they would now celebrate a " victorious festival to Bacchus. Hereupon multitudes " of firebrands were presently got together, and all " the women that played upon musical instruments
 " which were at the feast were called for, and then " the king with songs, pipes and flutes, bravely led " the way to this noble expedition contrived and " managed by this whore, Thais, who next after " the king, threw the first fire-brand into the pa" lace. This precedent was presently followed by " the rest, so that in a very short time, the whole
 " fabrick by the violence of the fire was consumed
 " to ashes." We have transcribed this long pas" sage to avoid a multitude of quotations, since se" veral authors have either copied Diodorus, or the " authors made use of by him. Plutarch in his " life of Alexander, gives us an account of this trans" action, little different from that which we have said to be the same king of the Indies before mentioned, because his bonnet and a beard resemble those of the figure so called in the former piece; he turns his head towards five men, who have their bodies hid by the wall from the shoulders downwards, perhaps to signify that they are prisoners; behind him, there are three other men in the same position, who seem to be making signs to the five over-against them. As to this representation it is impossible to say any thing with certainty, since we are furnished with no lights by ancient writers, and the traditions of the modern Persians on such subjects are little to be depended on; though, to say the truth, the common people in Persia are rather more modest than elsewhere, for when they are asked about the meaning of these figures, they generally say God knows. Nay, their men of learning content themselves with affirming, that they relate to the ancient heroes of their country, without pretending to enter into particulars. At a hundred and twenty paces distance from this figure one finds the first tomb, but before one comes thither, one sees here and there on the mountains several tablets, which seem to have been designed for such representations as have been before described; whence it is evident, that the works on this mountain have been left unfinished. One sees before this first tomb the representation of a combat between a knight and a giant; but as to the meaning thereof we know as little as of that of the former. At sixty paces from this tomb there is another, thirty paces from thence a third, and at the distance of a hundred paces a fourth, which is the last. There are two inscriptions near the third tomb, one fifteen lines in length, in the character made use of in the inscriptions at the palace of Persepolis. There are many other curious representations carved on this mountain, some perfectly whole and sound, others much defaced either through the injuries of time and weather, or the brutal zeal of the Mohammedans, who make it a piece of high merit to destroy all kind of imagery. We shall not detain the reader any longer on so obscure a subject, since our descriptions, however prolix, would never afford him the same idea he may gain at once by looking on the prints inserted in their travels by Chardin and *Le Brun. Besides, should we run into a long discourse on the conjectures which have been or may be made in relation to these sepulchres, it would certainly lead us far out of our road, and turn very little to the improvement of the reader. On the whole therefore, we shall content ourselves with saying, that these stupendous just seen; indeed he speaks less confidently of the story of Thais than Diodorus does, whence some have suspected the truth of it, and whether Thais had any concern therein or no. Arrian says, that Alexander seized at Passagardon on the money which had been laid up there by Cyrus, and then adds, "The royal palace of the Persian monarchs, he burnt, much against the will of Parmenio, who intreated him to leave it untouched, not only because it was improper to spoil and destroy what he had gained by his valour, but that he would thereby dishonour the Asiatics, and render them less benevolent to him, for they would then suppose that he would not keep Asia in his possession, but abandon it as soon as it was conquered and laid waste. To which Alexander made answer, that he was resolved to revenge the ancient injuries his country had received from the Persians, who when they arrived with their army in Greece subverted Athens, burnt their temples, and committed many other barbarous devastations there. But this, in my opinion, seems to have been no prudent or politic action of Alexander, and was no revenge upon the Persians at all (88)". Strabo speaks very concisely on this subject, his words are these; "Alexander destroyed the temple of Persepolis in revenge of the injuries done the Greeks, whose cities and temples the Persians had formerly destroyed with fire and sword (89)". Curtius has nothing singular upon this head except the following observation: "The city of Persepolis was so far from being rebuilt, that unless the river Araxes ran near it, there had not been the least sign left to have guessed where it stood; that it was situated twenty stadia from the banks of this river, the inhabitants rather believe than know with any certainty (90)". In this point however, he seems to have been mistaken; for first, he is the only author who says that Persepolis was ruined. Diodorus says indeed that it was plundered; but as to burning and destroying, what he relates is confined to the palace; besides, after the death of Alexander, he informs us, that Antigonus taking five thousand talents of silver out of the treasury at Ecubana marched into Persia, and after twenty days arrived at its capital Persepolis (91). Arrian also speaks of this city as still standing after the destruction of the palace; and if we may believe the author of the book of Maccabees, it continued a great and noble city. What he says on this subject, stands thus in our translation: "About that time came Antiochus with dishonour out of the country of Persia. For he had entered the city called Persepolis, and went about to rob the temple, and to hold the city, whereupon the multitude running to defend themselves with their weapons put them to flight; and so it happened, that Antiochus being put to flight of the inhabitants, returned with shame (92). In the first book of Maccabees, there is still a more extraordinary passage in respect to the point before us. "About that time, says the author, king Antiochus travelling a monuments of ancient magnificence are sufficient to fill us with high ideas of the wisdom and magnificent genius of the ancient Persians before superstition and slavery took place (X).

"velling through the high countries, heard say, that Elymais in the country of Persia, was a city greatly renowned for riches, silver and gold. And that there was in it a very rich temple, wherein were coverings of gold, and breast-plates and shields which Alexander, son of Philip, the Macedonian king, who reigned first among the Grecians, had left there. Wherefore he came and fought to take the city, and to spoil it; but he was not able, because they of the city having had warning thereof, rose up against him in battle: so he fled, and departed thence with great heaviness, and returned to Babylon (93)". That by Elymais the author meant Persepolis, we have all the reason in the world to believe, since we are certain, that the latter is only a Greek appellation, and not the true name of the city; nor in all probability did the Greeks ever commit the Persian name thereof to writing. One thing we will venture to observe here, which has not hitherto been remarked by any author; it is this; Persepolis, or Persepolis signifies in Greek no more than the city of the Persians. Elymais signifies the same thing, as also Pbars-abad, which Sir John Chardin conjectures to be its ancient name in the Persic tongue; hence therefore, we may with probability conclude, that its most ancient name was Elymais, derived from the ancient name of Persia, Elam, that in process of time when Persia was called Pbars, this city might be stiled Pbars-abad, and that the Greeks might translate either of these appellations into their own language by the word Persepolis; all which we submit to the curious and inquisitive reader.

(X) Besides the tombs spoken of above, there are two near the ruins of the palace of Persepolis which Sir John Chardin says, appeared to him the most curious remnants of antiquity which he beheld there. They are about six hundred paces from the columns, and in order to reach them, there is a necessity of climbing three hundred paces up the rock. These monuments are cut and hollowed into the rock. The one is on the north over against the great stair-case of the palace, the front is 72 feet broad, and its height about 130. The platform is square, and like the landing-place of a stair-case; it is about 4 feet deep, and is cut into the mountain: On each side there are six figures finely cut, and exactly resembling those in the procession; in the wall of the palace there are four columns fronting the spectator, and exactly in the middle there appears a door, but it is only the figure of a door cut in the rock, and does not seem ever to have been designed for a passage into any cavity behind it. Over this there is another fine piece of workmanship full of figures; and on the summit there appears an altar with fire burning on it, and a reverend person holding a bow in his hand, kneeling on a kind of ascent, over against it, as if at his devotions. In the corner of the piece there is a round figure which seems to represent the sun, and in the middle, as if in the air, there is a small figure of the same person whom we see praying below as if he were ascending into the heavens. The other tomb which is on the east side, differs not much from this which we have described. It has four columns, a false door, and has over it an altar with fire, and a prince or high-priest praying before it with the other decorations mentioned before. Some inconsiderable differences there are in the architecture and in the disposition of things in this second tomb, but we do not think them of consequence enough to be mentioned here. Sir John Chardin tells us, that the inhabitants of the country say that Nembroth or Nimrod was buried in the first, and Dar-ab, i. e. Darius, in the second; but he thinks the first fabulous. And as to Darius being interred here, he owns it is in some measure warranted by the account given us by Arrian, that Alexander caused the body of that unfortunate prince to be embalmed, and to be sent to his mother, that she might cause it to be interred in the tomb of his ancestors. It is allowed, that the sepulchres of the kings of Persia were at Ecbatana in Media, and that at the time Alexander sent back Darius's body that country was new conquered and in great disorder. It is not impossible therefore, that his mother might cause him to be buried at Persepolis. However, Sir John Chardin himself is of opinion that the thing was otherwise, and that these tombs were actually closed up before the reign of Darius (94). It is the firm opinion of the present inhabitants of Persia, that in these tombs and also in those described in the text, there are concealed great quantities of treasure and valuable effects. It must be said in favour of this vulgar notion, that it has antiquity on its side, since we know that when Alexander conquered this country, it was expected that mighty sums would be found in the tomb of Cyrus (95). As on the other hand, we know that Josephus (96) reports a mighty mass of money to have been laid up in the sepulchre of David. As we are writing here a note only, and not a dissertation, we shall not expatiate further upon this subject, but confine ourselves to these very tombs in the mountain of Nachs-Rusem. It is certain, that not only the common people, but people of distinction and learning, concur in believing that there are vast heaps of gold, silver, and other rich things, contained in these repositories of the dead, but at the same time they affirm this, they assert with equal confidence that the passages within the tombs form a kind of labyrinth, out of which a man can hardly ever find his way, so that many have perished in search of these supposed mountains of riches. Sir John Chardin however, tells us a story of one who actually found and bore away some of these shining spoils; he had it from the mouth of the bailiff of Mirkas-koun, a little town in the neighbourhood of Persepolis. This man informed him that about two hundred years before, when this country was subject to a prince of its own, who resided at Schiras, the farmer of his revenues in this part of the country, having dissipated his effects, and not being in a condition to pay what was due from him to the royal treasury, was under the greatest dejection of mind, on the receipt of a message from the grand vizier, threatening him in case he did not make a speedy payment, with a cruel death, and with the selling of his wife and children for slaves in order to produce the sum he was in arrears. The poor man distracted with fear, and knowing not which way to turn him, thought of laying violent hands on himself; but checking this thought on a sudden, he said in his mind, Why should I destroy myself without attempting to throw off this load of misfortunes by some other means? in yon house of idols (so the Mohammedans call all places where there are figures in bas-relief) every body agrees there are vast quantities of wealth concealed, why should not I go look for it? If I succeed, I shall not only pay the king, but have wherewithal to live splendidly myself all the rest of my days; and on the other hand, if I perish, I perish, death is the same thing in those tombs or here. Having taken this resolution, he provided himself with

THE great perfection which appears in these ancient works and those of Persepolis, a leaves us no room to doubt that those who were the authors of them, might, if they had so pleased, have left marks of their skill and genius in other parts of this empire, also, or at least that their successors might have done something in the same way. We have already put our selves under such restrictions, as forbid a prolix prosecution of this hint, and therefore we shall content our selves with remarking here, that Mr. Le Brun takes notice in his travels of some remains of antiquity, which he, with two English gentlemen, saw near a mountain a league and a half from Schiras, on the left of the plain. There stood here a mosque, called the mosque of the mother of Solomon, square, and about twenty paces from one corner to the other, having three porticoes exactly resembling those at Persepolis, the first on the east, the second on the north-west, and the third on the north-east. They are eleven feet high, and have on each pilaster the figure of a woman as big as the life; with something in her hand, in the same attitude with the figures on the wall at Persepolis. North-east from this ruined mosque, the same author says, there are seen on the side of the rock nine small figures, much damaged by time, and only half of them appearing above-ground; and on the north-west a stone of prodigious magnitude representing a cask or tun. All the ground thereabouts is covered with stones, and most of the pilasters are out of their places, which could not possibly have happened but by an earthquake; the cornice however of the middle one is very little damaged. A quarter of a league farther, the ruins are seen of that wall, which anciently surrounded this mosque; and about a league from the mosque the same gentleman tells us that he saw several figures cut in the rock, divided into three tables. The first table contains three figures, one of which is represented leaning with its hand on a great sword. The second represents a man with something not unlike a turban on his head. The third figure has a mitre on its head, and like the first, leans its hand on the guard of a great sword; they are very much broken and damaged, so that it is difficult to describe them particularly*. For which reason we may suppose the author has omitted the descriptions of the other two tables. If we may be allowed to found any thing on the representations given us in the prints of this accurate traveller; we may say with some assurance, that these figures are neither so old, nor executed near so well as those on the mountain of Nachs-rustem, which they resemble much more than any thing which is to be seen at Persepolis. Mr. Le Brun speaks frequently of the traditions of the inhabitants relating to such things as these; but there is no necessity of examining their accounts here, since we shall be obliged to give an ample account of these matters, when we speak of the Persian history, as has been written by oriental authors. In the mean time the reader will be pleased to observe, that the foregoing relation is a direct proof of the opinion we advanced, that on a strict enquiry, many more fragments of antiquity might be found in Persia, than those hitherto described and so highly magnified with lights and with some provisions, and then essayed to enter the tombs; in this exploit he was so lucky, that he fell into a path which led him to a large square room full of pieces of gold, of which he took as many as he could carry away, and returned home on the fourth day. But as the sum he brought back was not quite sufficient to pay his debts, he determined to make another experiment which proved as unfortunate as his first had been happy; for, by some means or other losing his way, he perished in the mountain, and was never heard of more. Many travellers have taken great pains themselves, and where their spirits have failed, have hired others to attempt the finding out the rooms which are said to be in this mountain, but most of them have toiled in vain, though not all; for Pietro della Valle, an author worthy of credit, affirms, that he saw a square room built up in the form of a tower, close on all sides except a door which was almost at the top, and altogether inaccessible; this he took to be a sepulchre. Sir John Chardin could find nothing like it, but he declares, he does not doubt the fact, and tells us farther of his own knowledge, that these subterraneous passages are really very perplexed frequently cross each other, and are full of moist vapours, which quickly extinguish the lights (95.)

of the antient PERSIANS.*

THE Persians were without all doubt, a very antient nation. Their country The origin of the Persians. was first peopled by Elam, or as Josephus calls him Elymus, the son of Sbem; whence Persia is constantly called by the sacred writers Elam; nor does it appear that it was known to the Jews before the captivity by any other name. The descendants of Elam settled first in that province, which from them was called Elamais, and by degrees, as their numbers increased, spread themselves into Susiana and other adjoining provinces; as appears from Daniel, who places Susa the metropolis of Susiana in the province of Elam^a (A). All the Greek interpreters by Elam understand Persia, and in the Acts the Persians are called Elamites^c. Whence ^b it is probable that they were descended from Elam, of whom both the country and inhabitants borrowed their name. How this name was changed into that of Persia we have shewn already^d.

THE government of Persia was monarchical, and the crown hereditary. The Their government. kingdom of Elam seems to have been pretty powerful even in the time of Abraham; for Chederlaomer, king of Elam, who was contemporary with that patriarch, is said in scripture to have invaded the Zumzummins and Emins, who were of a gigantic race, and to have taken and pillaged the cities of Sodom and Gemorra; tho' he was at last overthrown by Abraham, who came to the rescue of Lot, whom the Elamite had taken prisoner^e. In the time of Jeremiah Elam must have been a ^c great and potent kingdom, as is plain from the prophecy where he foretels the increase of Nebuchadnezzar's dominions, and particularly that he should subdue Elam, a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris (B).

BUT to speak here of Persia as the second of the four great empires, (for The majesty of their kings. the kings who preceded Cyrus, we shall have occasion to give some account hereafter,) the Persian monarchs were under no controul, but governed by their own arbitrary will and pleasure. They were revered by their subjects like deities on earth, none daring to appear before their throne without prostrating themselves on the ground with a kind of adoration. Sperchies and Bulis both Lacedemonians refused, as Justin informs us^f, to comply with this ceremony, as did also Cnon ^d the Athenian; and Ismenias the Theban declined it, as we read in Ælian^g, by letting his ring drop from his finger, and then throwing himself on the ground to take it up. Timagoras, as we read in Valerius Maximus^h, was put to death by the Athenians for paying this veneration to a Persian monarch. In the time of Apollonius none were allowed to appear before the king who had not done the same honours to his image. While they were in the king's presence, they were to hold their hands, so long as their audience lasted, within their sleeves; for neglecting this ceremony Antiochus and Mitraus were put to death, as we read in Xenophon, by Cyrus the younger. None were suffered to enter the royal palace without the sovereign's leave, except the princes who slew Smerdis; all others of what rank

(A) And I saw in a vision, says the prophet, (and it came to pass, when I saw that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam) and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river Ulai. Shushan is without doubt the city of Susa in Susiana, which stood on the river Euleus, or, as the prophet styles it, Ulai.

(B) Behold I will break the bow of Elam, the chief of their might. And upon Elam will I bring the four winds from the four quarters of the heaven, and will scatter them towards all those winds, and there shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come. For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies, and before them shall seek their life; and I will bring evil upon them, even my fierce anger, saith the Lord, and I will send the sword after them, till I have consumed them. And I will set my throne in Elam, and I will destroy from thence the king and his princes, saith the Lord (1).

(1) Jerem. xlix. 35, & seq.

soever before they set foot in the palace, were obliged to acquaint the king by a messenger that they desired to attend him, and wait his royal pleasure. What respect and obedience his vassals pay'd him we learn from Herodotus, who tells us, that Xerxes being once in danger by sea, many at the king's desire strove who should be the first in leaping over-board to lighten the vessel, and save their prince's life, at the expence of their own *. They all lived in no less dread of the king's wrath, than of the anger of the Gods; whence they lookt upon the incurring of his displeasure as the greatest misfortune that could befall them in life, and were ready at the least intimation given them by their prince to become their own executioners. The crown was hereditary, and bestowed on the eldest of the deceased king's lawful children. In long or dangerous expeditions, to avoid all contests, the heir b apparent was named by the reigning king before he set out on his journey or march. The new king was crowned at Pasargada, or as Pliny calls it, Pasagarda 1, by the priests, who bore a great sway in the court of Persia. This ceremony was performed in the temple of the goddess of war, where the king used first of all to clothe himself with the garment, which Cyrus the founder of the Persian monarchy had wore before he was raised to the throne. Being thus attired, he used to eat some figs with a small quantity of turpentine, and drink a cup full of sour milk, then * the tiara or crown was placed on his head by one of the grandees, in whose family that right was hereditary, and deemed all over Persia the greatest honour a subject could enjoy. The king's tiara was by c a peculiar name called Cidaris, being a kind of turbant rising up with a sharp point without bending; whereas the other Persians wore their turbants bending downwards to their foreheads in token of subjection. However, the descendants of those, who with Darius the son of Histaspes slew the usurping Mage, were allowed to use a tiara bending to the middle of their head, and not, as that of the other subjects, reaching down to their eye-brows. Round the tiara the king wore a purple and white band, or diadem; for nothing else is meant by the word Diadem in the antient writers, but a band of this nature wreathed round the forehead 1. This tiara with the purple and white band is the only ensign of royalty we find among the Persian kings of the first dynasty. The king's birth-day was d kept as sacred, and celebrated with publick sports with the utmost pomp and magnificence. His death was bewailed by shutting the tribunals of justice for five days, and that fire, which was worshipped in private families as a house-hold god, was on that occasion alone extinguished 1. The king's abode was, according to the season, seven months at Babylon, three at Susa (C), and two at Ecbatan m. Whence they are compared by Ælian n to cranes, and by Aristotle to the Scythian Nomades, who by often shifting their abode, always enjoyed a temperate season. They likewise removed sometimes to Pasargada, and sometimes to Persepolis, which at last became their ordinary residence. The king's court or palace had many gates, and each gate a body of guards, whose duty it was not only to defend the king's per- e

(C) Susa, called in scripture Shushan, was the metropolis of the province Susiana. It was built on the banks of the river Eulus, called by Daniel Ulai, by Mimon, as some say, the son of Titbonus, who was slain by the Thebessians in the Trojan war (2). Strabo (3), and Pausanias (4), compare the walls of Susa even with those of Babylon. Cassiodorus tells us, upon what authority we know not, and therefore give him no credit, that the walls of this city were cemented with gold. Polycletus, as we read in Strabo (5), would make us believe that it had no walls, which is no less improbable, considering the kings of Persia resided there three months in the year, and that great part of the treasures were lodged in it, as Diodorus informs us (6). It was called Susa from the many lilies which grew in that neighbourhood, says Stephanus, and in the Persian language bore that name. It is also called Mem- nonia by Herodotus (7) and others from its founder Mimon. In scripture it is constantly named (8) the palace; but besides the king's palace there was, without all doubt, a city, as is plain from all the prophane writers. The city was sheltered by a high ridge of mountains from the northern winds, which rendered it very agreeable during the winter; but in summer the heat was so parching, that the inhabitants were forced to cover their houses, as Strabo writes, with earth two cubits deep (9). Susa was in ancient times a wealthy and magnificent city; Alexander found in it 50000 talents of gold, besides jewels of an inestimable value, and an immense quantity of gold and silver vessels. Here Ahasuerus kept his great feast, which lasted 183 days. It lies now in ruins, and is known, as Tavernier informs us, by the name of Schouster or Suster.

- a son, but to inform him of whatever they saw, or heard done in any part of the kingdom; whence they were called; some the king's ears, others, as Aristotle * informs us, the king's eyes. To these, messengers were sent from the most remote provinces of the empire, when any thing happened worthy of the king's knowledge; and besides, they received immediate intelligence of any sudden commotion by means of fires, which were always ready at small distances from each other, and lighted when occasion required; so that they could in one day receive notice of any tumult, rebellion or invasion, in what part soever it happened of that vast empire.
- b THE king's palace was deemed sacred and respected as a temple. It was extremely magnificent, and furnished with utensils of an inestimable value. The walls and roof of the rooms were all covered with ivory, silver, amber or gold. The throne was of pure gold, supported by four pillars richly set with precious stones. The king's bed was likewise of gold, and Herodotus ° mentions a plane-tree and vine of gold presented to Darius by Pythius a Lydian, who after the king of Persia was accounted the richest man in the world (D). The body and branches of this vine, says Athenæus †, were enriched with jewels of great value, and the clusters of grapes were all precious stones; which hung over the king's head as he sat on the throne. At his bed's-head stood always a chest or coffer containing five thousand talents, which was called the king's bolster, and another at his feet, with three thousand talents ‡; adjoining to the king's palace were large gardens and parks stocked with all sorts of game for his diversion. Tully tells us out of Xenophon §, that Cyrus planted and cultivated one of these delicious gardens with his own hand. Alexander enriched them with trees and plants out of Greece. The Persian kings drank no other water but that of the river Choaspes, which was carried about with them in silver vessels whithersoever they went (E). ¶ They drank only Calybnyan wine made at Damascus in Syria, and touched no bread but what was of the wheat of Affos in Phrygia, and their salt was brought from Egypt. The magnificence of their publick feasts exceeds, as appears from holy writ †, what we read of in histories of other nations. Their table was daily served with
- d somewhat of the product of each nation subject to them. Among the prisoners taken by Parmenio at Damascus were, as Athenæus * informs us, 277 cooks, 29 who took care of the dishes, 17 who ministered water, 70 who had in charge the wine, 40 employed about ointments, and 66 whose province it was to prepare garlands used, according to the custom of those times, in banquets. During their repast their ears were feasted with the harmony both of vocal and instrumental musick, and 300 women of the sweetest and most melodious voices were in constant attendance to divert the king at his unbending hours. It was likewise their

(D) Pythius, if we believe Herodotus (10), entertained at Calene in Phrygia Xerxes and all his army, as he was marching against Greece, and moreover offered him towards the charges of the war two thousand talents of silver, and three millions nine hundred ninety three thousand pieces of gold, all bearing the stamp of his father Darius. Xerxes with no less generosity not only refused the treasures offered him, but ordered seven thousand Darien pieces or Darics to be giving to Pythius as a reward of his affection and good will, nor did he leave Calene till the sum was paid.

(E) It is matter of dispute among geographers whether the Choaspes and the Eulæus be one and the same, or two different rivers. Pliny (11) distinguishes them, and says that they both rise in Media, but that the Choaspes discharges itself into the Pasitigris, and the Eulæus into the lake Characenus. Polycletus likewise, as we read in Strabo (12), supposes them to be two different streams, though he makes them disembogue themselves into the same lake. On the other hand Salmasius (13) takes them to be one and the same river under different names; for the Choaspes rising in Media buries itself under ground, and again appears not far from Susa in Media he thinks it is called Choaspes, and in the province of Susiana Eulæus. This seems agreeable to what we read in Ptolemy (14), who mentions two springs of the Eulæus (for he nowhere names the Choaspes) one in Media and the other in Susiana. Besides, Herodotus tells us (15) that the Choaspes washed the walls of Susa, and that the Persian kings drank no other water; whence it is manifest, that the Choaspes and Eulæus are one and the same river at least at Susa, and even Pliny (16) and the other writers who distinguish them, place the city of Susa on the banks of the Eulæus, and all the interpreters take the river Ulai mentioned by Daniel (17) to be the Eulæus. Nor is there any thing more common than that the same river should be known in different places by different names; thus the Danube was called by the Latins Danubius and Ister, the Wefer Pierra and Visurgis, the Po Padus and Eridanus, &c.

province to lull him asleep with the melody and variety of their notes, and recreate a his mind as soon as he awaked in the morning *. Most of the Persian kings were so dissolved in pleasures, that they scarce minded any thing beside their own satisfaction. Xerxes was not ashamed to propose by a publick edict, an ample reward to any one who should devise a new pleasure †. The king seldom admitted others to his table, besides his wife and mother; such as received this honour, were so placed as not to see, but only be seen by the king; for they thought it was, in some degree, a degrading of their majesty to appear subject to the same necessities with other mortals. This desire of appearing above the level of other men, was the motive that confined them within their palaces, and scarce ever suffered them to appear abroad. Their lust and voluptuousness sufficiently appears from the book of Esther; and Tully ‡ adds, that the revenues of whole provinces were employed on the attire of some of their favourite concubines, one city being obliged to supply them with ornaments for their hair, another for their necks, &c. Nay, Socrates § mentions an ambassador, who being sent into Persia spent a whole day in travelling thro' a country, which was called the Queen's girdle, and another day before he reached the borders of a rich territory stiled the Queen's head-dress.

children.

THE king's children, more especially the eldest, were presently after their birth committed to the care of Eunuchs. At seven years old they learnt under experienced instructors to ride and hunt, which were lookt upon as the most manly exercises; at the age of fourteen they were put under the discipline of four learned preceptors, of which one was to teach them prudence, another justice, the third temperance, and the fourth fortitude ¶.

guard.

THE king's ordinary guard consisted mostly of Persians. Curtius mentions a guard which attended the king's person, consisting of 15000 men, who were called the king's relations; there was also a body of 10000 choice horse-men, all Persians, who accompanied him in all his expeditions, and were called immortal. His guards received no pay, but were very plentifully provided with all necessaries of life.

The manners of the Persians. How they educated their children.

BUT the grandeur and magnificence of the Persian kings appeared no where d greater than on occasion of the publick sacrifices, at which they often assisted, as we shall have occasion to take notice of in the next section, as also of their funerals and other religious ceremonies in use among the Persians.

IT is time now to say something of the customs and manners of the antient Persians. They had a particular care of the education of their children above any other nation. A son was not admitted to the presence of his father, but was brought up by women of the best character, till he attained the age of five years, lest if he should die before that time his father might be too much grieved at his death. At five years old the children of such as could afford it, were committed to the tuition of e learned masters or Mages, who carefully taught them more by examples than precepts, the practice of justice, patience, sobriety, abstinence, and all other virtues. They took great pains to implant in their breasts an aversion to all manner of vice, especially to lying and contracting debts. They learnt also to ride, to shoot with bows, and fight on horse-back. This was their education till seventeen years of age, when the children of men of rank were admitted among the king's guards, and attended him at home when he went a hunting, or abroad in his warlike expeditions. They were brought up with such an awful respect to their parents, that they never offer'd to sit down in their presence. Every father had power of life and death over his own children, but was restrained by the laws from exercising f such severity for small faults, or for one crime alone.

neous customs of the Per-

THE Persians were antiently all trained up to military exercises, but more especially to handle a bow, which they did with great dexterity; whence it is, that we find the bow of Elam mentioned by the prophet Jeremiab †, and the quiver of Elam by Isaiab ‡, as the arms peculiar to this nation. From the age of five years to that of twenty they taught their sons chiefly three things, as Herodotus informs us §, to manage a horse, to use the bow with dexterity, and to speak truth. A numerous issue was lookt upon by them as the greatest blessing which the gods could bestow, and such as could shew a numerous offspring received early pre-

- a sents from the king ^f. They celebrated their birth-days with great pomp and magnificence, furnishing their tables on such occasions in a very plentiful manner, tho' at other times they lived very sparingly, at least under their first kings. In their diet they were very temperate, but were always inclined to drinking; they used even to debate the most important matters in their cups; but the master of the house, where they met to consult, proposed the same subject the next day before they tasted any liquor, when the resolutions taken the day before were approved or rejected ^g. When they met they saluted with a kiss on the mouth, if they were equal; on the cheek, if one was somewhat inferior to the other; but those who were of a much lower rank used to prostrate themselves on the ground when they met or accosted their superiors. They shewed most value for those that lived next to them, and very little to such as lived at a great distance, as if men were more or less worthy in proportion as they lived at a greater or smaller distance from them ^h. No nation was ever more ready to adopt foreign customs. They no sooner conquered the Medes, but they assumed their dress; in war they used the Egyptian armour after they had subdued that kingdom; and imitated the Greeks, as soon as they became acquainted with them, in the worst of vices, as Herodotus himself owns ⁱ. They were indulged many wives, and besides as many concubines as they were able to maintain; those who had many children, being lookt upon as heroes of as great prowess as those who had distinguished themselves in military exploits.
- c They bore such respect to their parents, that they thought it impossible a man should ever put to death his father or mother, whence no punishments were inflicted by their laws on such offenders; and if any one was indicted for committing so heinous a crime he was always declared by the judges spurious or supposititious. To affirm a falsehood was accounted the utmost infamy, and next to that the being in debt, because it exposed a man to the necessity of lying. If any among them happened to be infected with a leprosy, or any other distemper of that nature, he was not permitted to stay within the city, nor to converse with the others, having, as they believed, drawn this punishment upon himself by committing some offence against the sun. All strangers that were subject to this distemper were expelled the country. These customs, and some others, relating to their funerals, of which we d shall speak in the next section, we have learnt of Herodotus, who tells us, that he can with certainty affirm them to be true.

THE most severe punishment in use among the Persians was that of shutting them up between two boats, which was done in the following manner. They made two boats on purpose, so even that the one was neither broader nor longer than the other; then they laid the offender in one of them on his back, and covered him with the other, his hands, feet and head being left uncovered, and appearing thro' an opening made for that purpose. In this posture he was supplied with victuals and drink by the executioners, who even forced him, by thrusting sharp iron-tools in his eyes, to eat what was necessary to support nature lest he should starve himself, and thereby put an end to his pain. On his face, that was placed full in the sun, they poured honey, which inviting the flies and wasps, tormented him no less than the swarms of worms that were bred of his excrements, and devoured his body to the very entrails. Under such a complication of unrelenting torments the unhappy offender lived many days; for Plutarch, who describes this cruel manner of putting to death ^k, tells us, that Mitridates, whom Artaxerxes condemned to this punishment for pretending to have killed his brother Cyrus ^l, lived seventeen days in the utmost agony, and that the uppermost boat being taken off at his death, they found his flesh all consumed, and swarms of worms gnawing his very bowels. Such as were convicted of high treason were condemned to have their right hand and then their head struck off, which sentence was by order of Artaxerxes executed even on the dead body of his brother Cyrus ^m. But by the antient laws of Persia the king was restrained from putting any man to death for a single crime; and besides, the judge was to examine narrowly into the actions of the delinquent, and if his faults were found to over-balance his former services, the king was allowed to punish him at pleasure; if not, he was either pardoned or punished less severely ⁿ. Poisoners were pressed to death between two stones, which punishment we find inflicted upon Gigis, a woman greatly favoured by Parysatis, mother to Artaxerxes, for having conspired with her to poison queen Statira ^o.

ages and in-cestuous commerce.

THE Persians were beyond any other people jealous of their wives and concubines. It was death to touch any of the king's women, to speak to them, or even to come near them or their coaches as they travelled. They were allowed to marry their own sisters and daughters; thus we are told that Artaxerxes married two of his daughters, Amestris and Stossa, though he had promised them to others. Minutius Felix reproaches them with marrying or criminally conversing with their mothers; and Eusebius quotes a saying of Bardesanes, which shews that they were indulged by law to marry their sisters, daughters, and mothers. This incestuous custom they observed also in other countries, namely in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatin, as Eusebius witnesses^o, where they were on that account abhorred by the inhabitants, and nicknamed Maguffei, or addicted to magick^q. They were the first^b that introduced those amphibious animals called Eunuchs, which Petronius Arbitr^r and Seneca^s impute to their insatiable lechery.

THE first that caused gold and silver to be coined in Persia was Darius the son of Cyaxares, or as he is called in scripture Darius the Mede, the founder of the Medo-Persian monarchy (F). In his reign were coined those famous pieces of gold called Darics, which for many ages were preferred, being of pure gold, to all other coins throughout the east. They were stamped on one side with an archer cloathed in a long robe, and crowned with a spiked crown, holding a bow in his left hand, and an arrow in his right; on the other side was the effigies of Darius^t. To these pieces alluded Agessilaus, when finding himself obliged to quit Asia in order to suppress the tumults which Artaxerxes had by dint of gold stirred up in Greece, he said that the king of Persia had driven him out of his dominions, with thirty thousand Archers^u. The Darics were of the same weight and value with the Attic Stater. Darius seems to have learnt the art and use of money of the Lydians, for the Medes had no money before they conquered Lydia^v; whereas Craesus king of Lydia had coined innumerable pieces of gold, called Craefei. As it was not reasonable that the coin of Lydia should continue current after the downfall of the kingdom, we may suppose that Darius recoinced the Craefei with his own effigies, without altering their weight or value^w. All these pieces of gold, that were afterwards coined of the same weight and value, by the succeeding kings, not only of the Persian, but also of the Macedonian race, were called Darics from this Darius, in whose reign they were first coined (G).

Their arts, sciences, &c.

THERE was, it seems, no great learning among the Persians before the time of Zoroastres, whom the Persians call Zerdusht or Zaratush, who flourished in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, and was the great mathematician and philosopher of the age he lived in. The Mages being instructed in mathematicks, astronomy and natural philosophy partly by him, and partly by Hystaspes the father of Darius, were reputed above all others skilled in those arts. Hystaspes had travelled into India, and lived there some time among the Brachmans, in order to learn their mysteries and sciences, for which they were famed at that time, and on his return communicated to the Mages what he had learnt, improving that sect not only in religion, but in all natural knowledge^x. But this subject shall be treated more at length in the following section; we shall only add here, that this knowledge was lockt up among the priests, and seldom communicated to any except those of the royal family, whom they were bound to instruct^y.

(F) We are told by Suidas, Harpocration and the scholiast of Aristophanes (18), that the first pieces of gold were coined not by Darius the father of Xerxes, but by a more ancient Darius, who must necessarily have been Darius the son of Cyaxares king of the Medes, since we know of no other Darius reigning so early in the east.

(G) In those parts of scripture that were wrote after the Babylonish captivity (19), these pieces are mentioned by the name of Adarkonim, and by the Talmudists are called (20) Darkomoth, both from the Greek Δαρικόν, that is Darics. They were probably coined by Darius during the two years he reigned at Babylon, while Cyrus was absent on his Syrian, Egyptian, and other expeditions. According to Dr. Bernard a Daric weighed two grains more than one of our guineas.

A THE poverty of the antient Persians, and their contempt of riches, shews them to have been quite strangers to trade and commerce, which are carried on with a prospect of gain. Before the conquest of Lydia they had no money, nor any cloathing but skins; they used water for drink; and had neither wine nor any other thing, but what their barren country produced, as appears from the excellent speech of Sandanis to dissuade Cræsus from invading Persia *. After they subdued Lydia, and were masters of so many rich provinces, they very likely applied their minds to trade and navigation to supply themselves with those commodities, which their country wanted, and at the same time to dispose of those which they could easily spare. But as we can advance nothing with respect to their trade warranted by good authorities, we shall dismiss this subject, and hasten to their military discipline.

B THE Persians learnt from their childhood to ride, and handle their bow, as we have hinted above, and by the manly exercise of hunting inured themselves to the toils of war †. They never parted with their swords, quivers, and bows, even in time of peace, but when they went to repose, and had them even then always ready at hand ‡; which custom the Romans, who never used any weapons but in the field, lookt upon as unbecoming a civilized nation §. As soon as they were able to bear arms they were obliged to enter themselves in the list of soldiers, but received no pay till the age of twenty ¶. In time of war they were all bound on pain of death, except such as were disabled by age or otherwise, to appear under their respective standards; and attend the king in his expeditions † (H). They used no mercenaries in the time of Herodianus , nor maintained a standing army, but were all obliged, when occasion required, to repair to their colours, returning to their respective homes when the war was at an end, without any other pay or reward, but their share of the plunder.

C IN war they wore on the head a tiara, or head-piece, so thick that it was proof against all kinds of offensive arms; on the body a coat of mail wrought in likeness of scales, and embellished with sleeves of various colours; their thighs were defended with cuisses; their shields, or rather targets, were of wicker, their javelins short, their bows of an uncommon length; their arrows of reeds; they wore short swords (H 2) hanging from a belt on the right side †. Their horses were likewise covered with armour or thick hides, as we read in Xenophon ‡, Curtius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. They were sure marks-men, and quicker than any other nation in discharging; especially on their flight, which was peculiar to them and the Partians; however, in the time of Procopius their arrows

(H) Herodotus tells us, that while Darius was marching from Susa with his forces against the Scythians, Oebazus, a noble Persian, who had three sons in his army, begged that one of his sons might be left at home to comfort him in his old age. The king received him with great demonstrations of kindness, and told him, that he would grant him more than he asked, for he designed to leave him all his sons. This answer gave the old man great joy, for he did not doubt but the king would be as good as his word. Oebazus was scarce departed; when Darius commanded the officers appointed for such purposes to put all his sons to death, and sent their dead mangled bodies home to their father's house (21). We have another, still more dreadful, instance of the Persian severity on such occasions. Pythius the Lydian, as we have hinted above, entertained with great magnificence Xerxes and all his army, and offered him two thousand talents of silver, and three millions nine hundred ninety three thousand pieces of gold to defray the expences of the war which he was carrying on against Greece. The king was so taken with his zeal and affection, that he promised to grant him whatever he should ask.

Pythius had then no request to make: but some time after being frightened with an eclipse of the sun, and confiding in the merit of his late liberal offer, and the king's unlimited promise, entreated him to discharge the eldest of his five sons who were all in his army; that he might have somebody to take care of himself in his old age, and of his estate. He had no sooner uttered this request, but the king transported with rage, and forgetful both of his own promise, and the former merits of Pythius, commanded the body of his eldest son to be cut asunder, and one part laid on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that the army might pass between both (22). So heinous a crime it was, according to the Persian discipline, to exempt one's self from the service, or even ask an exemption for others.

(H 2) These were rather daggers than swords; for Josephus (24) compares them to the poniards used by Russians, and Darius finding in his first engagement with Alexander that the length of the Macedonian swords did not contribute a little to the victory, caused the Persian swords, or Acinaces as the Latins call them, to be considerably lengthened (25).

muster.^{ng.}

did but small execution, which he ascribes to the slackness of their bows; whereas no shield or armour was proof against the Roman arrows¹. The number of their dead they knew only when the campaign was at an end, and in the following manner. Before they took the field they passed before the king or commander in chief, each man throwing an arrow into a basket; these baskets were sealed up with the royal signet till they returned from the campaign, when they pass'd muster in the same manner, every one taking an arrow out of the same baskets; when they were all pass'd, the remaining arrows were counted, and from their number they reckoned the number of their dead. This antient custom continued even in the time of *Procopius*². They wore over their armour great-coats of purple, but the king's was white, by which badge he was known and often aimed at by the enemies³.
They excelled all nations in horsemanship, being accustomed thereunto from their very infancy; among them it was disreputable ever to appear in publick but on horse-back; on horse-back they transacted all their private and publick affairs, held their assemblies, visited their friends, &c.⁴. This custom in process of time began to degenerate into luxury, the Persians striving to outdo each other in the richness of their caparisons, their very horses, as Dionysius expresses it⁵, champing the purest gold. They fought not only on horse-back, but likewise from chariots drawn by four, six, and sometimes eight horses⁶. They were the first, if we believe *Xenophon*⁷, that introduced the use of chariots armed with scythes (I). When they went on any expedition, their wives, mothers, children, &c. follow'd the camp⁸, which custom was observed amongst all the eastern nations; their presence, they thought, inspired them with courage, since they were to lose at once whatever was dear to them in the world, if they did not behave as they ought. Their provisions and baggage were carried on camels, the soldiers being loaded with no other burden but that of their arms⁹. In what manner they marched we learn from Herodotus, who describes the march of Xerxes's army thus¹⁰. The baggage, whether carried by servants or beasts of burden, appeared in the front, and was followed by men of all nations, formed into a body without distinction. Between these and the rest of the army was left an interval, that they might not mix with that part where the king was. Before him marched a thousand horsemen, and the like number of spear-men with their spears pointing downwards. After these came ten great horses bred in the plains of Media, called the Nisean Plains (K), caparisoned with rich furniture, and consecrated to Jupiter. The chariot of that God immediately followed, drawn by eight white horses, the driver on foot, holding the reins, no mortal being allowed to mount the seat. After Jupiter appeared the king in a chariot drawn by Nisean horses. A thousand chosen spear-men, all Persians, marched next to the king, and were followed by another body of horse, consisting of a thousand chosen men of the same nation. After the horse ten thousand Persian foot advanced, and of these one thousand were armed with javelins, which instead of the common ornaments were embellished with pomegranats of gold. The other nine thousand had pomegranats of silver. The ten thousand foot were followed by ten thousand Persian horse, and at the distance of two stades. The rest of the forces advanced promiscuously. They computed the number of their forces in the following manner. Ten thousand men were crouded into as narrow a piece of ground as they possibly could, and a kind of furrow being drawn round them, they caused the like number to enter the ground, and continued so doing till the whole army was computed¹¹. When they

(I) Xenophon ascribes to Cyrus the invention of chariots armed with scythes (26). But Diodorus tells us out of the fabulous Ctesias that Semiramis, in the war which she waged with the Bactrians, had in her army 700 chariots armed with scythes (27), and seems to make the Affyrian kings the first inventors of them. Whence it is plain from Xenophon and Diodorus, that Hesychius was mistaken when he ascribed this contrivance to the Macedonians.

(K) The Nisean or Nisæan fields in Media are celebrated by all the antients for the large, strong and fleet horses that were bred there (28), and which alone the Persian monarchs used after they became masters of that country.

- a intended to make war upon any nation they sent heralds or ambassadors to demand of them earth and water; that is, to command them to submit and acknowledge the king of Persia as the sovereign lord of their country * (L). This manner of declaring war they borrowed of the Medes as Plutarch informs us, and the Medes seem to have imitated in that, as in many other things, the Affyrians, who, as appears from the book of Judith †, used in that manner to require an entire submission. In time of action the king was always in the center ‡, and used to encourage his men with a speech §. The signal was given with the sound of trumpets, and followed by an universal shout of the whole army ¶. The watch-word was in use even among them, for Xenophon speaking of Cyrus; tells us that his was Jupiter our leader and protector *. The royal banner was a spread-eagle of gold, carried on the point of a long spear †. They reckoned those happy who died in the field, and inflicted exemplary punishments on such as abandoned their posts, or fled from their colours ‡. They used no stratagems nor cared for any advantages that were not owing to their valour §, or, as Ammianus Marcellinus expresses it, thought it unfair and base to steal a victory *. They never fought in the night, unless attacked by the enemy, nor marched before the rising of the sun †. Duels or single combats were in use among them, as is plain from the stories of Darius ‡ and Polydamas §. This is what we have been able to gather from unquestionable authorities relating to the military discipline of the ancient Persians.
- c As to their laws, they are greatly commended by Xenophon, who prefers them to those of any other nation whatsoever †, and observes that other lawgivers only appointed punishments for crimes committed, but did not take sufficient care to prevent men from committing them; whereas the main design of the Persian laws was to inspire men with a love for virtue and abhorrency of vice, so as to avoid the one and pursue the other, without regarding either punishment or rewards. To attain this end parents were not by their laws allowed to give their children what education they pleased; but were obliged to send them to publick schools, where they were educated with great care, and never suffered, till they had attained the age of seventeen, to return home to their parents. These schools were not trusted to the care of common mercenary masters, but were governed by men of the first quality and best characters, who taught them by their example the practice of all virtues; for these schools were not designed for learning of sciences, but practising of virtue. The youths were allowed no other food but bread and cresses, no other drink but water †, at least from the age of seven to seventeen. Those who had not been educated in those schools were excluded from all honours and preferments ‡, (M).

(L) Some have erroneously imagined that by this demand nothing else was meant but that those to whom it was directed should furnish the Persian army with such a quantity of provisions. But the contrary is plain from all the ancients, especially from Herodotus, who tells us, that Darius dispatched a messenger to Indatyrfus king of Scythia, commanding him to own the king of Persia for his sovereign, and to present him with earth and water in token of his submission. To this message the Scythian returned answer, that he acknowledged no other lords but Jupiter his progenitor, and Vesta queen of the Scythians; and that instead of presenting him with earth and water, he would send him such a present as he deserved, and perhaps might make him repent of his insolence in assuming the title of his master. And accordingly he sent him some time after a messenger to present him on his part with a bird, a mouse, a frog and five arrows, which Darius would fain have interpreted as a tacit submission, and a giving him possession of the land and water; for said he, the mouse is bred in the earth and lives on the same food as man; a frog lives in the water; a bird may be compared to a horse, and by the arrows they seem to deliver their whole force into my hands. But Gabrias was of opinion that the king of Scythia gave them to understand by such a present, that unless the Persians could ascend into the air like a bird, or conceal themselves in the earth like mice, or plunge into the fens like frogs, they should inevitably perish by those arrows (29).

(M) These schools the Persians called Liberal markets; for they allowed no publick place for buying or selling, as appears from Cyrus's answer to the Lacedæmonians, telling them that he was not afraid of those who in the midst of their cities have a place of publick resort, where they cheer one another by mutual oaths; which words, adds Herodotus (30) were levelled at all the Greeks, who in every city had some publick place for buying and selling, whereas the Persians allow of no such places, nor any place at all of publick resort.

There were particular laws against ingratitude, and whoever had done any one a good office, if he did not meet with a suitable return, could bring an action against the ungrateful person, who upon conviction was punished with great severity ^a (N). When any one went to give advice to the king, either of his own accord, or by the prince's order, in proposing his opinion he stood upon an ingot of gold, which he was rewarded with, if his advice was found wholesome; if otherwise, he was publicly whipt ^a.

BEFORE we close this section we shall add some particulars relating to the Persian kings, gathered from the best authors. The kings of Persia were above all others the most arbitrary and absolute, and look'd upon their subjects, however distinguish'd by birth or fortune, as the meanest of slaves. None, their own children not excepted, durst address them with any other title, than that of Lord, great king, king of kings ^a; which high sounding titles they seem to have borrowed from the Assyrians: for Daniel ^b in speaking to Nebuchadnezzar, gives him the title of king of kings. As the Persians imitated in this the haughtiness of the Assyrians, so did the Parthians that of the Persians ^c, and continued this stile even to the time of the emperor Constantius, to whom Sapor king of Parthia wrote himself, king of king, partaker of the stars, brother of the sun and moon, &c. But to return to the Persian kings, as they assumed high titles to themselves, so they bestowed no other on their subjects, by what dignity soever distinguished, but that of slaves ^d; and treated them as such, not in words only, but in all other respects. To this slavish spirit, which is altogether inconsistent with true courage, Plato ascribes the downfall of the Persian monarchy ^e. This spirit of slavery prevailed to such a degree among the Persians, that even those who were by the king's order publicly whipt, used to return him thanks for vouchsafing to remember them ^f. Whoever betrayed the least reluctance, to put in execution the king's commands how difficult soever, was sure to forfeit his head and right arm ^g. The custom of adoring their kings, and putting them on the same level with the gods, is by Justin ^h fathered upon Cyrus the great. None durst appear before the king without prostrating themselves on the ground; nay, they were all obliged, at what distance soever the king appeared, to pay him that adoration. Nor did they exact it only on their own vassals, but also of foreign ministers and ambassadors, the captain of the guard being charged to enquire of those, who asked admittance to the king, whether they were ready to adore him; if they refused to comply with that ceremony, they were told that the king's ears were open to such only as were willing to pay him that homage, so that they were forced to transact the business they were charged with, by means of the king's servants or eunuchs ⁱ. Nor did their pride and ambition stop here; they sometimes ordered the same reverence to be paid to their favourites, as appears from the history of Haman and Mordecai ^j; nay, even to their statues and images, for Philostratus acquaints us, that in the time of Apollonius a golden statue of the king was represented to all those that entered Babylon, and that such only as adored it were admitted within the gates ^k. When they appeared before the king, their common salutation was, Live for ever ^l, Let the king live for ever. To sit in the king's chair or throne (O), to wear any part of the apparel which he had used,

(N) Seneca therefore was mistaken when he said, that laws against ingratitude were to be found among the Macedonians alone; excepta Macedonum gente, says he, non est in ulla data adversus ingratos actio (31), that is, in no nation, except the Macedonian, ingratitude is actionable; where some read Medorum instead of Macedonum, but all the ancient copies have Macedonum.

(O) Q. Curtius tells us (32) that when Alexander marched his army thro' a certain province called Gabaza, one of his soldiers arrived at the place, where they were to encamp, was so benumbed with the excessive cold of the season and climate, that he had almost lost the use both of his limbs and senses. The king, who had likewise suffered greatly by the cold, and was then sitting by a fire which they had kindled in the open fields, no sooner saw the soldier in that pitiful condition, but starting up and with his own hands pulling off his armour, placed him in the chair where himself was sitting. The soldier by degrees recovered, but was very near fainting away again, when he found himself seated in the royal chair and the king standing by him. But Alexander encouraged him to lay aside all fear, saying,

- a (P), to look into the litter wherein his concubines were conveyed from their habitation to the palace (Q), to shoot in hunting, or strike at the game before the king (R), were all capital crimes^b. Such as betrayed any secret, which they had been trusted with by the king, or gave intelligence to the enemies of his designs, were punished with great severity; whence Alexander, as his historian tells us^c, could never have any notice before-hand of their designs, the captives chusing rather to suffer death than betray the designs of their prince. Nobody, of what rank soever, appeared before the king without a present, which custom prevails among the orientals to this day. When he went on his progress or marched out with his army, all the inhabitants of the countries or provinces through which he passed were obliged to declare their vassalage by some present or other; even the inhabitants of the villages and fields flocked to him with their donatives, some offering sheep, oxen, corn, wine, &c. others milk, cheese, dates, &c. every one according to his ability^d (S).

The Persian kings frequently heard causes themselves, both civil and criminal, and though transcendently vicious in other respects, were nevertheless very tender in point of justice and equity. After hearing the merits of the cause with great attention, they took several days to consider and advise with such as were conversant in their laws, before they gave sentence^e. When they sat on life and death, they not only considered the crime of which the delinquent was impeached, but all the actions, whether good or bad, of his whole life, and condemned or cleared him according as his crimes or deserts prevailed^f (T). Their humanity and good nature even towards those, who according to the laws deserved death, is very remarkable. Thus Artaxerxes Longimanus ordered that the turbans of the condemned persons should be struck off instead of their heads; that the strings, with which they tied them, should be cut instead of their ears, and their garments whipt instead of their persons^g. Beside the king there were several other judges, all men of unblemished characters, and well skilled in the laws of the kingdom. These were called royal judges, administered justice at stated times in saying, Do not fear, O fellow soldier, but reflect how much happier is your condition under me, than that of the Persians under their king; had you rested in the Persian king's chair, it had cost you your life; to have rested in mine, has saved it. Hence it was that Artabanus, as we read in Herodotus (33), though uncle to Xerxes, shewed so great reluctance to comply with his orders, when he commanded him to put on the royal robes, sit on the throne, and repose in his bed.

(P) Plutarch tells us (34) that one Trebates, who was very familiar with Artaxerxes whom he used to divert with his wit and humour, having one day begged of him an old gown, obtained what he demanded, but with this condition, that he should not wear it, that being contrary to the laws of Persia. Trebates not minding the king's prohibition or the laws of the realm, soon after appeared in it at court; which the Persians resenting as an affront against the majesty of their king, were for punishing him according to the rigour of the law. But Artaxerxes saved him by telling them, that he had commanded Trebates to appear in that garb as his fool.

(Q) In one of these litters Themistocles, who was desirous to have a private conference with Artaxerxes was conveyed to the king's apartment without being observed by the Persians, who began to be jealous of him (35).

(R) This law was abrogated, as we read in Plutarch, by Artaxerxes Maccobir (36) or Longimanus.

(S) we read in Plutarch (37) and Ælian (38) of one Sineta a Persian, who meeting by chance Artaxerxes at a great distance from his poor cottage, and having nothing else to present him with, ran to the river, and filling both his hands with water, made an offering of that to the king, which was by him graciously received.

(T) To this purpose Herodotus tells us (39) that Darius having pronounced sentence of death against a corrupt judge, and afterwards finding that his former deserts over-balanced his present crime, ordered him to be taken down from the cross and set at liberty. This does not agree with what we read in Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the sentence of death once pronounced, could not be repealed even by the king himself; for after relating how Darius pronounced sentence of death against Chabridemus, he adds, that the king immediately repented, as if he had been over-hasty in a matter of the utmost consequence, but it was not in his power to undo what he had done (40). Perhaps he means nothing else but that the king could not restore him to life again; for, as both he (41) and Xenophon (42) inform us, the sentence was no sooner pronounced, but the criminal was hurried away to execution.

different provinces, and some of them attended the king whithersoever he went ^a. The king often advised with them, and in matters concerning himself referred the whole to their judgement ^b. They were nominated by the king, who, as that employment was for life, took great care to prefer such only as were famed for their integrity (U).

THE Persian kings had several wives, besides what number of concubines they pleased. Darius maintained as many as the days of the year ^c. Artaxerxes had by his concubines 115 children ^d. The concubines were introduced to the king, each in their turn ^e, whence some have concluded that the antient Persian year consisted of 360 days, seeing that several of the Persian monarchs had the like number of concubines, who went to their kings in constant courses ^f (W).

WE shall end this section with some account of their revenues. Each province had its peculiar treasure and treasurer, as is plain from all the antient writers, both sacred and profane; and from the great sums, which Alexander found in several particular provinces or cities, we may judge of the immense treasures they possessed. In the city of Damascus he found 2600 talents, and silver uncoined to the value of 500 more; in Arbela 4000 talents, in Susa 40,000, and 9000 Darics, in Persepolis 120,000, in Pasargada 6000, in Ecbatan 180,000 ^g. These immense sums arose from the tributes which each province was yearly obliged to pay according to the assessment of Darius Hyaspes. For during the reigns of Cyrus and his son Cambyfes, no tributes were imposed, the people voluntarily contributing for the maintenance of the king and his army, what they thought fit; from the imposing of these taxes, and other things of the like nature, the Persians gave Darius the nick-name of Merchant. The sum total of the king's revenues, according to the computation of Herodotus ^h, amounted to 14560 Euboic talents ⁱ, besides other smaller sums. These revenues were gathered from the provinces of Asia only, but in process of time the islands of several provinces of Europe, with Egypt, Syria, &c. were likewise taxed, which increased the king's revenues to such a degree, that, if we believe Justin ^j, Alexander after the conquest of Persia received yearly from his subjects the sum of 300,000 talents. The Persian kings preserved ^k their treasures in the following manner; they caused the gold and silver to be melted down and poured into earthen vessels, which they broke, when occasion required, and took such a quantity as seemed necessary ^l. The lands of the Persians were free from all taxes, but other provinces, besides money, were obliged to contribute considerably, each something of their proper product, towards the maintenance of the king, and in the time of war, of his army ^m. Thus the provinces of Syrene and Barca were, besides the ordinary taxes, assessed at such a quantity of corn as was sufficient to supply 120,000 men; the Satrapis of Babylon maintained the king and his court for four months, and moreover paid him a yearly tribute of 500 young eunuchs. The Ethiopians and adjoining people made a present every ⁿ

(U) Artaxerxes raised one to that dignity, as Ælian (43) informs us, who was not a Persian, but a Mede by birth, for having condemned his own son to death, according to the power which parents had in those days over their children. And Cambyfes being informed that one of the judges had received a bribe, caused him upon conviction to be flay'd alive, and having covered the seat, on which he pronounced the unjust sentence, with his skin, appointed his son in his room, ordering him to sit in the same chair when he pronounced sentence (44). These judges, according to Josephus (45) and Zenobius (46), were seven in number, which they gather from the commission of Artaxerxes to Ezra, who was sent of the King and his seven counselors (47).

(W) This conjecture is not altogether groundless: but we cannot help thinking it somewhat strange that the same writer should alledge the authority of Q. Curtius to prove that the antient Persian year contained but 360 days, when that author tells us, in express terms, that the Persian year consisted of 365 days; his words are, Magos trecenti & sexaginta quinque juvenes sequebantur—diebus totius anni pares numero; quippe Persis quoque in totidem dies descriptus est annus (48); that is, the Mages were followed by 365 youths, answering in number to the days of the year; for among the Persians too, the year is divided into 365 days. But Curtius in this, as in many other particulars, was certainly mistaken, since Herodotus, whose authority is of more weight, in speaking of the tributes which Darius Hyaspes laid on the provinces subject to the Persian empire, says, that the Cilicians were obliged to furnish Darius with 360 white horses, that is, one for every day of the year (49).

SECTION III.

Of the Religion of the PERSIANS.

THERE is hardly any subject which hath employed the pens of authors ancient or modern, that deserves to be treated with greater accuracy, or to be read with more attention than this which we are now about to discuss. The religion of the Persians, if we may credit the most learned and industrious writers*, is venerable from its antiquity, and worthy of admiration, from its having subsisted now some thousand years, in as great or greater purity than any other religion known to us at this day. But the accounts which are still extant of the religion of the ancient Persians are far from corresponding exactly, and the descriptions which modern travellers have given us of those who profess this religion in Persia and India, even in our time, differ so widely, though not indeed in essential articles, that it requires no small degree of patience to separate the ore from the dross, and to present the reader with what is worthy of being known and believed among heaps of fables and misrepresentations (A).

The importance of this subject, and the difficulties which occur in treating of it.

* Vid. Hist. Relig. Veter. Persar. per THOMAS HYDE, 4to, Oxon. 1700. The religion of the Perses by HEN. LORD, 4to, London 1630. Relation de l'Etat present de Perse par SANSON, Paris 1695. Connection of the history of the Old and New Testament, by Dean PRIDEAUX, Vol. I. p. 299. 8vo, Lond. 1729. HERBERT'S, DELLA VALLE'S, TAVERNIER'S travels, &c.

(A) The accounts we have of the Persian religion, are as we have stated them above of two sorts; first, such as have been collected from books; and these again may be divided into two classes, one extracted from the Greek and Latin writers, the other from Oriental historians; the second consists of what travellers deliver from their own knowledge, concerning the doctrines and practices of the present Persians, who themselves affirm, and are allowed by others, to practise the religion of their ancestors with little or no variation. As to such as have drawn their materials from books, they have been, as we shall frequently have occasion to shew, prodigiously misled in their opinions by authors who have too confidently delivered their own on this subject. For as to the Greek writers, such as Herodotus, Strabo, &c. they delivered what they had from others, and that likewise under this disadvantage, that being polytheists themselves, they of course conceived that other nations had variety of gods as well as their own; and therefore reported that the Persians worshipped the fire, because they prayed before it; the air, because in their devotions they lift up their eyes towards it; and the sun, because they professed to reverence that glorious planet (1). Nor was this all, they forged for the sake of making their histories uniform, such sacrifices and other religious rites as seemed to correspond best with the notions which they had framed of the Persian religion, and attributed them to the Persians. Thus Herodotus, speaking of the passage of Xerxes into Greece, relates impossible things of the Magi, with as much boldness as if he had been eye-witness of them. "The country" (says he) "that lies about the mountain Pangæus is called Phyllis; on the west side, extending to the river Angites, which falls into the Strymon itself. At their arrival the Magi offered a sacrifice of white horses to this river; and after they had thrown them into the stream with a composition of various drugs, the army broke up, and marched to the Nine Ways of the Edonians, where they found bridges prepared for their passage over the Strymon. But being informed that this place was called by the name of the Nine Ways, they took nine of the sons and daughters of the inhabitants, and buried them alive, as the manner of the Persians is. And I have heard that Amestris, the wife of Xerxes, having attained to a considerable age, caused fourteen children of the best families in Persia to be interred alive, for a sacrifice of thanks to that god, who, they say, is beneath the earth (2)." We have shewn in the text, that the Persians were indeed reverencers of water as well as fire, but that they sacrificed to it, or threw any thing into a running stream, is a flat contradiction to this very notion of theirs, which consisted in preserving the purity of those elements,

If we had still any considerable collection of the ancient Persian records, we should doubtless find in them what would satisfy us as to the primitive doctrines of their wise men; but as these are most of them either long since destroyed, or at least are hidden from us, we must be content to follow such lights as yet remain, and where we cannot make the reader understand things as clearly as we would, it is our duty to make them however as clear as we can. This is certain, that the Persians have preserved the worship of one God, and other essential articles of true religion ^b through a long course of ages, without suffering themselves to be drawn over by fraud, or submitting through force, to any new faith, though they have so often changed their masters; a thing very singular, and in some sort commendable, if we consider how much they have been depressed, since the death of Xezdegberd, the last king of their own religion, and the opprobrious treatment they have met with from the Mohammedans, who are wont to call them and christians with like contempt infidels; though the principles of the former as well as the latter are far more reasonable than the ill connected legends of the Arabian impostor; and though the modern Persians (taking that proper name in a religious, not a civil sense) are unanimously acknowledged to be as honest, as charitable and inoffensive a people as any upon earth. So that in God's due time, we have just reason to believe they will at last acknowledge the truth of the gospel dispensation, and be included within the pale of the christian church (B).

and not in polluting them with blood and dead carcasses; and in respect to sacrifices, Herodotus himself in another place acknowledges as much (3). Q. Curtius with like hardiness describes the chariot of Darius, in which he appeared in the field against Alexander; "it was adorned (says he) with images of their gods in silver and gold, the axle-tree thereof glittered with precious stones; upon it were two images of gold, the one representing Ninus, the other Belus, of a cubit stature each; between them was an eagle of gold displaying her wings over both, &c. (4)." All this is downright fiction; Ninus and Belus were never worshipped by the Persians; they were not wont to erect images, or to worship them; what makes it probable, that Curtius was the inventor of this whole story, is this; that Arrian (5), an author of great accuracy, and who wrote from excellent materials, says not one word of all this; nor indeed does any other ancient historian. But Curtius was so great a rhetorician that he could not write plainly, but on the contrary loaded all his descriptions with ornaments without any regard to probability or truth. As to the relations of travellers, we need not wonder that they differ about the religious opinions, rites and ceremonies of the Persians, or as some call them Persees, since they very seldom agree exactly, even in their descriptions of less intricate things than these. As for Henry Lord, whose small treatise in relation to these people has been received as a kind of oracle, merely because he ventured to talk very authoritatively therein; it is scarce possible to determine from what he says, whether they are idolaters or not: he calls them so, it is true, and speaks of their worshipping the fire in an idolatrous manner; yet the better part of his book, which consists of what he heard from one of their priests, contains nothing which can justify his opinion (6). On the whole we have thought it necessary to peruse, and shall on occasion make use of whatever is related by Herbert, Ovington, Tavernier, Therouet, Chardin, or other travellers concerning the Persees, their tenets and customs; but it is our happiness to follow a more capable guide than any of these; the very learned and judicious doctor Thomas Hyde, who from the mighty stores of various learning, which he possessed as well as from the curious observations he in his travels had made, composed his valuable history of the religion of the ancient Persians, wherein every thing he lays down is supported by ancient monuments, or by the express authority of that law which this people professed to have received from Zerdusht, a compendium of whose writings contained in the book Sad-der, the Encbiridion of the modern Persees, is annexed to the doctor's treatise (7).

(B) Since the introduction of the Mohammedan religion into Persia, the ancient inhabitants have been exposed to various persecutions on account of their religion; for the Mohammedans being generally speaking bigots, they are not content with giving these unhappy men always ill language, but on every occasion are stirring up their princes to oppress and destroy under colour of religion these relics of the ancient Persians. It is true the Mohammedan Persians have in all ages had amongst them some men of learning and genius; yet few or none have ever enquired thoroughly into the doctrines of these poor people: on the contrary, they are as ready as any to load them with opprobrious names, and such as they no way deserve; thus they call them Nogusha, i. e. Zabian, or deserter of the true faith; Gibshri, i. e. infidel: this word is differently spelt as it is differently pronounced, the most usual way of writing it is Gibaur; they likewise style an ancient Persian Ateb-perest, i. e. fire-worshipper; Philoo or Calio, i. e. fool or madman; the most gentle term they make use of is Mogh, that is, Magian, but then they frequently say that a Mogh is Ateb-perest and Zindik, that is, a fire-worshipper and a Sadducee: for among other calumnies with which they load these poor men, that of denying a future state is one. However, though they may amongst themselves destroy their good name, yet with strangers their aspersions do the Persians no hurt; for they looking on the innocence and integrity of these poor peoples lives, cannot avoid affording them both pity and esteem: it would be an easy matter to support all that has been advanced in this note by quotations from the best accounts we have

- a WE have heretofore shewn that the original inhabitants of Persia descended from Elam the son of Shem^a; and from these two patriarchs, it is most probable they derived the true religion, which at first flourished among them with the utmost purity, but in process of time was corrupted by an intermixture of superstitious rites and heretical opinions; at such time as the rest of the oriental nations were overspread with that deluge of false religion, which generally goes under the name of Zabism. From this, it is affirm'd by some ancient authors, they were thoroughly recovered by the patriarch Abraham, who, they say, undertook the reformation of their religion, and having freed it as well from the pernicious doctrines they had imbibed, as from the superfluous ceremonies they had adopted, left it them once more in its pure and primitive condition and simplicity, wherein he transmitted it to his own descendants^b. But if this were so, they were a second time corrupted and engaged, if not in idolatrous practices, yet in suspicious acts of reverence to the heavenly bodies, and in practices inconsistent with the true faith (C).

HOWEVER the splendor of their religion might be darkened with these spots, yet it was never so far obscured as to admit any degree of comparison between it and the worship of neighbouring nations (excepting the Jews;) for the Persians continued zealous adorers of one all-wise and omnipotent God; whom they held to be infinite and omnipresent; so that they could not bear that he should be represented by either molten or graven images, or that the creator and lord of the universe should be circumscribed within the narrow bounds of temples^c; on this account they overturned the statues and places of publick worship among the Greeks as unworthy of the deity, and not, as they have been falsely charged by the Greeks, from any sacrilegious contempt of the gods of other countries. In the decline indeed of the ancient Persian empire, the worship of Venus was introduced by one of their princes; but it was condemned by the Magi^d, who remained firm to this great article of their faith, There is one God, and took care to transmit it religiously to their posterity.

They were always zealous in the service of One God.

THE only objection to which the ancient and modern Persians have rendered themselves liable, flows from the respect which they have constantly paid to fire and to the sun; yet if this matter be seriously and impartially considered, it will be found that there is nothing of idolatry in this respect of theirs, but that they only worship God in the fire, and not fire as a God. That they should have an extraordinary veneration for the element of fire, and make choice rather of it than of any of the rest, have of Persia and the Indies; but instead of fatiguing the reader, it may perhaps answer the same end, if we here set down the five precepts which these Persians acknowledge as the rule of life, which every Behedin or Lay-man is bound to obey, as they are reported by Mr. Lord.

An account of the nature of that respect shewn by them to fire and to the sun.

I. "To have shame ever with them, as a remedy against all sin; for a man would never oppress his inferiors if he had any shame; a man would never steal, if he had any shame; a man would never bear false witness, if he had any shame; a man would never be overcome with drink, if he had any shame. But because this is laid aside, men are ready to commit any of these, and therefore the Behedin or Lay-man must think of shame.

II. "To have fear always present with them, and that every time the eye twinkled or closed his lids together, they should stand in fear at those times of their prayers, lest they should not go to heaven; the thought of which should make them fear to commit sin, for that God sees what manner of ones they are, that look up towards him."

III. "That whensoever they are to do any thing, to think whether the thing be good or bad that they go about, whether commanded or forbidden in the Zendavastaw; if prohibited, they must not do it; if allowed by the book of religion, they may embrace and prosecute the same.

IV. "That whosoever of God's creatures they should first behold in the morning, it should be a

"monitor to put them in mind of their thank-givings to God, that had given such good things for mens service and use.

V. "That whensoever they pray by day, they should turn their faces towards the sun; and whensoever they prayed by night, they should incline towards the moon: for that they are the two great lights of heaven, and God's two witnesses: most contrary to Lucifer, who loveth darkness more than light."

(C) That the Persian, as well as other religions, receded by degrees from its first principles, and suffered by the introduction of some superstitions, cannot seem strange to any considerate person. The Persians themselves confess it, and acknowledge that their famous lawgiver Zerdush came to restore their primitive doctrines, and to purge away those errors which time and the industry of Zabian hereticks had introduced. In what these errors consisted, the superstitious ceremonies which attended them, and the pains it cost this restorer of magism to root these foolish superstitions out, will be delivered in the life of Zoroaster or Zerdush, which we shall give the reader at large in our history of the Persians from the Oriental writers under the reign of that monarch in whose days he flourished; for to have inserted so long a digression here, must have rendered this chapter very prolix, and at the same time obliged us to frequent recapitulations in the subsequent history.

to be the symbol to them of the divine nature, will appear less extraordinary, if we consider that a never-dying fire was kept on the altar of burnt-offerings at Jerusalem^a, that God revealed himself to Moses by a flame in a bush^b, and chose to testify his presence in the host of Israel by a pillar of fire, which went before them in the night, and which appeared only as a column of smoke in the day^c. As to their veneration of the sun, it is founded on their belief, that he is the noblest creature of the Almighty visible to us, and that his throne is placed therein: Nor need we wonder either at the mistakes of ancient writers, or at the stories told us by some Mohammedan authors on this head, since it was very difficult for them to get a true knowledge of the religious tenets and customs of this people, because they were forbidden by their legislator Zoroaster or Zerdusht, as appears from the book Sad-der, to teach either their ancient language, or its character to strangers, or to instruct them in their religion^d. If any farther regard had been had to the sun in ancient times, it would certainly have descended with the other parts of their religion to the modern Persians; but that it never reached them, the learned and judicious doctor Hyde assures us: for an intimate friend of his being by him requested to enquire concerning the worship of Mithra, (so the Persians call the sun) he accordingly asked some of the priests of the Persians settled in India, at what seasons, and with what ceremonies they adored the sun? They answered, That they never adored the sun, or paid any sort of divine honours to that luminary, to the moon, or to the planets, but only turned themselves towards the sun when praying, because they looked upon it to come nearest to the nature of fire. The same excellent author observes, that among the precepts of Zoroaster, his disciples are directed to pay daily to the sun certain Niyâsh, i. e. salutations consisting only in words (and those too addressed to God) without any mention of Prestish, i. e. worship by bowing of the body. Yet if any custom of this sort prevails, it ought not to be interpreted as a mark of idolatrous adoration; for the Persian Mohammedans who are zealous detesters of that impiety, and the Armenians who dwell in Persia, are wont to pray in like manner, the latter making the sign of the cross, and bowing profoundly low at the sight of the rising sun^e. To say the truth, adoration, that is, prostrating or bowing the body, was even among the Hebrews a civil as well as a religious rite, or to speak more properly the same word, viz. השתחוה Hishtabbavaab was used to express this act of reverence, when applied to God or man. An eminent rabbin says, that this as an act of devotion was not to be performed out of the sanctuary, that is, out of the temple^f; it is forbid by the second commandment to be paid to idols, but as a civil rite, the Jews were at liberty thus to testify their respect to angels, and to persons of very high dignity. On the whole therefore there can be no more reason to suspect these Persians of idolatry on this account, than any other of the Oriental nations, since the sun is no more than the Kibla (D) of the Persians, as the temple of Jerusalem was to the Jews, and that of Mecca is to the Mohammedans, who in this respect are so scrupulous that they have tables to determine the bearing of Mecca^g, from whatever place they are in.

The Mithras of the Persians never esteemed a deity.

As to the notions which the Persians have of the sun, they are not, as we shall see hereafter, perfectly agreed in them; some believing the throne of God placed therein, and that it is the seat of paradise; others entertaining a different opinion as to paradise, but praying nevertheless towards the sun as a symbol of the deity on account of its purity. It is farther certain, that the Persians never called Mithra a god, or ascribed to it any name of the divinity; and so far from directing any

(D) That is the point of adoration, such as Daniel in particular is said to have practised when he prayed with his face turned towards the holy city^a. This is not a proper place to inquire, how such a notion of directing one's prayers towards any holy place, or peculiar point of the compass, became so generally received. If the inquisitive reader would have a more exact account of this matter than it is proper in such a note as this to give him, he may have recourse to the works of the learned Mr. John Gregory of Oxford

(8), who in treating of two texts of scripture which seem to have some relation to this point (9), hath shewn a consummate knowledge in various kinds of literature, as well as a genius perfectly well turned for such intricate and abstruse inquiries. For us it is sufficient that the fact is as we have stated it; since whether it be right or wrong, the Persians must be as much in the right, or as little in the wrong, as any other nation which hath fallen into this way of thinking.

- a petitions thereto, they constantly begin and end the ejaculations pronounced before the sun with the praises of the most high God, to whom alone their prayers are addressed *. As to the fire before which the Persians worship, taking that word in an extended sense, they acknowledge nothing of divinity therein, but esteeming it a symbol of the deity, they first prostrate themselves before it, and then standing up they pray to God. Thus among the ruins of the ancient palace at Persepolis there are seen many marble statues of kings standing praying to God before the figures of the sun and fire, which are also placed on the wall before them, only one figure is seen kneeling with the same symbols before it as the rest. As the fire in the temple
- b was reputed sacred among the Jews, so the Persians might from them take this custom of praying before sacred fires; which is the more likely, since it was the manner of God's chosen people to prostrate themselves before the altar, and then to offer up their petitions. It was also a custom among the Persians to tender oaths before the fire upon the altar, in which also they agreed with the Jews, as they did farther in offering their victims, and other offerings either by or upon it †, and in preserving it from being polluted by impure fuel, in which last case the Persians went so far as to punish offenders with death. Their kings also and principal persons were wont sometimes to feed the sacred fires with precious oils and rich aromatics, styling these Epule Ignis or fire dainties ‡; but still all things done to or by fire were performed to the honour of God, and terminated solely in him; at least, if we may credit the concurring testimonies of Persic writers yet remaining, and the constant asseverations of those who still profess this religion (E).

- There is yet another point in which the Persians are to be vindicated before we can leave the learned reader satisfied, that they never were idolaters. It is this: they had amongst them after the time of Zoroaster's reformation of their religion certain caves, adorned not only with figures of the sun but of the planets, and other heavenly bodies, which symbolical representations were called Mitbriac figures, and were afterwards introduced into other nations, where they became objects of idolatrous worship; but they were far from being so among the Persians, who were a
- d wise and well-instructed people; for with them they served only as mathematical symbols for preserving the true system of the universe; to which end, and to no other, they were used, and perhaps invented by Zoroaster himself, as we shall hereafter have occasion to prove at last, when we come to speak of the life, doctrines, and writings of that famous man §.

Nor any other symbolical representations.

- HAVING thus shewn in general the nature of the Persian religion, and that it was far preferable to any of the systems received in other nations either in the east or in the west, we shall proceed to shew what the Persians themselves have taught concerning the establishment of their religion, as well as what are the doctrines as to essential points universally received amongst them.

- e THE great fame of Abraham, which from a concurrence of various causes had diffused itself throughout the whole east, induced the Persians as well as the Zabians

(E) When we consider the point in dispute, which is plainly this, Whether the ancient Persians had rational or irrational notions of the deity or not? and what degree of evidence there is on each side; it may seem surprizing, that it is yet made a matter of dispute among the learned. Herodotus, who elsewhere tells us strange stories of the religious ceremonies of the Persians on hearsay, speaking expressly on this head, says all that can be wished or desired in their favour; for he owns that the ancient Persians had neither temples, altars, nor images, and therefore we ought rather to regard this than the other parts of his book, wherein he manifestly relates what other Greek writers, full of spleen against Xerxes and his successor, had written of their inhuman sacrifices, and other acts of religious cruelty (10). Xenophon's authority would be of great weight in the present case, if he had writ decisively, and spoken things of his own knowledge; but the high commendations he has given the Persians, and the mighty character he hath afforded their laws, hath begot a doubt in the minds of the learned, whether he did not mingle his own ideas with the accounts he gives us of the customs and manners of the Persians (11). Plutarch in a passage hereafter more fully cited speaks very respectfully of Zoroaster, and ascribes nothing to him unworthy of a very wise man. There were some, he tells us, of the ancients who asserted two supreme beings, the one the author of all good, the other of all evil. Others who admitted but one God, the father of good, but who acknowledged there was a demon from whom all evil proceeded; this last, says he, was the doctrine of Zoroaster, who flourished four thousand years before the Trojan war (12). The same author then proceeds to a succinct account of the doctrine of the Magi, which we shall have occasion to insert in our text. Dr. Hyde has produced an authentick relation.

to ascribe the system of doctrines received by them to that venerable patriarch, styling their faith at all times Kish-Abraham. They likewise ascribe the books which they hold sacred to this father of the faithful, and as much believe him to be the author of their Sosh or bible, as we believe the gospel to have come to us from Christ, or the Mohammedans that God revealed to Mohammed his Koran. In attributing books to Abraham, they agree with the Jews, and with the Mohammedans, the latter ascribing to him no less than ten treatises, perhaps all with the like reason. The Persians say farther, that Abraham, while he resided amongst them, dwelt in the city of Balch, which they from thence style the city of Abraham. But though it must be allowed, that the old Persian religion agreed in many great points with the religion of Abraham, and though it should be admitted that his fame might even in his life-time be with very advantageous circumstances published throughout all Persia, yet it is so far from being evident, that it is scarce probable, he went himself into that country, much less that he executed the office of a prophet there, and resided at Balch. On the contrary it is far more credible, that this notion took rise from the suggestion of Zoroaster, who had his learning and his divinity out of the book of Moses, and other sacred books among the Jews, and that the city of Balch received the appellation of the city of Abraham from Zoroaster on account of his making it the residence of the archimagus or high priest of the religion of Abraham, and not from that patriarch's being supposed to live there at all in ancient times.

The other elements revered by the Persians.

THOUGH fire was held the symbol of the divinity among the Persians, yet the other elements were also highly honoured by them, insomuch that the Greeks and other foreigners, who knew not their religious principles, called them Cultores Elementorum, or worshippers of the elements; a flagrant calumny, since all the respect they paid them, arose from their conceiving them to be the first seeds of all things, wherefore they studied by every method possible to preserve each of them in its primitive purity. On this account they prevented as much as they could the air from being infected by ill smells; and for their officiousness on this head, Herodotus, according to his usual custom, represents them as believing the air a deity. They hold (says he) the whole expanse to be Jupiter. That they might in like manner preserve the earth from impurities, they would not bury their dead therein, but suffered them to be devoured by birds and wild beasts, that finding a tomb in their bowels they might not infect the air; in fine, the preserving all the elements pure, was by them esteemed an act of high piety, and as such, meriting the divine favour in this world, and in the world to come; for in all things they were great affecters of cleanliness, and studious in an especial manner, in avoiding whatever might pollute them. Fire and water, however, were in a peculiar manner the objects of their care, because they were the most liable to be contaminated, and hence the Greeks mistaking the degree of reverence they paid them, declared them, without scruple, worshippers of those elements, and tell us formal stories of the sacrifices offered to both. It is very true, that kings often do extravagant things, and such as are contrary to the civil and religious laws of the countries they govern; so that it is not impossible that some of the Persian princes might be guilty of what is laid to their charge: but it is not likely, because the Persians universally held that whoever wilfully polluted either fire or water, deserved death in this world, and everlasting punishment in that to come; and that whoever threw the bones of dead creatures into waters were certainly damned. For these reasons the Magi, where-ever they were, took care to have all the waters in their neighbourhood watched, assigning them keepers, lation of the sentiments of the ancient Persians on this subject, as collected from their successors the Persians settled in India, an abstract of which will likewise be inserted in our text (13), and the curious reader may peruse the whole of it in the treatise of the excellent author beforementioned. In the same place may be found the testimony of Shariffan, who wrote in Arabick an account of the religions of the east, and who in speaking of the faith of the Persians, does them all the justice that can be (14); but what is of far greater consequence to us than any authority of friends or enemies whatsoever, the book Sadder, containing the essence of the Persian faith, is not only extant among the Persians, but even amongst ourselves, and every page therein affords us instances of Zoroaster's wisdom, and of the rectitude of the religion he established as to fundamental points, and especially as to the belief of one infinitely wise, eternal, self-existent being (15).

- a keepers, whose sole office it was to look carefully to this matter, and to see that no filthy thing was thrown or dropped into them, and for this they had stables, and well settled salaries. For abhorring, as they did, the representing the almighty lord of heaven and earth, by artificial images of stone or metal, they chose to preserve fire and water in their utmost purity, that they might serve for symbols of the divine nature, and put them in mind of the infinite purity of God. As they held the ministration of angels, so they believed that one of these celestial guards was appointed to watch over the waters in general; this angel they called Ardisur or Arduisur, for whom a particular Niyâish or salutation was prescribed, the title of which in their ancient books runs thus, Hymn to Ardisur for the benefits received from the sea, rivers, wells, and fountains. In this hymn they praised him for taking care of all these places, and prayed that he might continue so to do, returning God thanks for the various uses made of water, and the mighty advantages resulting to mankind from his wise disposition thereof, throughout the earth. They were of opinion, that in paradise such people were peculiarly blessed, as had been careful of defiling water, and had in this sense preserved a respect for that element during their lives, for which cause they recommended the care of this element, as well as fire, to their women, that is their private fires, and the water used in their houses; for it does not appear that they ever admitted women to minister in religious matters except in the mysteries of Venus, which, as we observed before, was a heresy, and as such detested by the orthodox Magians. This love to purity, and especial regard to water, may stand sufficiently justified by the practice of the Jews, and the precepts in their law for corporal purification, as well as by the great advantage of preserving cleanliness in those excessive hot climates; especially if we consider that in washing the hands, &c. and putting on the garments, they were bound to use solemn forms of prayer, as indeed there were set ejaculations to be used in the performance of the most ordinary actions of human life.

with which

- With respect to the use they made of fire in their national religion, the priests who attended it by no means deserved the appellation of Ignarii Sacerdotes; i. e. fire-priests, for they were truly Sacerdotes Dei, priests of the almighty, who though, like the Jewish priests they waited on, and took care to preserve the sacred fire from being extinguished; yet this was far from being their only duty: for these, as well as those, read every day publick prayers, and did other sacerdotal offices, as we shall hereafter declare more largely. Yet such has been the hard fate of these people, that because their principles were not known, and their ceremonies ill understood, they have been branded with the name of Ategh-perest, i. e. fire-worshippers; so dangerous a thing it is to carry to any excess even innocent ceremonies. They never confessed their sins to any but to God, nor besought a remission of them from any but from him; yet they inclined to perform these publick acts of devotion before the symbol of the deity; that is, before fire, or before the sun, as the witness of their actions. In like manner the Jews confessed their sins to God in the temple, the fire flaming on the altar near them, so that there was nothing of idolatry in this, though it might not be altogether free from some spice of superstition (F).

* HÛB, c. vi. p. 137.

(F) If we were to undertake a critical review of what modern authors have written about these people and their opinions, it would require a far larger treatise than this whole chapter. This assertion, bold as it may seem, shall give such a pregnant instance of it, as will sufficiently prove the truth of my observation. Mr. Tavernier has spent about fifteen pages in his account of these people, in which there are at least fifty capital mistakes, which any man may discover who is at all versed in Oriental literature. In his section of the origine and prophecy of this sect, he confounds Zerdusht with Abraham in such a manner, that it would cost a great deal of time to determine what part of the story belongs to the one and what to the other. He tells us of a king whom he calls Nabonazar, probably Nimrod, and ascribes to him things that no body ever heard of before; nay the very name he has given the prophet is sufficient to show how much he was confused on this subject, and consequently how little credit is due to what he relates of the religion of the Gaurs or Gabres, as he calls them. Their prophet's name, as set down by him, was Ebrahim-zer-Ateuch; he tells us of books he received from heaven, that they contain these religious precepts of these people, and that he himself has seen a great book which was attributed to him. But I must desire the reader to take notice, that I do not arraign Mr. Tavernier's sincerity as to facts which lay within the compass of his judgment; on the contrary, we are persuaded that he wrote nothing which he did not take to be true, as appears by the following account of their worship of the fire, which is the title of one of his sections: "The Gaurs render no such honours to the fire as agreed with this term of worship, they are not idolaters, they acknowledge one God, the creator of the heaven and of the earth, and him only they profess to worship." In the rest of his sections he speaks distinctly enough of what he saw; but he relates what he heard in such a manner, that a person who knew as little of the matter as he, could or temples.

IN the most ancient times the Persians had no temples at all, but rear'd altars, ^a whereon they preserved their sacred fires on the tops of mountains, and other solitary places ². It was Zoroaster who persuaded them, for the sake of preserving these fires more conveniently, to erect over each of them a Pyraeum, or fire-temple, but this had no relation to Mithra, or the sun, towards whom they could better testify their respect in the open air; neither did it subvert their ancient principle, that the lord of the universe ought not to be enclosed within walls, for their Pyrae did not circumscribe what they esteemed an image or semblance of the divinity, but only the symbol of his purity, and as it were a shadow of his nature. The overturning therefore of the Greek temples by Xerxes, and other acts of a like nature, were perfectly consistent with their reverence for fire, and their respect for the sun. ^b Of this though many Greek and Oriental writers were entirely ignorant, and were consequently prone to misrepresent them, yet authors of great candor, and more extensive knowledge, have readily acknowledged it, and testify'd to the honour of the Persians, that they worshipped only one God, without representing him by any image or picture whatsoever ³.

Their notions of good and evil beings.

THE Persians in early times acknowledged one eternal and omnipotent being, the creator and preserver of all things; him they called Yezad, Izad, or Izud, also Ormuzd, Hormuz, or Hormizda; joining this with the modern name they say Ilormizda Chodâ; O supreme God. They acknowledge also an evil created being whom they styled Abariman, Abreman, or Abriman, and in verse Abrimanan, which ^c signifies amongst them the devil. To shew their detestation of this wicked being, his name in the ancient Persian books was thus wrote, uom:spqy to intimate that as he was the implacable and perpetual enemy of mankind, so they maintained an everlasting enmity against him and all his works. The modern Persians call the devil Div ⁴.

SOME have asserted that the ancient Persians held a co-eternity of these two principles, but writers better acquainted with the true tenets of this nation agree, that Abariman was created out of darkness, and that Oromasdes first subsisted alone, that by him the light and darkness were created, that in the composition of this world good and evil are mixed together, and so shall continue till the end of all things, when each shall be separated and reduced to its own sphere. ^d Plutarch, who was a very ingenious and a very inquisitive man, hath given us a long account of the doctrines of Zoroaster, very conformable to what has already been said, and agreeing perfectly well with the religion of the ancient patriarchs, except in a few strokes of fable, which were either inferred by the mistake of the reporter of that abstract, or were invented by Zerdusht to account for those things which surpass human understanding ⁵. Some have endeavour'd to account for the origin of the prince of darkness thus. Oromasdes, say they, said once within his mind, how shall not fail of being deceived (16). Sir John Chardin, whom we have often commended, and who without all question was one of the most intelligent men that ever obliged the publick with an account of his travels, speaks very contemptibly of these people; and would have us believe there is no sort of learning amongst them, but a little astrology; he says, their priests talk confusedly of their religion, and that they were not positive themselves as to the place where their sacred fire was kept (17). But though this gentleman was not so happy as to meet with intelligent persons of this religion, others have; and the accounts they have written are clear and satisfactory, nay and supported by undeniable evidence. M. Le Brun by the interposition of the English agent had a conversation with one of their priests, from whom he learned many things exactly conformable to what we have delivered. It would therefore be needless to insert that conversation here, but it may not perhaps be amiss to give the answer of the priest to M. Le Brun's first question what he thought of the creation of the world, and the power of God. He said he believed God to be the being of beings, a spirit of light, above the comprehension of human understandings, infinite, in all places, almighty, from whom nothing could be hid, and against whose will nothing could be done. This conference happened in the month of January, 1707 (18). As to the Pyrae or fire-temples, they were formerly as frequent as parish churches in other countries; but since the destruction of the ancient Persians these structures are by no means common. The Perses content themselves with saying their prayers before the common fires, and their priests officiate before them likewise. They have however fire-temples or fire-chapels still in some places, and the chief of them is supposed to be in the province of Kerman, where there are more Gauis than in any other part of Persia. Anciently their temples were splendid, and said to have been dedicated not only to the sun, but to the rest of the planets, in which however there was no more idolatry, than there is in our dedicating churches to this or that saint (19).

The souls of men according to them were at first unbodied spirits, but the Almighty resolving to make use of them in warring against Abriman, clothed them with flesh, promising them that the light should never forsake them till Abriman and all his servants were subdued; after which the resurrection of the dead is to follow, with the separation of the light from the darkness, and the coming of the kingdom of peace. To say the truth, the notions they have of the beginning of all things, the state of our first parents, the attempts made on them by the prince of darkness, the last judgment, the salvation of the good, and the punishment of the bad, differ very little from what is delivered to us in the scripture on these heads. Only they have a long account of the war between God and the author of evil, which they say ended in a complete victory gained over the latter, and his adherents, who were constrained to surrender at discretion. That the Almighty did not annihilate his enemies, because without opposition his attributes could not have appeared with such lustre as they now do (G). That the world had existed three thousand years before this decisive battle, the whole of its duration being fixed to twelve thousand. That after this defeat, God by holding up three fingers, gave the evil-one leave to chuse which three thousand years of the nine thousand yet to come he would please to take, wherein to trouble and vex mankind; whereupon he chose the middlemost. Before, say they, this power was given to Abriman, man lived in a state of innocence; but that since his fall, war, and all other evils, have been introduced; that these however shall in time pass away, and man live again for a certain space in peace and glory. They place the day of judgment at the end of twelve thousand years; and as to the damned, they assert that they shall be punished according to the heinousness of their crimes, two angels being appointed to be the inspectors of their sufferings: at last however even these are to be pardoned, but never to be admitted to the joys of the blessed, but to remain in a certain place by themselves, and to wear in their foreheads a black mark as a badge of that state from whence through the mercy of God they were freed^b.
- c THE point in which the Persians differ most from us is as to the manner of God's <sup>Of its creaation.</sup> creating the world, which they say happened not in six days, but in six seasons, each season containing many days; the first of these they style Mid-yuzeram, containing forty-two days; in this, say they, the heavens were created with all things belonging to them. The second they style Mid-yusham, containing sixty days, wherein the waters were created. The third is by them named Pitjhabim, including seventy-five days, in this the earth was made. The fourth they called Iyaseram, including thirty days, wherein were made the trees. The fifth goes under the name of Midiyarim, containing eighty days, in which all living creatures received being. The last they style Hamefpitamidim, comprehending seventy-five days, wherein was made man^c.

It is now time for us to speak of the rites and ceremonies of the Persees, antient and modern, in the exercise of their religion, and every thing relating thereto. They have a regular clergy, and are very zealous in asserting an uninterrupted suc-

(G) In the course of ages it is not to be wondered; that false notions crept into their religion in some places; as among the Magi of Cappadocia, who not only worshipped with idolatrous circumstances their sacred fires, but also introduced images in their temples. But that heresy, which of all others threatened the religion of Zoroaster most was Manichæism; for Mani that arch-heretick resided long in Persia, and there broached his absurd notion of two eternal self-existent beings, and by mingling the doctrines of Magism and Christianity, made up a monstrous system of incredible doctrines, attended with very ridiculous practices (20). However these notions were rooted out, as will be hereafter shewn by the authority of the civil magistrates, so that the present Persees have almongst them none of these whimsical chimeras, but retain the doctrine of their ancestors in all its purity, and are a religious as well as a most inoffensive people, tenacious of their own principles, but complaisant to other people, though very reserved; from whence proceeds the many mistakes that have been made about them. When they do speak they never fail to express themselves in such a manner as fully purges all suspicion of their being idolaters; but they cannot help shewing on such occasions an inveterate dislike against two persons celebrated by the greatest part of mankind as heroes and conquerors, but looked on by them as murderers and robbers. These are Alexander the Great and Mohammed, both capital enemies of their country and nation (21).

cession of persons instructed in their sacred mysteries, from the time of Zerdusht to this day. Their ordinary priests are obliged to live according to certain rules, much more severe than those given to the laity, as the reader will perceive at the bottom of the page. Their high priests were under still stricter obligations, and all of them were bound to discharge their sacerdotal offices with mighty exactness and devotion^a. As to their public worship, it was, and is still thus performed: in every pyraeum, or fire-temple, there stood an altar, on which burnt the sacred fire, which was always kept alive by the priest. When the people assembled in order to their devotions, the priest put on a white habit, and a mitre, with a gause or cloth passing before his mouth, that he might not breathe on the holy element: thus he read certain prayers out of the Liturgy, which he held in one hand, speaking very softly, and in a whispering sort of tone, holding in his left hand certain small twigs of a sacred tree, which as soon as the service was over he threw into the fire. At these times all who were present put up their prayers to God, for such things as they stood in need of, and when prayers were finished, the priest and people withdrew silently, and with all other tokens of awful respect. All these rites are still observed. But to prevent, as far as possible, the people from falling into idolatry, the priest now informs them, when they are going from their devotions, of the reasons why they worship before the fire, and all the obligations they are under to treat it with reverence. This exhortation runs usually in these words: "Forasmuch as fire was delivered to Zerdusht by the almighty, as the symbol of his majesty, wherefore it was required that we should esteem it holy, and respect it as an emanation from the fountain of light, and that we should love all things which resemble it, especially the sun and moon, the two great witnesses of God, the sight of which should put us in mind of his omniscience; therefore, let us, without superstition, keep the command given us, evermore praising God for the great usefulness of this element, and beseeching him to make us always bear in mind the obligations we are under to do our duty towards him, which is as necessary to the health and happiness of the mind, as light and fire are to the ease and welfare of the body" (H).

Festivals.

THEY keep yearly six festivals, each of five days continuance, in memory of the six seasons, wherein all things were created; after each of these feasts they keep a fast of five days in memory of God's resting five days as they believe at each of those seasons. As often as they eat either flesh, fowl, or fish, they carry a small

(H) Among the ancient Magi there were three degrees of priests, ordinary priests, overseers of these, and an archimagus like our archbishop, or rather a metropolitan, who was acknowledged for the successor of Zoroaster, and held the supreme head of their church. These in the old Persian language were stiled Mugh, i. e. Magus, Mubad, i. e. superintendent, and Mubad, Mubadan, or high priest (22). LORD in his account of the religion of the Persians calls them by other names, viz. Daroi, Herbonds, and Dissecois; the last he makes equivalent to Mubad Mubadan, and says there is never any more than one chief of the clergy of the Perses at a time. As to the duty of their priests, the same writer tells us, that it is comprised in the eleven rules following, viz. 1. The observing the rites prescribed in the liturgy of Zoroaster, because God is best pleased with that form of prayer which he has prescribed. 2. To keep his eyes from coveting that which is another's, for God having given to every man what seems meet for him in his eyes, to desire that which is another's, is not only shewing a dislike of God's providence, but is likewise affronting him by challenging that for our due which he hath denied us. 3. To have a care always to speak the truth, for all truth cometh from God; all lyes from the devil: all priests therefore should speak truth, because they are the servants of the God of truth, and as such are created in what they say. 4. To keep close to his business, and not meddle with worldly matters, for it belongs to the layman to see the priest wants nothing that is necessary, and to the priest not to desire any thing which is superfluous. 5. To get the book of the law by heart, that he may be always able to instruct the poor layman, and that he may see just cause to reverence his priest. 6. To keep himself pure and undefiled, because God loves the pure and undefiled, and this way only one man can excel another. 7. To be ready to forgive all injuries, shewing himself a pattern of meekness that he may be thought one come from God, for we offend God every day, yet he giveth us things that are good, though we deserve that he should pour on us evil for evil. 8. To teach the common people to pray according to the law, to go and pray with them for publick benefits when they desire it, and to perform constantly the known duties of his function. 9. To give licence for marriage to join the man and woman together, and to take care that parents do not marry their children without his approbation. 10. To spend the greatest part of his time in the temple, that he may be ready to assist all who come to him, because thereto God hath appointed him. 11. To believe no other law than that given by Zerdusht, to add nothing thereto, nor to take any thing from it, seeing to this end it was revealed (23).

a part of it to the temple as an offering to God, beseeching him that he would pardon them for taking away the lives of his creatures in order to their own subsistence. They have none of those out-of-the-way notions relating to cleanness and uncleanness in meats, which expose some religions to ridicule; but as they are a very complaisant as well as inoffensive people, they abstain from swine's flesh, and from the flesh of kine, that they may neither offend the Mohammedans nor the Banians, among whom they are obliged to live. They eat alone, for the sake of purity and cleanliness; they likewise drink every man out of his own cup^f.

WHEN their children are initiated into their religion they send for a priest, and this is usually done as soon as the child is born. The priest calculates its nativity, afterwards he asks what name is to be given it. This being agreed on by the father and its relations, the priest telleth it to its mother, who then says, my child is called so or so, with which the ceremony ends at that time. The child is afterwards carried to the Pyraum, where the priest first pours some water into the rind of a holy tree, and thence into the mouth of the child, beseeching God to cleanse the tender infant from whatever seeds of corruption it may have received from its father, and from the impurities derived from its mother. At seven years of age the child is led to church to be confirmed there, the priest teaches him some prayers, and instructs him in the first principles of religion. These are repeated daily, till he is well acquainted with the articles of his faith; then he is permitted to pray for the first time before the holy fire, after which the priest gives him water to drink, and a pomegranate leaf to chew; then he causes the lad to wash his body with clean water, after which he puts on a linen cassock next his skin, which descends below his waist, and is girt with a girdle of camel's hair, woven by the priest's own hand. These ceremonies over, the priest blesses him, bids him be a true Persee all the days of his life, to beware of falling into idolatry, or breaking any of the precepts given by Zerdusht^g (I). Of their marriages we are told by a very intelligent author, that they have five sorts: First, that of children in their minority. Secondly, that of widowers with a second wife. Thirdly, of such persons as marry by their own choice. Fourthly, the marriage of the dead, which is occasioned by an opinion they have entertained, that married people are peculiarly

(I) As to the high-priest, he over and above the duties enjoined the priests in general is desired to observe the following thirteen precepts (24): 1. He must have a care of polluting himself in any manner, because God hath chosen him to be holy. 2. In order to this he must do all things for himself so preserve himself from being contaminated by the uncleanness of others, as also to shew his humility in so high a station. 3. He is to take the layman's tithes, i. e. the tenth of all that he has, but not to his own use; for he is to consider himself as the almoner of God, who makes use of him only to dispense to the poor the tribute paid by the rich. 4. That this may appear to be fairly done, he must avoid all pomp and superfluity, and at the year's end must give away the last farthing, since his revenue is settled, and always paid with good will. 5. His house must be near the temple, and he must give a good example to his flock by staying much at home, and by giving himself up to prayer. 6. As in his public so in his private life he must be extremely frugal and temperate in all things. 7. He must not only be acquainted with the law, but with all the sciences, (seeing he is to instruct all others of his religion, clergy and laity. 8. He must keep a low diet, because high eating or strong liquors disturb the faculties of the mind, and discompose that serenity of disposition which should be always found in the man of God. 9. He must fear only God, and hate nothing but sin. 10. As he is supreme in all spiritual causes, he must reprove sinners without any regard to their rank, and they must hear him patiently, since he speaks not in his own cause, but God's. 11. He must above all things study to distinguish truth from error. 12. Though in consequence of his high office, he may for his consolation receive visions and other manifestations from God, yet he is not to publish them, for that would but confound the people who are to adhere to the written law. 13. He must preserve the ever-living fire brought by Zerdusht from heaven, that it may endure through all ages till the world shall be destroyed by that element (25).

It is very possible, that the reader in the perusal of this section may incline to wish, that in some things we had delivered ourselves more copiously, and therefore it may not be amiss to inform him, that in treating of the Persian history as delivered by Oriental writers, we shall take occasion to retouch various points relating to the religion of the ancient Persians, because much of their history depends upon them as to inconsiderable customs, such as wearing this or that colour, this or that kind of cap; these we have purposely omitted, as deeming them not worthy of being mentioned in so great a work as this. Let us however note one thing, that their priests at confirmation sell the youth a girdle which he is bound to keep all his life long, and to use it constantly, because when he lays it aside, he no longer enjoys the benefits of the priest's benediction. Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that the English saying ungirt, unblessed, has some allusion to this. happy happy in the other world; wherefore, when a young person dies in celibacy, they hire one to be married to him, or her, which ceremony is performed a little after the burial. The last kind of marriage is where a person adopts either a son or a daughter, and then gives him or her in marriage, which is also founded on a religious opinion, that all men ought to leave heirs behind them, either natural or adopted. As to the ceremonies made use of on this occasion, they are very singular, but at the same time have nothing in them wild or irrational. The parties designing to contract matrimony, are seated together on a bed, about midnight; opposite to them stand two priests, the one for the man, the other for the woman, holding rice in their hands, to intimate the fruitfulness which they wish the new married couple; on each hand of the priests stand the relations of the bride and bridegroom. Things being in this situation, the bridegroom's priest lays his forefinger on the woman's forehead, and says, Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband? The woman assenting, her priest lays his forefinger on the man's forehead, and asks the like question; which being answered in the affirmative, the parties then join hands, the man promises that he will provide her a suitable maintenance, the woman acknowledges that all she has is his; the priests then scatter rice over them, wishing that they may be fruitful, and beseeching God that they may have many sons and daughters, that they may live in unity of mind, and arrive at a good old age, in possession of all the joys of wedlock. The ceremony over, the woman's parents pay the dowry, and a feast of eight days is kept for joy of the marriage^b.

Their burials. As to their burials two things are remarkable, first the place, secondly the manner. First as to the place, they have a round tower erected, on the top of which, the bodies of the dead are laid to be devoured by the fowls of the air; some affirm that they have separate towers for the good and for the bad; others that men, women, and children are placed on several towers, the reason of thus exposing them we have elsewhere given, viz. the preserving the elements pure: for they conceive that by not interring the dead they avoid polluting the earth, and by leaving the corps unprotected from birds of prey, they provide in some measure against the infection of the air. However this custom was anciently esteemed so barbarous by other nations, that one of the apologists for the christian faith, speaking of the good effects it had on mens minds in reforming them from brutal and wicked habits, mentions this expressly, that the Persians since they had received the christian doctrines, no more exposed the bodies of their dead, but afforded them a decent burial. Before we part with this subject, it may not be amiss to observe what is practised among them, when a man is on his death-bed; a priest is in such a case always sent for, and he drawing near the bed, prayeth thus in the ear of the sick man: "O Almighty Lord, thou hast commanded we should not offend thee, this man hath offended; thou hast ordained that we should do good, yet this man hath done evil; thou hast required that we should duly and exactly worship thee, which however this man hath neglected. Now, O merciful God, at the hour of death forgive him his offences, his misdeeds, and his neglects, and receive him to thy self." When he is dead the priest comes not near him; but the corpse is put on an iron bier and carried to the place of interment, the bearers being forbid to speak as they go along out of decency, and also because in the grave there is an unbroken silence. The dead body being placed on the tower, the priest standing at a distance performeth the funeral service, which he concludes thus: "This our brother while he lived consisted of the four elements, now he is dead, let each take his own; earth to earth, air to air, water to water, fire to fire." They suppose that the spirit wanders for three days after its departure from the body, and is in that space pursued and tormented by the devil till it is able to reach their sacred fire, to which he cannot come. They therefore pray morning, noon, and night during these three days for the soul of their deceased brother, beseeching God to blot out his sins, and to cancel all his offences. On the fourth day supposing his fate to be decided they make a great feast, which closes the ceremonies used on this occasion^c.

- a THUS far we thought necessary to say on this copious and controverted subject, chiefly to justify the much misrepresented Persees, from the charge of so senseless an idolatry as the worshipping either the luminaries, planets, or elements. To have enlarged farther upon it, would have led us too far, and exceeded the bounds we must prescribe ourselves in so extensive a work. The curious reader may however, from the authors quoted in the margin, collect himself such a system of the Persee religion, both with relation to their doctrine and practices, as will amply reward all his pains and study. But it is time for us to pass to another part of their history.

S E C T. IV.

- b AS we know but very little of the state of Persia before Cyrus's time, we shall not pretend to give an account of the kings who preceded that prince. We have already shewn*, that Elam or Persia was governed in the earliest times by its own kings, and those very powerful. Cbedorlaomer, the first king of Elam mentioned in scripture, extended his conquests over many provinces of Asia; for Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrab, Sbinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, were his tributaries†. These five princes lived twelve years in subjection to Cbedorlaomer, but in the 13th uniting their forces made an attempt towards the recovery of their former liberty. The king of Elam no sooner heard that they were up in arms, but entering into an alliance with Amraphel king of Sbinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, and Tidal king of nations, he marched out against them, and having first reduced the Rephaims, the Zuzims, the Emims, the Horites, the Amalekites, and the Amorites of Hazezontamar, at last he fell upon the revolvers, put their army to the rout, killed the kings of Sodom and Gomorrab, and having pillaged their cities, marched back towards Elam loaded with the spoils of the conquered nations‡. Lot, who, as Josephus§ informs us, assisted the Sodomites, had the misfortune to be taken prisoner on this occasion, and had been carried into captivity, had he not been timely rescued by Abraham, who pursuing the enemy with a small body of chosen men, came up with them at Dan the fifth day after their victory, put them to flight, and returned in triumph with his brother and all his family redeemed from the insults of a victorious foe. By this overthrow Cbedorlaomer lost the sovereignty of the Pentapolis, but retained his other conquests, which were very considerable. From the reign of this prince to that of Cyrus we know nothing to be relied on but what we have already hinted at in the history of the Medes, viz. that the Elamites or Persians were a great and powerful nation, that they were in all likelihood subdued by the Assyrians¶, but afterwards recovered their ancient liberty, and were governed by princes of their own nation till the ninth year of Nebuchadnezzar, when they were again brought under subjection by that great warrior and his ally Cyaxares king of Media. While they lived in subjection to the Assyrians, Medes and Babylonians, the throne was still filled with natives of Persia, though tributaries to those greater powers. The only royal family we find upon record is that of Achæmenes, which must have been very conspicuous, since Xerxes, when at the height of his glory, was proud to derive from thence his pedigree, which he does in the following manner*:

Achæmenes.	Teispes.	Hystaspes.
Cambyses.	Ariaramnes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arfames.	Xerxes.

Of this great family there were two branches; from the first was descended Cyrus the great, whose issue-male failed in his two sons Cambyfes and Smerdis. Some place the kings of this race in the following manner ^c:

Perfes.	Cyrus.	Cambyfes.
Achæmenes.	Cambyfes.	Smerdis.
Darius.	Cyrus the great.

They will have Perfes, of whom, say they, Persia borrowed its name, to be the first of this family that reigned in Persia. We are told, that Achæmenes was nursed by an eagle ¹; and of this fabulous eagle the no less fabulous wolf of Romulus was perhaps a transcript. Darius is mentioned by Herodotus ², and supposed by some to have coined the famous Darics or Stateres Darici, which supposition is disproved by Herodotus ³, who plainly affirms, that the Persians had neither gold nor silver before the conquest of Lydia. Cyrus had two children, Cambyfes and Atossa; Atossa married Pharnaces king of Cappadocia ⁴, and Cambyfes Mandane the so much celebrated daughter of Astyages king of Media, by whom he had Cyrus the great (A). But as nothing occurs worthy of notice, especially that we can depend upon, in the history of the Persian kings before Cyrus, we shall proceed, without dwelling on so dark and barren a subject, to the reign of that great and glorious prince.

Cyrus. THE name of Cyrus is equally famous in sacred and profane history; in the latter his valour and conquests have rendered his memory immortal, as has in the former his kind treatment of the captive Hebrews, whom he restored to their ancient state, country and temple, having been by the divine will appointed thereunto by name ⁵ many years before he appeared in the world; an honour bestowed upon none but him, and that excellent prince Josiah ⁶ king of Judab. Profane historians are at no small variance with each other touching the birth of this prince, his education and accession to the crown. Herodotus and Xenophon are the only two original authors, as we may call them, whom we can quote and follow in what relates to the life and exploits of this prince; for other writers have copied after them, some adopting the accounts of the one, and some of the other. They are both very minute in their relations, and agree in some particulars, but widely differ in others. We shall in the first place hear Herodotus, the father of history, as Tully calls him; but whether his accounts be genuine, or rather interwoven, and seasoned to the Greek taste, with several fabulous and surprizing incidents, is what we shall have occasion to examine afterwards.

Account of the birth, education, &c. of Cyrus according to Herodotus. Astyages, the last king of the Medes, being warned by a dream that the son, who was to be born of his daughter Mandane, should one day be lord of all Asia, resolved to marry her, not to a Mede worthy of her bed, but to a Persian; and accordingly chose one Cambyfes, sprung from an ancient family, but of a peaceable disposition, and, as he thought, inferior in rank to a Mede, even of a middling condition. A year after they were married, Astyages was frightened by another dream portending anew, according to the interpretation of the Mages, the empire of Asia to his grandson (B). Hereupon Astyages sends for his daughter then big with child, and upon her arrival in Media puts her under a guard, determined to destroy the child she should be delivered of; for the Mages had assured him, that the issue of his daughter was to fill his throne. Mandane not long after her confinement was brought to bed of a son, whom Astyages, mindful of the interpretation of the Mages, delivered to one Harpagus, enjoining him, as he tendered his own life, to take the new-born son of Mandane, to carry him to his house, and there dispatch him with his own hands, in what manner he should think best. Harpagus promised to put the king's orders in execution, and having received from the guards the infant richly dressed, went home under great concern, to see himself employed in so hateful and inhuman an office. He acquainted his wife as soon as he came home

(A) Ovid (1) mentions one Orchamus king of Persia, and makes him the 7th after Belus.

Rexit Achæmenias urbes pater Orchamus, isque Septimus a prisco numeratur origine Belo.

As this king is no where to be found but in Ovid's metamorphoses, what is said of him deserves no more credit than they do.

(B) His first dream was, that his daughter Mandane had voided so great a quantity of water as not only filled the metropolis of the kingdom, but overflowed all Asia. In the other he saw a vine shooting from the womb of his daughter, and extending its branches over all Asia.

a with what had passed between Astyages and himself, and resolved not to execute the sentence with his own hands, but to transfer his charge to another. With this design he immediately sent for one of the king's herdsmen, who kept his cattle in pastures lying at the foot of certain mountains on the north of Ecbatan, towards the Caspian sea. The herdsman's name was Mitradates, and his wife's, in the language of the Medes, Spaco, which signifies a bitch, and answers to her Greek name Cyno. Mitradates without delay waited upon Harpagus, who commanded him, in the king's name, to take the infant and expose it in the most dangerous and abandoned part of the mountains, upon pain of dying in the most exquisite tortures that b could be invented. He added, that the king had charged him to see his orders put in execution. The herdsman, not daring to make any remonstrance against the king's commands, returned with the child to his cottage; where he found his wife just delivered of a son. During her husband's absence, she had been in great trouble and perplexity on account of the message from Harpagus, who had never before sent for him; so that he no sooner set his foot within the door, but she asked him in great surprize, why Harpagus had sent for him in such haste? He told her he had been in the city, where he had heard and seen such things as grieved him beyond expression; that when he arrived, the house of Harpagus was all in tears, and that as he went in, he was struck with horror at the sight of an infant, dressed in gold and the richest colours, panting and crying on the floor; that Harpagus had commanded c him to carry away this child and expose it on the mountains to the mercy of the wild beasts, upon pain of incurring the king's displeasure and undergoing the severest punishments that could be inflicted; that at first he had supposed the unhappy infant to belong to some person of the family of Harpagus, but that he had been afterwards informed by the servant that attended him out of the city and delivered the babe into his hands, that it was born of Mandane the king's daughter, and son to Cambyfes of Persia, and that Astyages had commanded it should be put to death¹.

HAVING thus spoke, he disclosed the child to his wife, who no sooner saw it; but being ravished with the innocent smiles of the infant, embraced her husband, d and with many tears intreated him not to execute the orders he had received. But he remonstrating the absolute necessity he was under of obeying or forfeiting his own life, since the spies of Harpagus would without fail keep a watchful eye over him, and see whether he performed what had been so strictly enjoined him, she suggested to him to take their own child that was still-born, to expose it instead of the other, and bring up the son of Mandane as their own; for by that means, said she, we shall sufficiently consult our own safety without injuring others; the dead child will be honoured with a royal sepulchre, and the surviving infant be preserved from an untimely death².

Mitradates approved of this expedient, and delivering the infant he was charged e to destroy into his wife's hands, dressed the dead child in the rich apparel of the living, and carried it in the same basket, in which he had brought the other, to the most unfrequented part of the mountains. Three days after he acquainted Harpagus, that, if he pleased, he could shew him the dead body of the infant, and he accordingly dispatch'd some of his friends, in whom he most confided, to see that the sentence had been put in execution, and to inter the royal infant. Thus was Cyrus, for so was the infant afterwards called, delivered from the snare of his grandfather, and educated by the herdsman's wife as her own³.

WHEN he attained to the age of ten years, as he was one day playing in the pastures with other children of his age, he was chosen king by his companions, and in virtue of that dignity having distinguished them into several orders and f classes, the son of Artembares, a lord of eminent dignity among the Medes, who was one of his companions in the play, refused to obey his orders. Whereupon Cyrus commanded him to be immediately seized and whipt very severely. The boy with many tears complained to his father of what he had suffered from the herdsman's son, and the father highly resenting the affront, hastened with his son to the king's palace, and shewing the prince in what a cruel and ignominious manner his son had been abused by the son of a slave, entreated him to avenge, by some very exemplary punishment, the indignity offered to him and his whole family. Astyages promised to give him full satisfaction, and commanding both the herdsman and his son to be brought before him, asked Cyrus, how he, who was the son of so mean a man, had dared to abuse the son of one of the chief lords in the kingdom? Cyrus replied, that he had done no more than he had a right to do, for the boys of the neighbourhood having made him their king, because they thought him the most worthy of that dignity, and performed what he, in virtue of that character, had commanded them, the son of Artembares alone had slighted his orders, and for his disobedience had suffered the punishment he deserved. As the boy was pleading his cause with an eloquence far superior to his years and education, Astyages took particular notice of his mien and features, and thinking that he resembled himself, began to reflect on the time that his grandson was exposed, which he found to agree with the age of the herdsman's supposed son. Being perplexed with this thought he dismissed Artembares, assuring him that his son should have no cause to complain, and commanded his guards to conduct Cyrus into the palace. Being then in private with the herdsman, he asked whose boy Cyrus was, and from whose hands he had him? Mithradates affirmed, that he was his own child, and that the boy's mother, who was still living, would come, if he pleased, to attest it. But Astyages giving no credit to what he averred, commanded his guards to seize him, whereupon he discovered without reserve, the whole matter, and implored the king's mercy.

Astyages was not so much incensed against the herdsman, as against his favourite Harpagus, whom he ordered the guards to bring without delay to the palace. Upon his arrival the king in a violent passion asked him in what manner he had put to death the son of his daughter Mandane? When Harpagus saw the herdsman, he thought he should but aggravate his crime, by attempting to elude the storm that threatened him, by any sort of falsehood, and therefore openly confessed what he had done; adding that he thought he had taken the most effectual means he could to put his orders in execution, and that he truly believed the child was dead, since the most trusty among his friends had assured him that they had seen and interred the body.

Astyages dissembling his resentment acquainted Harpagus with what the herdsman had confessed, adding that the child was still alive, and that he was very well pleased his orders had not been executed; for he had been under great concern ever since he issued that cruel command, and had not been able to bear the reproaches of his daughter. He then ordered Harpagus to send his son to wait on the young Cyrus, and to come himself that night to sup with him, since he intended to offer a sacrifice to the gods in thanksgiving for the care they had taken of his grandson.

dreadful punishment and policy.

Harpagus overjoyed at the king's speech returned home, and acquainting his wife with what had passed, immediately sent his only son to attend Cyrus, as he had been commanded. His son, who was about 30 years old, no sooner entered the palace, but he was seized, barbarously murdered and cut in pieces by order of Astyages, who gave directions that the mangled body, variously dressed and disguised, should be served up at supper. Harpagus and the rest of the guests repaired to the palace at the hour appointed; the others were splendidly entertained, but the table, where Harpagus supped, was served only with the flesh of his son. When he had done, the king asked him whether he had been pleased with his viands; and Harpagus answering, that he had never tasted any thing more delicious, the officers appointed for that purpose brought in a basket containing the head, hands and feet of his son, desiring him to uncover the basket, and take what he liked best. He did as they desired, and beheld the remains of his only child without betraying any sort of concern or resentment at so shocking a sight; such was the command he had of his passions. The king enquired whether he knew with what kind of meat he had been entertained? Harpagus replied, he knew very well, and was always pleased with whatever his sovereign thought fit to ordain. Having thus replied, with a surprizing temper, he collected the mangled parts of his innocent son, and went home, as our author conjectures, to inter them.

Astyages having thus vented his rage upon the unfortunate Harpagus, began to consider with himself what he should do with Cyrus; and having again consulted the Mages, their answer was, that if the boy lived, he must of necessity be king. Astyages then acquainted them, that he was still alive, adding, as a very material circumstance, that he had been chosen king by the boys of the neighbourhood where a he lived, and performed all the parts of a real king, with the utmost rigor and severity. Hereupon the Mages replied, that the prediction of his reign was already accomplished in the choice which the boys had made of him for their king, and that he would never reign a second time; for dreams, said they, often end in things of small importance, and are fulfilled by trifling events. They advised him therefore to divest himself of all fear, and send the boy to his parents in Perfia. Cyrus sent back to his real parents.

Astyages, well pleased with this answer, called Cyrus, and owning how much he had been wanting in the affection which he ought naturally to have had for him by reason of an insignificant dream, desired him to get ready for a journey into Perfia, where he would find his real father and mother, in circumstances very different from those of the poor herdsman Mitradates, and his wife Spaco.

Thus Astyages, after many kind expressions, dismissed his young grandson attended by several lords of the first rank. Upon his arrival at his father's house, he was received by his parents with a tenderness and joy, which it is more easy to conceive, than express. As they had long given him over for dead, they asked him in what manner his life had been preserved. He then acquainted them that he had lived in an entire ignorance of his condition, and had been unacquainted with his true birth, believing himself the son of the king's herdsman, till those, who attended him on his journey into Perfia, informed him of all that had passed. He related how c he had been educated by the herdsman's wife, and frequently repeating the name of Cyno, commended her on all occasions. And this name his parents made use of, as our author informs us, to persuade the Persians that the preservation of their son was in a very particular manner owing to the immortal gods, since he had been nourished, as they industriously spread abroad, and was commonly believed, by a bitch.

When Cyrus attained to the age of manhood, and was become very popular in his own country, and famous in Media on account of his extraordinary parts, Harpagus, who had never forgot the inhuman murder of his son, began to court his friendship, with a design to join with him, who had been equally injured, in d revenging so barbarous a treatment. At the same time he solicited the leading men among the Medes, who were highly dissatisfied with the tyrannical government of Astyages, to take up arms, and redeem themselves and their unhappy country from the calamities they groaned under, by deposing Astyages, and advancing his grandson Cyrus to the throne. They all to a man shewed themselves disposed to second his designs; whereupon he thought it high time to discover his intentions to Cyrus, who was to act the chief part in this revolution. And accordingly he acquainted him with them, by a letter, which, as all the roads leading to Perfia were guarded by the king's troops, he conveyed to him in the belly of a hare; the hare he delivered to one of his most trusty domesticks dressed in the habit of a hunter, enjoining him to desire Cyrus not to open the letter in the presence of any person whatsoever. Harpagus stirs up a revolt against Astyages.

The messenger executed his orders, and Cyrus opening the hare with his own hands, found a letter reminding him of the care which the gods had had of his preservation against the wicked designs and barbarous attempts of his grandfather, and encouraging him to stir up the Persians to a revolt, and at the head of their forces to invade Media, where all the chief commanders were ready to join him, and determined at all events to advance him to the throne instead of his unnatural grandfather. He took care to put him in mind of what he had suffered on his account, and how barbarously he had been punished for not executing the king's bloody orders. Cyrus having read the letter, began to consider what measures he f should take to induce the Persians to revolt, and after various schemes fixed upon the following as the most proper. He feigned a letter from Astyages appointing him commander in chief of all the Persian forces; this he read in a general assembly of the nation, and in virtue of his new commission commanded them all to attend him, every man with a hatchet. He was obeyed, and being all met in pursuance to his orders, he enjoined them to clear in one day a spot of ground, containing 18 or 20 furlongs, over-grown with thorns and briars. This laborious piece of work being performed, not without some reluctance, he dismissed them with orders to attend him again the next day. In the mean time he caused all his father's a flocks and herds to be killed and dressed, provided wine, and bought all the dainties Persia could supply him with. They all assembled the next day, expecting to be employed as they had been the day before. But, contrary to their expectation, Cyrus ordered them to sit down on the green turf, and entertained them with a great feast. When they had solaced themselves with dainties which to that time they had been strangers to, the young prince asked them, whether they would chuse to live always in that manner, or as they had done the day before? They all answered readily, that as mirth and pleasure were greatly preferable to toil and labour, so would they gladly chuse the condition of the present day before that of the precedent. Upon this answer Cyrus acquainted them, that if they hearkened to his advice b they should enjoy these and far greater pleasures without any kind of servile labour; but if they refused to follow him, they must undergo innumerable hardships like those they had complained of the day before. He then disclosed to them his true design of delivering his country from the Median bondage, and encouraged his countrymen to join him in so great and glorious an enterprize, by telling them that some divine power had brought him into the world, and miraculously saved his life, that he might be one day the author of their happiness. The Persians, who had lived for many years, with the utmost reluctance, in subjection to the Medes, declared him with one accord their leader, and protested that they would stand by him in so good a cause, even at the expence of their lives. c

In the mean time Astyages, being informed of what was doing in Persia, dispatched a messenger to Cyrus, enjoining him to repair forthwith into Media; but Cyrus by the same messenger returned this resolute answer, that he would come sooner than Astyages desired. Whereupon the king drew together all his forces, and forgetful of his cruelty towards Harpagus, appointed him general of the army. The two nations came to a general engagement; but the chief officers among the Medes passing over to Cyrus, with the bodies under their command, the rest of the army was routed with great slaughter. When Astyages heard of this defeat, he flew into a violent passion, and vowing that Cyrus should not long enjoy the pleasure of his victory, he first caused the Mages, who had interpreted his dream, to be impaled, and then arming all the Medes, marched out himself at the head of them. Both armies d came to a second engagement, in which the Medes were again defeated, and the king himself taken prisoner. Astyages in this state was reproached and insulted by the revengeful Harpagus, who among other things asked him what he now thought of his tragical feast, when he compelled him to devour the flesh of his own son, for which inhuman and barbarous action he had now fallen from the throne to a prison? Astyages in return, fixing his eyes on Harpagus, asked him whether he had been instrumental in bringing about this revolution? He answered, that it was chiefly owing to him, since he had the first encouraged Cyrus to this undertaking. Then, replied Astyages, you are the weakest and most unjust of all men: the weakest, in giving e the kingdom to another, when you might have seized on it yourself, since you have been able to effect this change; the most unjust, in enslaving your country to revenge a private injury. For if you were determined to depose me and confer the kingdom on another, without taking the power into your own hands, you might with more justice have advanced a Mede to that dignity than a Persian. Whereas the Medes, who were before lords of Persia, and no ways concerned in the injury, are now by your means reduced to the condition of slaves, and the Persians, who were servants to the Medes, are now become their lords. In this manner, concludes our author, Astyages was deprived of the kingdom after he had reigned 35 years, and through his cruelty the Medes became subject to the Persians, after they had ruled over all those provinces of Asia that lie on the other side the Halys for the space of 128 years, including the time of the Scythian dominion over that part of Asia. As for Astyages, Cyrus kept him prisoner in his palace till he died, without practising any farther severity upon him. f

THIS is the account which Herodotus gives us, and every impartial and judicious reader must conclude to be an arrant romance, composed, perhaps, by some admirer of Cyrus, and adopted by our author as more agreeable to the depraved taste of his countrymen, who took greater delight in surprizing, tho' fabulous, events, than in the relation of plain historical truths.

- a WHAT the same author relates of the death of this great hero, deserves, in our opinion, no more credit, than what he has told us of his birth, education and advancement to the crown. This prince, according to him¹, invaded the Massagetes, and having in the first battle feigned a flight, left a great quantity of provisions, especially of wine, in the field. The barbarians did not fail to seize on the booty, and indulged themselves in drinking to such an excess, that they all fell asleep on the spot. In this condition Cyrus returned upon them, obtained an easy victory, and took a great many prisoners, among whom was Spargapises the son of queen Tomyris. This heroine, being informed of the defeat of her troops and captivity of her son, sent a herald to Cyrus entreating him to release the young prince; which he refusing to do, Spargapises, preferring death to slavery, laid violent hands on himself. Whereupon his mother Tomyris, animated with an eager desire of revenge, gave the Persians battle a second time; which, says our author, was the most obstinate and bloody that ever was fought by the barbarians. Many fell on both sides; but at last the Massagetes carrying the day, the greatest part of the Persian army was cut in pieces, and Cyrus himself killed in the field, after having reigned 29 years. Tomyris, having found his body among the slain, caused his head to be cut off, and thrown into a vessel filled with human blood, insulting the memory of the dead prince with these words, Glut thyself with the blood which thou hast so insatiably thirsted after. Cyrus's defeat and death, according to the same author.
- b
- c WHAT the same historian relates of his childish revenge upon the river Gyndes (C) while he was on his march to besiege Babylon, is utterly repugnant to the idea we have of that wise and experienced commander. For he tells us, that one of the sacred horses of Cyrus being drowned in that river, the prince highly resenting such an affront immediately caused the Gyndes to be cut by his army into 360 channels; a work which employed his army the whole summer, and obliged him to postpone the siege of Babylon to the spring ensuing. Who can imagine that a commander of so great experience, and such an extraordinary moderation, as Cyrus is even by Herodotus himself represented to have been, while he was marching to the conquest of Babylon, should so idly waste his time, and spend the ardour of his troops in such an unprofitable piece of work?
- e We shall now give what we look upon as the true history of Cyrus, being extracted out of Xenophon, whom we chuse to follow in what concerns that great conqueror and excellent prince, seeing his accounts are far more agreeable to holy writ, the standard of truth, than those of Herodotus. We are told, for instance, in scripture, that the Babylonians were reduced by the united forces of the Medes and Persians, and this is what we read in Xenophon: whereas Herodotus raises the Persian empire on the ruins of that of the Medes, which is repugnant to scripture. It is true, that most of the ancients have chosen to follow Herodotus rather than Xenophon; but that we can easily account for. The relations of the former are interwoven with events far more strange and surprizing, and consequently more diverting and acceptable to the reader; whence they were preferred to those of the latter, in which we find nothing calculated to raise admiration. This natural inclination in a writer to adopt such accounts as he thinks will prove most agreeable to his reader, has been too much countenanced by *Plato*², who in giving a character of Xenophon's Cyropædia tells us that he rather described in that work what a worthy and just prince ought to be, than gave us a true history of what that prince really was. From this passage Diogenes Laertius concludes ³that Plato looked on the Institution of Cyrus as a fiction. Tully passes the same judgment on this performance, saying⁴, that Xenophon's Cyrus was not intended for a true history, but to serve as a model of a just empire. Most of the modern critics have declared themselves of the same opinion; and we must own that as Xenophon was both a great commander and philosopher, he has woven into that history many of his own maxims of war and policy. But it does not follow from hence that the ground-plot of the work, and the most material transactions he relates, may not be called a true history. That he intended it for such, is plain; for in the very beginning of the work he acquaints us that he had taken great care and pains to inform himself of Cyrus's birth, education, and character; and Cyrus's history according to Xenophon, more consonant with the sacred writings.

that it is really such, its conformity with holy writ sufficiently shews. Wherefore bating his military and political descants and digressions, the remaining part, bare matters of fact, is to be looked upon as a true history. He was esteemed by the ancients 'a writer of great judgement and penetration, and having lived in the court of Cyrus the younger, had opportunities of being better informed of what he wrote concerning that great prince, than Herodotus could have; and as he confined himself to this subject alone, no doubt but he examined all matters relating to it with more care and exactness than the other, who wrote of so many different subjects and nations. And these are the motives that have induced us to follow Xenophon in what relates to Cyrus rather than Herodotus or those who have copied after him (D).

before Christ 599.

Cyrus was the son of Cambyzes king of Persia and of Mandane the daughter of Astyages king of the Medes (E). He was born a year after his uncle Cyaxares the brother of Mandane. He lived the first twelve years of his life with his parents in Persia (F), where he was educated after the Persian manner, and inured to hardships and such exercises as might enable him to go through the toils and fatigues of war. When he was twelve years old his mother Mandane took him with her into Media to his grandfather Astyages, who, from the many things he had heard of that young prince, had a desire to see him. During the time of his residence at this court, the sweetness of his temper, his generous behaviour, and constant endeavour to oblige all men, gained him the affections of the Medes, and such an interest among the leading men of that nation as did afterwards much contribute to the erecting of the great empire he afterwards founded *.

His early growth.

WHEN Cyrus was about sixteen years of age Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, being abroad on a hunting match a little before his marriage, to shew his bravery made an inroad into the territories of the Medes, which drew out Astyages with his forces to oppose the invader. On this occasion Cyrus attending his grandfather first entered the school of war, and behaved so well that the victory, which the Medes gained over the Babylonians, was in great measure owing to his valour. The next year he returned to his father in Persia, where he remained till he was forty years of age, when he was recalled to the assistance of his uncle Cyaxares *.

Astyages king of the Medes was succeeded, as we have shewn in the history of that people, by his son Cyaxares brother to Mandane Cyrus's mother †. This prince was scarce warm on his throne when he was informed that Neriglissar king of Babylon was preparing a powerful army to invade Media, that he had already engaged several princes on his side, and amongst others Crasus king of Lydia, and that he had dispatched ambassadors into Cappadocia, Pbrygia, Caria, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, and even to the Indies, to instil jealousies into the several princes of those countries, and to stir them up against the Medes and Persians, as aspiring to an universal monarchy. Cyaxares therefore called Cyrus out of Persia to his assistance, and upon his arrival with a body of 30,000 Persians appointed him commander in chief both of the Medes and Persians (G) ‡.

(D) Scaliger thinks that the Cyropædia contains nothing but fables and fictions, if we except two or three events, which are related also by Herodotus; and Erasmus will not even allow Xenophon to have given us an exact model of a just government, but rather to have drawn a cunning and deceitful prince: so fond are they of the surprizing incidents related by his antagonist Herodotus.

(E) Both Herodotus and Xenophon agree in this, viz. that the mother of Cyrus was Mandane daughter to Astyages; but Ctesias would have us believe that Cyrus was no ways related to Astyages, or Astias as he is pleased to call him.

(F) The name of Persia at that time extended only to one province of that large empire, which was afterwards known by the name of Persia. For the whole Persian nation could at that time raise but 120,000 men (2). But after the conquests of Cyrus it took in that vast tract, which extended east and west from the Indus to the Tigris, and north and south from the Caspian sea to the ocean.

(2) Cyropæd. l. 1.

(G) This army consisted of 30,000 men, all infantry, for the Persians had yet no cavalry; but they were all chosen men, and raised after a particular manner. First of all Cyrus chose out of the nobility 201 officers; each of these was ordered to chuse four more of the same rank which made a thousand in all; and these were called quæstors, or men of the same dignity, and eminently distinguished themselves on all occasions. Every one of these was ordered to raise among the people ten pike-men lightly armed, ten slingers and ten bow-men, which amounted in the whole to 31,000 men (3). From the year in which Cyrus, arriving in Media at the head of these troops, was vested with the command of the confederate army, those begin their computation who will have this prince to have reigned thirty years. For from this time he was looked upon by all foreign nations as king of Persia and Media, though the regal power, as to the latter, was solely in Cyaxares, and Cyrus was only general of the united forces.

(3) Idem, ibidem.

A H^{is} had not been long in Media before Cyaxares had occasion to employ him. The king of Armenia, who had hitherto lived in subjection to the Medes, looking upon them as ready to be swallowed up by the powerful alliance formed against them, thought fit to lay hold of that opportunity and shake off the yoke. Accordingly he refused to pay the usual tribute, and to send his quota of auxiliaries, which he was obliged to furnish in time of war. As this was a matter of dangerous consequence, and which might prompt other dependant states to do the same, Cyrus thought it necessary to crush this revolt with the utmost expedition; and therefore marching immediately with a chosen body of horse, and covering his design as if he intended only to hunt on the hills of Armenia, he entered that country before the inhabitants had any intelligence of his march, surprized the king and all his family, and having obliged him to pay the usual tribute, and send his quota of auxiliaries, restored him to his kingdom, and returned in triumph to his army in Media.^{Reduces Armenia:}

BOTH parties had now been employed three years together in forming their alliances, and making preparations for war. In the beginning of the 4th year the confederate armies on both sides took the field, and being come in sight of each other, the Babylonians under Neriglissar their king encamped and fortified themselves with strong intrenchments, while the Medes and Persians under the command of Cyrus covered themselves with the neighbouring hills and villages. In this posture they continued for some days, till at length the Babylonians leaving their intrenchments, and drawing themselves up in battle-array, Cyrus advanced to attack them. On the side of the Assyrians, the bow-men and slingers made their discharges before the enemy was within reach. But the Persians, animated by the presence and example of Cyrus, immediately closed in with the enemy, and broke through their first battalions. The Babylonians, notwithstanding all the efforts used by Crasus and their own king, were not able to stand so rude a shock, but immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight. At the same time the cavalry of the Medes fell upon the enemy's horse, which was likewise put to the rout. Cyrus pursued them close to their intrenchments, but not thinking himself in a condition to force them, sounded the retreat. In this battle Neriglissar king of the Babylonians was killed; whereupon Crasus, king of Lydia,^{Defeats the Babylonians}

As being in dignity next to him, took the command of the conquered army, and made as good a retreat as he could. But the next day Cyrus returned to the charge, drove the Babylonians from their camp, and with the assistance of the Hyracians, who had revolted to him the night before, took a great many prisoners and the baggage of the whole army.^{Neriglissar killed.} Cyrus reserved all the horses that were taken for himself, in order to form a body of cavalry for the Persian army, which hitherto they had wanted. The richest and most valuable part of the booty he set apart for Cyaxares; and as for the prisoners he allowed them to return home to their respective countries, without imposing any other condition upon them, than that they should deliver up their arms, and engage no more in war against him and his allies.^{Crasus defeated.}

THE death of Neriglissar was a great loss to the Babylonians; for he was a prince of great courage, conduct and wisdom, the preparations he made for the war shewed his wisdom, and his dying in it his valour. But nothing made the Babylonians more sensible of the loss they had suffered than the tyrannical government of his son and successor Labarsoarchad, who was in every thing quite the reverse of his father, being addicted to all manner of wickedness, cruelty and injustice. Two acts of his cruelty towards two Babylonian lords Gobryas and Gadates are particularly mentioned, as having provoked them to join Cyrus, and be very instrumental in the subversion of the Babylonian empire.^{The Babylonians revolt to Cyrus.} The only son of the former he slew at a hunting-match, to which he had invited him, for no other reason but that he pierced with his dart a wild beast which the king had missed. The other he caused to be made an eunuch because one of his concubines had commended him as an handsome man. These acts of tyranny drove the two noblemen with the provinces they governed over to Cyrus, and hastened the conquest of Babylon. For Cyrus, encouraged hereby, determined to penetrate into the very heart of the enemy's country, and having taken possession of the provinces, castles, and strong holds which the two injured princes had been trusted with, he got a footing in Assyria, which greatly contributed to the reduction of Babylon itself. The king took the field against Gadates, but being met by Cyrus he was put to flight, and obliged to retire with great slaughter to his metropolis. Cyrus having thus spent the summer in ravaging the enemy's country, and shewn himself twice before the walls of Babylon, in order to provoke the king to battle, marched back into Media, and on his march took three strong holds on the frontiers^k.

Laborofoarchod's tyranny and death.

As soon as Cyrus was retired, Laborofoartbod, being now in no dread of the enemy, gave a loose to all the wicked inclinations that were predominant in him, inasmuch that his own subjects, not being able to bear any longer his tyrannical government, conspired against him, and murdered him in the ninth month of his reign^l. Nabonadius, who had the chief hand in the murder, was placed on the throne, and had he been left to himself, the Babylonians would not have bettered their condition by the change. But his mother, who was a woman of extraordinary parts, took the main burden of all publick affairs upon herself, and while her son followed his pleasures, did all that could be done by human prudence to preserve the tottering empire. She perfected the works, which Nebuchadnezzar had begun for the defence of Babylon, raised strong fortifications on the side of the river, and caused a wonderful vault to be made under it, leading from the old palace to the new, 12 foot high, and 15 wide. This she did to maintain a communication between the two palaces, which were strong fortresses and separated by the river^m, that in case one of them should be distressed by the enemy, or either of them taken, there might be relief from, or a safe retreat to the other.

WHILE the queen was thus taking all possible precautions against the enemy, Cyaxares came to Cyrus's camp, and after several consultations they determined to alter their method; and instead of contenting themselves only with ravaging the enemy's territories, they thought it was necessary to employ their troops in taking of towns and fortresses, that so they might make themselves masters of the country, and distress the city of Babylon by intercepting their provisionsⁿ. Accordingly they took many cities, and brought under subjection entire provinces, without meeting with any considerable resistance from the Babylonians. The progress Cyrus made in those conquests roused at last Nabonadius, who taking along with him great part of his treasures, left Babylon and repaired to Craesus king of Lydia, by whose assistance and interest he concluded a formidable alliance with the Egyptians, Greeks, Ibracians, and all the nations of the Lesser Asia. These various nations under the conduct of Craesus, who was by the king of Babylon appointed chief commander of all his forces, assembled near the river Pactolus, and from thence advanced to Tymbra, which was the place appointed for the general rendezvous. Cyrus being informed of these vast preparations by one of his intimate friends, who by his order had fled over to the enemy as a deserter, put himself in a condition to oppose them. And having increased the number of his forces by new levies, he took leave of Cyaxares, who remained in Media with a third part of the troops, that the country might not be left entirely defenceless, and marched forwards to meet the confederate forces in their own territories in order to consume their forage, and disconcert their measures by the quickness of his march, and boldness of his undertaking. After a long march he came up with the enemy at Tymbra, a city of Lydia not far from Sardis, the metropolis of that country. Cyrus's army was 196,000 strong, horse and foot; besides these troops he had 300 chariots armed with scythes, each chariot drawn by four horses abreast, covered with trappings that were proof against all sorts of missive weapons: he had likewise a great number of other chariots of a larger size, upon each of which he placed a tower about 18 or 20 feet high, and in each tower were lodged 20 archers. These chariots were drawn by 16 oxen yoked abreast. There was moreover a considerable number of camels, each mounted by two Arabian archers, the one looking towards the head, and the other towards the hinder part of the camel. The army of Craesus was twice as numerous as that of Cyrus, amounting in the whole to 420,000 men. Both armies were drawn up on an immense plain, which gave room for the extending of their wings to the right and left; and the design of Craesus, upon which alone he founded his hopes of victory, was to farround and hem in the enemy's army. He placed the Egyptians, who alone made a body of 120,000 men, and were the main strength of the army, in the center^o.

a WHEN the two armies were within sight of each other, Craſus observing how much the front of his army exceeded that of Cyrus, made the center halt, and the two wings advance with a design to incloſe Cyrus's army, and begin the attack on both ſides at the ſame time. When the two detached bodies of the Lydian forces were ſufficiently extended, Craſus gave the ſignal to the main body, which marched up to the front of the Persian army, while the two wings attacked them in flank, ſo that Cyrus's army was hem'd in on all ſides, and, as our author expreſſes it, incloſed like a ſmall ſquare drawn within a great one^b.

THIS motion did not at all alarm Cyrus, who giving his troops the ſignal to face about, attacked in flank the enemies forces that were marching to fall upon his rear, and put them into great diſorder. In the ſame moment a ſquadron of camels was made to advance againſt the enemies other wing, conſiſting moſtly of cavalry. Their horſes upon the approach of the camels were ſo frightened that moſt of them threw their riders, and trod them under foot, which occaſioned a great conſuſion. While they were thus in diſorder, Artageſes, an officer of great experience, at the head of a ſmall body of horſe, charged them ſo briskly, that they could never afterwards rally, and at the ſame time the chariots armed with ſcythes being furiously driven againſt them, they were entirely routed. Both the enemy's wings being put to flight, Cyrus commanded Abradates his chief favourite to fall upon the center with the chariots we have mentioned above. The firſt ranks, conſiſting moſtly of Lydians, not being able to ſtand ſo violent a charge, immediately gave way; but the Egyptians being covered with their bucklers, and marching ſo cloſe that the chariots had not room to penetrate their ranks, a great ſlaughter of the Persians enſued. Abradates himſelf was killed, his chariot overturned, and moſt part of his men cut in pieces after having ſignalized themſelves in a very extraordinary manner. Upon his death the Egyptians advancing boldly obliged the Persian infantry to give way, and drove them back quite to their engines. There they met with a new ſhower of arrows and javelins diſcharged upon them from the towers, and at the ſame time the Persian rear advancing ſword in hand obliged their archers, and ſpear-men to return to their charge. In the mean time Cyrus having put to flight both the horſe and foot on the left of the Egyptians, pushed on to the center, where he had the mortification to find his Persians again giving ground, and judging that the only way to ſtop the Egyptians who were purſuing them, would be to attack them in the rear, he did ſo, and at the ſame time the Persian cavalry coming up to his aſſiſtance, the fight was renewed with great ſlaughter on both ſides. For the Egyptians facing about, defended themſelves with incredible bravery. Cyrus himſelf was in great danger; for his horſe being killed under him, he fell in the miſt of the enemies, but being ſaved by his Persians, who, alarmed at his danger, threw themſelves headlong upon thoſe that ſurrounded him, the battle became more bloody than ever. At length Cyrus admiring the valour of the Egyptians, and concerned to ſee ſuch brave men periſh, offered them honourable conditions, letting them know at the ſame time that all their allies had abandoned them. They accepted the terms offered them, and having agreed with Cyrus that they ſhould not be obliged to carry arms againſt Craſus, in whoſe ſervice they had been engaged, ſurrendered themſelves to the conqueror, and from that time ſerved him with the utmoſt fidelity^c (H).

sisted in cavalry, which Cyrus being sensible of, made his camels advance against a them, whose smell the horses not being able to endure, they were immediately put in disorder. However the Lydians, who at that time were one of the most warlike nations of Asia, dismounting, fought on foot, but after having kept their ground very obstinately for some time, were forced to make their retreat to Sardis, where they were immediately closely besieged by *Cyrus (I).

Sardis taken. THE night after he invested the city he made himself master of the citadel, being conducted to it in the dead of the night by a Persian slave who had been a servant to the governor of that place. At break of day he entered the city, where he found no resistance, the Lydians having dispersed at the news of the citadel's being taken. Cyrus's first care was to save the town, which was the most wealthy of all Asia, from being plundered. With this view he acquainted the inhabitants that their lives should be spared, and neither their wives nor children touched, provided they brought him all their gold and silver. This condition they readily complied with, and Craesus himself, who was taken and brought to Cyrus, set them an example by delivering his immense treasures up to the conqueror. Cyrus, touched with compassion at the king's misfortune, and admiring his constancy in so great a change, treated him with great clemency, suffering him to enjoy both the title and authority of king, under the sole restriction of not having power to make war. From that time he took him with him in all his expeditions, either out of esteem for that prince, or out of policy, that he might be more secure of his person* (K).

(I) While Cyrus lay encamped before Sardis he performed the exequies of Abadat and Pantben his wife. Abadat was prince of Sus under the Babylonians, and had revolted to Cyrus about two years before, being induced thereunto by his wife, a woman of extraordinary beauty, whom Cyrus had taken prisoner in his first engagement with the Babylonians, and treated in a most obliging manner. This kind treatment drew over her husband to Cyrus, and he being killed in the engagement with the Egyptians, as we have mentioned above, Pantben out of grief slew herself upon his dead body, and Cyrus caused them both to be interred with great pomp, and a stately monument to be erected over them near the river Pactolus, where it was to be seen many ages after (5).

(K) The taking of Craesus is differently related by Herodotus and those who have copied after him (6). According to these, Craesus being shut up in Sardis dispatched ambassadors to all his allies intreating their assistance. But in the mean time Cyrus pursued the siege with such vigour, that he took the city before any succours could arrive, and the king in it, whom he condemned to be burnt alive. And accordingly placed him on a great pile of wood, accompanied by fourteen young Lydians. The design of Cyrus in so doing was, according to Herodotus, to offer this sacrifice to some god as the first fruits of his victory, or to perform a vow, or perhaps to see, as he had heard of his piety towards the gods, whether any of them would save him from the fire. When Craesus had ascended the pile, notwithstanding the weight of his misfortunes, he recollected the words of Solon, who had told him that no man could be called happy before his death. Revolving these words in his mind, he cried out with a great sigh three times, Oh Solon, Solon, Solon! Which when Cyrus heard, he commanded his interpreter to ask him, whose assistance he implored. Upon this Craesus acquainted him, that Solon, an Athenian philosopher, having formerly visited him, and viewed his immense treasures, had despised all, and plainly told him, instead of applauding his happiness, that he could not pronounce any man happy so long as he lived, because no man could foresee what might happen to him before his death. Of the truth of which being now sadly convinced by his present calamity, he could not forbear calling upon the name of Solon. This raised in Cyrus a lively sense of the uncertainty of all human felicity, and such compassion for Craesus, that he commanded the fire to be presently extinguished and the unfortunate king taken down. Accordingly all endeavours were used to execute his orders, but the fire could not be mastered. In this distress Craesus being informed that Cyrus designed to save his life, but seeing his Persians attempted in vain to extinguish the flame, burst out into a flood of tears, and with a loud voice invoking Apoll, besought that god to deliver him from the present danger, if any of his offerings had ever been agreeable to him. He had scarce ended his prayer when clouds were seen gathered in the air, which before was serene, and a violent storm of rain ensuing, quite extinguished the flame. Cyrus understanding by this miraculous event that Craesus was a pious prince and greatly favoured by the gods, not only spared his life, but allowed him a very honourable maintenance, and made use of him ever after as one of his chief counsellors, and at his death recommended him to his son Cambyses, as the person whose advice he would have him chiefly to follow.

The same writer tells us, that upon the taking of the city of Sardis, a certain Persian, not knowing Craesus, advanced to kill him. As he, not caring to survive that disaster, did not attempt to avoid the blow, his son, who was born dumb, seeing the soldier ready to strike, was moved with such fear and tenderness for the life of his father, that in that instant he cried out, Soldier, spare the life of Craesus. These were the first words he ever uttered, but from that time he continued to speak readily till his death (7). Thus far Herodotus.

a likewise under subjection, he again entered Assyria, and marched towards Babylon, the only city in all the east that now held out against him. Nabonadius, or, as Herodotus calls him, Labyntus, hearing that he was advancing to his metropolis, marched out to give him battle, but being without much ado put to flight, he retreated to Babylon, where he was immediately blocked up and closely besieged by Cyrus. The siege of this important place was no easy enterprize. The walls were of a prodigious height, the number of men to defend them very great, and the city stored with all sorts of provisions for twenty years. However these difficulties did not discourage Cyrus from prosecuting his design. But despairing to take the place by storm, b he caused a line of circumvallation to be drawn quite round the city with a large and deep ditch, reckoning that if all communication with the country were cut off, the more people there were within the city, the sooner they would be obliged to surrender. That his troops might not be over-fatigued, he divided his army into twelve bodies, and appointing each body its month for guarding the trenches. The besieged thinking themselves out of all danger by reason of their high walls and magazines, insulted Cyrus from the ramparts, and looked upon all the trouble he gave himself as so much unprofitable labour.

Invests Babylon.

Cyrus having spent two entire years before Babylon without gaining any considerable advantage over the city, at last resolved upon the following stratagem, which c put him in possession of the place. He was informed that a great annual solemnity was to be kept in Babylon, and that the Babylonians on that occasion were accustomed to spend the whole night in drinking and debauchery. This he thought a proper time to surprize them in, and accordingly sent a strong detachment to the head of the canal leading to the great lake, which we have elsewhere described, with orders at an appointed time to break down the great bank which was between the lake and the canal, and to turn the whole current into the lake. At the same time he posted one body of troops at the place where the river entered into the city, and another where it came out, ordering them to march into the city by the bed of the river as soon as they should find it fordable. Towards the evening he d opened the head of the trenches on both sides the river above the city, that the water might discharge itself into them. By this means, and the breaking down of the great dam, the river was soon drained. Then the two fore-mentioned bodies of troops according to their orders entered the channel, the one commanded by Gobryas, and the other by Gadates, and finding the gates all left open, by reason of the general disorder of that riotous night, they penetrated into the very heart of the city without any opposition, and meeting at the palace, according to their agreement, surprized the guards, and cut them in pieces. Those who were within the palace opening the gates to know the cause of this confusion, the Persians rushed in, took the palace and killed the king, who sword in hand came up to meet e them. The king being killed and those who were about him put to flight, the rest voluntarily submitted, and Cyrus without any further resistance became master of the place, and concluded his conquests after a war of 21 years. The taking of Babylon put an end to the Babylonian empire, and fulfilled the predictions, which the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel had uttered against that proud metropolis, and, of which we have already given a particular account.

Babylon taken. Year of the flood 2461. Before Christ 536.

Upon the death of the king of Babylon, Darius the Mede is said in scripture to have taken the kingdom. By Darius the Mede is meant Cyaxares king of the Medes, and uncle to Cyrus, as we have fully proved in the history of Media. For Cyrus as long as his uncle lived, held the empire with him in partnership, nay, so far f did he carry his complaisance, that he let him enjoy the first rank. Cyrus having settled his affairs at Babylon, returned into Persia to pay a visit to his father and mother, who were still alive, and after a short stay there went back to Babylon together with Cyaxares. On their arrival they concerted together the settling of the whole empire, and having divided it into 120 provinces, the government of these was given to such as had distinguished themselves during the war.

The civil government being thus settled, Cyrus ordered all his forces to join him at Babylon. On a general review he found they consisted of 120,000 horse, 2000 chariots armed with scythes, and 600,000 foot. Of these having distributed into garrisons such a number as he judged necessary for the defence of the several parts of the empire, he marched with the remainder into Syria, where he settled the affairs of that province, and then reduced the other nations as far as the Red Sea, and the confines of Ethiopia². In this interval of time Daniel was by order of Darius, who remained at Babylon, cast into the lions den, as we have related in the history of Media[†].

Year of the flood 2463.

Before Christ 536.

Cyrus puts an end to the Jewish captivity.

ABOUT two years after the reduction of Babylon, Cyaxares dying, and also Cambyses king of Persia, Cyrus returned to Babylon and took upon him the whole government of the empire³, which he held for the space of seven years (K).

In the first of these seven years expired the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity, when Cyrus published the famous edict, whereby the Jews were allowed to return to Jerusalem. There is no doubt but this edict was obtained by Daniel, who was in great credit and authority at court. That he might the more effectually induce the king to grant him that favour, he shewed him the prophecies of Isaiah^b, naming him 120 years before his birth as one appointed by God to be a great conqueror, and king over many nations, and the restorer of his people by ordering their temple to be rebuilt, and Jerusalem and Judea to be re-possessed by their ancient inhabitants.

Cyrus having issued out his decree for the restoring of the Jews to their country, and the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, the captive Hebrews assembled out of the several provinces of the Babylonian empire, to the number of 4236 persons with their servants, who amounted to 7337 more, and set out for Judea. And thus was the state of Judah and Jerusalem again restored after they had lain desolate 70 years (L). Cyrus restored at the same time to the Jews all the vessels of the temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought from Jerusalem, and lodged in the temple of his God Baal^c.

AFTER the return of the Jews, the Samaritans, their declared enemies, did all that lay in their power to prevent the building of the temple; and though they could not alter Cyrus's decree, yet they prevailed by bribes with his chief officers that were in Judea to obstruct the execution of it; so that for several years the building went on but very slowly. And it seems to have been out of grief to see the pious intentions of Cyrus thus disappointed, that in the third year of that prince Daniel gave himself up to mourning and fasting for three weeks together^d.

BUT to return to Cyrus. This prince being equally beloved by his own natural subjects, and those of the conquered nations, peaceably enjoyed the fruits of his labours and victories. His new-erected empire was bounded on the east by the river Indus, on the north by the Caspian and Euxine seas, on the west by the Egean, and on the south by Ethiopia and the sea of Arabia. He kept his residence in the heart of these countries, spending the seven cold months at Babylon by reason of the warmth of that climate; three months at Susa in the spring, and two months at Ecbatan during the heat of the summer^e.

(K) The reign of Cyrus is reckoned, from his first coming out of Persia to the assistance of his uncle Cyaxares at the head of the Persian army, to have lasted thirty years; from the taking of Babylon nine years, and from his being sole monarch of the whole empire after the death of Cyaxares in Media and Cambyses in Persia seven years. Tully⁽⁸⁾ reckons by the first account, Ptolemy⁽⁹⁾ by the second, and Xenophon⁽¹⁰⁾ by the third. The first of these seven years is the first year of Cyrus mentioned by Ezra⁽¹¹⁾, wherein an end was put to the captivity of Judah, and liberty granted them to return to their country, the seventy years of captivity being then expired.

(L) It may not be improper in this place to insert the famous edict of Cyrus in favour of the Israelites; an edict, for which it may be presumed that God endowed him with so many heroic virtues, and blest him with a constant series of prosperity and victories.

In the first year of Cyrus, king of the Persians, that the word of the Lord might be accomplished, that he had promised by the mouth of Jeremy, the Lord raised up the spirit of Cyrus the king of the Persians; and he made proclamation through all his kingdom and also by writing, saying: Thus saith Cyrus king of the Persians, the Lord of Israel, the most high Lord, has made me king of the whole world, and commanded me to build him an house at Jerusalem in Jewry. If therefore there be any of you that are of his people, let the Lord, even his Lord, be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem that is in Judea, and build the house of the Lord of Israel; for he is the Lord that dwelleth in Jerusalem. Whosoever then dwelleth in the places about, let them help him (those I say that are his neighbours) with gold and with silver, with gifts, with horses, and with cattle and other things, which have been set forth by vow for the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem (12)

Having

- a HAVING spent seven years in this state of tranquillity, and established his empire with such wisdom, that upon the strength of this foundation alone it stood above 200 years, notwithstanding the rash and impolitic proceedings of his successors, he died in the 70th year of his age^a, equally regretted by all the nations of his vast spreading dominions. He had reigned, from his first taking upon him the command of the Persian and Median armies, thirty years, as we hinted in a late note^c; from the reduction of Babylon nine^b, and from his being sole monarch of the east after the death of his uncle Cyaxares or Darius the Mede, seven years^d. Authors are strangely at variance with each other as to the manner of his death. Xenophon's account, who makes him die in his bed as fortunately as he lived, amidst his friends and in his own country, seems to us by far the most probable. For all authors agree that he was buried at Pasargada in Persia, where Xenophon says he died, and his monument was to be seen in the time of Alexander the Great. Had he been slain in Scythia, as Herodotus and Justin relate, and his body mangled as they would have us believe, how could it ever have been rescued out of the hands of those enraged Barbarians, and buried at Pasargada? Besides, it is by no means probable that such a wise man as Cyrus is represented to have been, and so far advanced in years, would have engaged in so rash an undertaking as the Scythian expedition is described to have been by those who relate it. Neither can it be conceived how after so great an overthrow the Persian empire could have subsisted, especially in the hands of such a successor as Cambyfes was. For Herodotus tells us, that he was killed; and his whole army, consisting of 200,000 men, cut in pieces (M).
- c ON his death-bed he appointed his son Cambyfes to succeed him; who accordingly took possession of that vast empire. To his other son Smerdis he left several considerable governments. Cambyfes, known in scripture by the name of Abasuerus^e, was scarce well settled on the throne when he resolved upon a war with the Egyptians. The occasion of this war, as related by Herodotus, seems fabulous^f. 'Tis most likely that Amasis, who was then king of Egypt, and had probably submitted to Cyrus; did upon the death of that great conqueror, refuse to pay his successor the same homage and tribute. But be that as it will, Cambyfes in order to carry on the war with success made vast preparations both by sea and land. The Cypriots and Phenicians furnished him with ships; and for his land-forces, he added to his own troops great numbers of auxiliaries, especially of Greeks Ionians, and Æolians, who were the main strength of his army. But the greatest help he had in this war was from Phanes of Halicarnassus, who being commander of some Greek auxiliaries in the service of Amasis, took some disgust, and going over to Cambyfes made such discoveries to him of the nature of the country, the strength of the enemy, and the state of affairs in Egypt, as greatly contributed to the success of this expedition. 'Twas particularly by his advice, that Cambyfes contracted with an Arabian king; whose territories lay between the confines of Palestine and Egypt, to furnish his army with water during his march through deserts that parted those two countries.
- d The Arabian fulfilled his agreement by sending many camels loaded with skins full of water, without which Cambyfes could never have marched his army that way^g.

(M) Diodorus Siculus (13) tells us that he was taken prisoner by Tomyris queen of the Massagetes, and by her orders crucified. Ctesias (14) says, that in a battle against the Derbicans, a people bordering upon Hyrcania, he was wounded in the thigh by a certain Indian, of which wound he died three days after. John Melela of Antioch, out of a forged book ascribed to Pythagoras acquaints us that he was slain in a sea-fight by the Samians.

Some writers tell us (15) that after the reduction of Babylon, Cyrus, having a victorious army at his devotion, and Cyaxares being returned from Babylon into Media, revolted from Cyaxares in conjunction with the Persians under him, who were incited thereunto by Harpagus a Mede, and Atabazus who had assisted Cyrus in subduing Asia minor, and had been injured by Darius. Harpagus was sent by Cyaxares with an army against Cyrus; but in the heat of the battle revolted with great part of the army to Cyrus. Cyaxares raised a new army, and was again defeated near Pasargada in Persia, and taken prisoner. By this victory, say they, the monarchy was translated from the Medes to the Persians. But this account we have already rejected as not agreeing so well with holy writ as that which we read in Xenophon.

Pelusium taken by a stratagem.

BEING thus prepared, he invaded Egypt in the fourth year of his reign. On his arrival upon the borders of that kingdom, he was informed that Amasis was just dead, and that his son Psammetis, who had succeeded him, was drawing together a powerful army to prevent his penetrating into the kingdom. Before Cambyfes could open a passage into the country, it was necessary for him to take Pelusium, which was the key of Egypt on that side. But as that was a strong place, and in a condition to hold out a long time, Cambyfes had recourse to the following stratagem probably suggested to him by Phanes. Being informed that the whole garrison consisted of Egyptians, he placed in the front of his army a great number of cats, dogs, sheep, and other animals that were look'd upon as sacred by that nation, and then attacked the city. The soldiers of the garrison not daring to throw a dart, or shoot an arrow that way through fear of killing some of those animals, Cambyfes possessed himself of the place without opposition.

Cambyfes defeats Psammetis.

Psammetis put to death.

Amasis's body cruelly used.

Cambyfes had scarce taken possession of this important place, when Psammetis at the head of a powerful army advanced to stop his further progress; whereupon a bloody battle ensued between the two armies †. But before they engaged, the Greeks and Carians who served under Psammetis to shew their resentment against Phanes, for introducing the Persians into Egypt, brought his children into the camp, killed them in the sight of their father, and in the presence of the two armies drank their blood. The Persians, enraged at so cruel a sight, fell upon the Egyptian army with such fury that they soon put them to flight, and cut the greatest part of them in pieces. Those who saved themselves by flight retired to Memphis (N). Cambyfes pursued them close, and arriving at Memphis, sent a herald into the city, on a vessel of Mitylene, by the river Nile on which Memphis stood, to summon the inhabitants to surrender. But the people transported with rage fell upon the herald, and tore him and all that were with him to pieces. But Cambyfes after a short siege having stormed the place, fully revenged their death, causing ten Egyptians of the first rank to be publicly executed for every one of those they had slain, and the eldest son of Psammetis was one of the number. As for the king himself who was taken prisoner, Cambyfes was inclined to treat him kindly; for he not only spared his life, but appointed him an honourable maintenance: But he, not at all affected with this kind usage, did all that lay in his power to raise new troubles in hopes of recovering his crown; whereupon he was condemned to drink bull's blood, and thus ended his life after a reign of six months, and with him died the ancient splendor and liberty of Egypt, for all that country immediately submitted to the conqueror.

ON the news of this success the Lybians, Cyrenians and Borceans sent ambassadors with presents to Cambyfes, declaring themselves ready to submit to him, and receive his forces into their strong holds. From Memphis he marched to the city of Sais, the burying-place of the Egyptian kings. Here he caused the body of Amasis to be inhumanly taken out of its tomb, and after exposing it to a thousand indignities, he ordered it to be thrown into the fire and burnt. The wrath, which this prince vented upon the dead body of Amasis, shews the irreconcilable hatred he bore him. Whatever was the cause of that aversion, he seems to have been by it chiefly prompted to invade Egypt.

(N) On occasion of this battle Herodotus (16) takes notice of an extraordinary circumstance, whereof he himself was an eye-witness. The bones of the Persians and Egyptians were in his time still to be seen in the place where the battle was fought, but separated from each other. The skulls of the Egyptians, says he, were so hard that they could hardly be broken by the violent blow of a large stone; whereas those of the Persians were so soft and weak, that they were broke with the least blow of a pebble. This difference, as our author tells us, was owing to the Egyptian custom of shaving the heads of their children early; by which means the bones were rendered thicker and stronger through the heat of the sun, and the head preserved from baldness, there being fewer people bald in Egypt, as Herodotus observes, than in any other country. As the heads of the Egyptians were strengthened by this method, so those of the Persians were softened by the contrary custom. For they were not exposed to the sun, but always covered with caps and turbans. Our author adds, that he observed the same thing at Papremis in those who fought with Abanater the son of Darius were defeated by Inarus king of Lybia.

a THE next year, which was the sixth of his reign, he resolved upon three different expeditions; the first against the Carthaginians, the second against the Hammonians, and the third against the Ethiopians. But he was forced to drop the first project by reason the Phœnicians, without whose help he could not carry on that war, refused to assist him against the Carthaginians who were descended from them, Carthage being originally a Tyrian colony. But his heart being set on the other two expeditions, he sent ambassadors into Ethiopia, who under that character were to act as spies, and give him intelligence of the state and strength of the country. But the Ethiopians being well apprized of the errand on which they were come, treated them with great contempt. However the Ethiopian king in return for the presents

b they brought him from Cambyfes sent him back his own bow, advising him to make war upon the Ethiopians when the Persians could as easily bend that bow as they could. Before he delivered the bow to the Persian ambassadors, he addressed them with this speech. " 'Tis not from any consideration of my friendship that the king of Persia sent you with these presents; neither have you spoken truth, but are come into my kingdom as spies. If your master were an honest man he would desire no more than his own, and not attempt to enslave a people who had never done him any injury. However, give him this bow from me, and let him know that the king of Ethiopia advises the king of Persia to make war upon the Ethiopians when the Persians shall be able thus easily to bend so strong a bow, and in the mean time to thank the gods that they have never inspired the Ethiopians with a desire of extending their dominions beyond their own country. "

c Cambyfes being informed by his ambassadors of all that had passed, flew into a violent passion, and ordered his army immediately to begin their march, without considering that they were furnished neither with provisions nor any other necessaries for such an expedition. He left the Greek auxiliaries behind him to keep the new-conquered countries in awe during his absence, and with the whole body of his land-forces began his march. When he arrived at Thebes in the upper Egypt, he detached 50,000 men against the Hammonians, ordering them to ravage the whole country, and burn the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, while he with the rest of his army should

d march against the Ethiopians. But before he had marched a fifth part of the way, his provisions were consumed, and the army reduced to the necessity of eating their beasts of burthen. Cambyfes notwithstanding these difficulties pursued his rash attempt, and the soldiers fed upon herbs and grass so long as they found any in their way. But when they arrived in the sandy deserts, they were brought to such extremities as to be obliged to devour one another; every tenth man, upon whom the lot fell, being doomed to serve as food for his companions; a food, says Seneca, more to be dreaded than famine itself^a. The king still persisted in his mad design, till at last being apprehensive of the danger his own person was in, he gave over the enterprize, and retreated to Thebes, after having lost great part of his army in this wild attempt^e.

As for that part of the army which was sent against the Ammonians, they marched from Thebes, and by the help of their guides arrived at the city of Oasis, inhabited by Samians, and seven days march distant from Thebes. Nobody doubts, as our author informs us^f, but they arrived at that place. But what was their fate afterwards is uncertain, for they never returned either to Egypt or their own country. The Ammonians informed Herodotus, that they marched from Oasis, and that after they had entered the sandy desert which lies beyond that city, a violent wind began to blow from the south at the time of their dinner, and raised the sands to such a degree, that the whole army was overwhelmed and buried alive.

f Cambyfes on his return to Thebes, caused all the temples, which in that superstitious city were very rich and numerous, to be pillaged and burnt down to the ground. We may judge of the richness of those temples from the remains saved from the flames, which amounted to the sum of 300 talents of gold, and two thousand three hundred talents of silver. He likewise carried away the famous circle of gold that encompassed the tomb of king Ozymandias, being 365 cubits in circumference, and on which were represented all the motions of the several constellations^g.

He destroys all the Egyptian temples.

FROM Thebes Cambyfes marched back to Memphis, where he discharged the Greek mercenaries, and sent them to their respective countries. On his entry into this city finding the citizens all in mirth and jollity because their god Apis had then appeared among them, he was highly provoked, as supposing that they rejoiced because of his unsuccessful expedition. He therefore called the magistrates to learn of them the cause of that publick mirth. They gave him a true account of the whole matter; but he not believing what they said, caused them all to be put to death. He sent afterwards for the priests, who made him the same answer, telling him that it had been always their custom when their god appeared amongst them to celebrate his appearance with the greatest demonstrations of joy they could express. To this he replied, that if their god was so kind and familiar as to shew himself to them, he would be acquainted with him, and therefore commanded the deity to be brought forthwith before him^a.

god Apis.

THE chief god of the Egyptians was Osiris, at Memphis called Apis. This god they worshipped in the shape of a bull, and always kept in his temple a bull to which they paid divine honours in his stead. He was to be the calf of a cow incapable of bearing another, and impregnated, as the Egyptians believed, by thunder. We have spoke elsewhere¹ of the marks which were to distinguish him from all others. When he died, another with the same marks was sought for and put in his room. When this calf was brought to Cambyfes, who expected to see some deity, he flew into a violent passion, and drawing his dagger wounded the Apis in the thigh, and reproaching the priests for their stupidity in worshipping a brute, ordered them severely to be whipt, and all the Egyptians at Memphis, that should be found celebrating the feast of Apis, to be slain. The Apis after he had languished some time died of his wound in the temple, and was buried by the priests, who carefully concealed his death from *Cambyfes*².

Instances of that monarch's madness and cruelty.

THE Egyptians say, that after this sacrilegious action, which was looked upon by them as the greatest instance of impiety that ever was committed amongst them, Cambyfes was immediately seized with lunacy and grew mad. But his actions shewed that he was so long before, of which he gave several instances. We find the following upon record.

HE had a brother by the same father and mother called by Xenophon Tanaoxares, Smerdis by Herodotus, and by Justin Mergis. He attended Cambyfes on his Egyptian expedition; but being the only person in the army that would bend the bow within two fingers breadth which the king of Ethiopia had sent, Cambyfes from hence conceived such a jealousy of him, that being no longer able to bear him in the army, he sent him back into Persia. After his departure Cambyfes dreamed that a messenger arrived from Persia told him that Smerdis was seated on the throne, and touched the heavens with his head. Whereupon suspecting that his brother aspired to the crown, he dispatched Prexaspes, one of his confidants into Persia with orders to put him to death, which he accordingly executed³.

THIS murder was followed by another still more criminal. Cambyfes had with him in the camp his youngest sister by name Meroe. As this princess was very beautiful, he fell violently in love with her, and was desirous to marry her. But being convinced of the novelty of his design, he summoned all the royal judges of the Persian nation, whose office it was to interpret the laws, to know whether there was any law allowing a brother to marry a sister. The judges being unwilling to authorize such an incestuous marriage, and at the same time dreading the effects of the king's violent temper should they contradict him, returned this crafty answer: That they truly knew of no law allowing a man to marry his own sister, but had a law which gave the king of Persia liberty to do whatever he pleased. Upon this answer he solemnly married her, and thereby gave the first example of that incest, which was afterwards practised by most of his successors, and by some of them carried so far as to marry their own daughters. This sister he took with him in all his expeditions, and gave her name to an island in the Nile between Egypt and Ethiopia, which he conquered on his wild expedition against the Ethiopians. The occasion and manner of her death is reported in the following manner: As Cambyfes was one day diverting himself in seeing a young dog and the whelp of a lion fighting, the dog being over-matched, another of the same litter breaking loose, came to his assistance, by which means the lion was mastered. Whilst the king was mightily pleased with this adventure, Meroe, who sat by him, began

- a to weep, and being obliged to tell her husband the cause of her grief, she confessed that this accident put her in mind of the fate of her brother Smerdis, whom nobody had been good-natured enough to assist. There needed no more than this to excite the rage of that brutal prince, who notwithstanding her being with child, gave her such a blow with his foot on the belly, that she miscarried and soon after died (N).

- He caused also several of the chief lords of his court to be buried alive, and daily sacrificed some of them to his wild fury. He one day asked Prexaspes, who was his chief favourite, what the Persians said of him, and what character they gave him in their private conversations. Prexaspes answered, that they highly applauded his actions in general, but thought him too much addicted to wine. I understand you, replied the king, they pretend that wine deprives me of my understanding, but whether this charge be true or not you shall be judge. Upon which he began to drink to a far greater excess than he had ever done before. Then ordering the son of Prexaspes, who was his cup-bearer, to stand upright at the farther end of the room with his left hand upon his head, and then turning to Prexaspes, If I shoot, said he, this arrow through the heart of thy son, the Persians you must own have slandered me; but if I miss, I shall willingly allow them to have spoke the truth. He had no sooner uttered these words, than drawing his bow he shot the arrow through the body of the young man. Then commanding him to be opened, and finding the arrow had pierced his heart, he asked the father with great joy, and in an insulting manner, whether he had ever seen a man shoot with a more steady hand, and whether or no the Persians had injured his character by saying that wine deprived him of his reason? The unfortunate father, being under great apprehensions for his own life, answered, that a god could not have shot more dexterously (O).

Prexaspes's son shot to death.

- While he was proceeding in this furious manner, Cresus king of Lydia thought fit to lay before him the bad consequences that might attend so tyrannical a government; which provoked him to such a degree, that he ordered him to be put to death. But the officers, who received his orders, suspended the execution of the sentence, and concealed Cresus, thinking that if Cambyfes should enquire for him, and repent of his rash resolution, they should be well rewarded for saving his life; but if they found, that Cambyfes neither altered his mind, nor desired to see him, they might still put him to death pursuant to their orders. The very next day he asked for Cresus, which the officers hearing, acquainted him that the king of Lydia was still alive. Cambyfes was transported with joy when he heard that his orders had not been put in execution, but at the same time commanded all those who had saved him to be immediately put to death because they had not obeyed his orders.

Cresus ordered to be put to death.

- Cambyfes* in the beginning of the 8th year of his reign left Egypt in order to return to Persia. On his coming into Syria he met an herald sent from Susa to the army, to acquaint them that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was proclaimed king, and command them all to acknowledge and obey him. This event was brought about in the following manner. Cambyfes at his departure from Susa on the Egyptian expedition had left the administration of affairs during his absence in the hands of Patizibes one of the chief of the Mages. This Patizibes had a brother who very much resembled Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and was, perhaps, on that account called by the same name. As soon as he was fully assured of the death of that prince, which had been carefully concealed from most others, and at the same time informed that Cambyfes indulged his tyrannical temper to such a degree that he was grown insupportable, he placed his own brother on the throne, giving out that he was the true

(N) The Egyptians; as our author informs us (17), relate the matter in a different way. They say, that as Cambyfes and his sister were at table, she took a lettuce, and pulling the leaves asunder, asked her husband, whether an entire lettuce was not more beautiful than one pulled in pieces? He answered, it was; whereupon Meroe reply'd, that he had represented the broken lettuce by dismembering the house of Cyrus. Upon these words Cambyfes

(O) Seneca (18), who copied this story from Herodotus, after shewing his detestation of such a barbarous and cruel action, condemns still more the monstrous flattery of the father with these memorable words; Sceleratius telum illud laudatum quam missum.

Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, and immediately dispatched heralds into all the parts ^a of the empire to give notice of Smerdis's accession to the crown, and require all the provinces to pay him their obedience. The herald who was dispatched to Egypt finding Cambyfes with his army at Ecbatan in Syria, placed himself in the midst of the army, and openly proclaimed the orders of Patizibes. Cambyfes caused him to be seized, and having strictly examined him in the presence of Prexaspes, who had received orders to kill his brother, he found that the true Smerdis was certainly dead, and that he, who had usurped the throne, was Smerdis the Mage. The mention of that name greatly affected Cambyfes, and revived in his memory the dream, in which he had seen a messenger who came to acquaint him that Smerdis was seated on the throne. Reflecting how unjustly he had murdered his brother, he burst out ^b in a flood of tears, and immediately ordered his army to march with a design to suppress the growing rebellion. But as he was mounting his horse, his sword slipped out of the scabbard, and wounded him in the thigh. Being thus wounded, he asked the name of the city, and being informed that the place was called Ecbatan, he said in the presence of all, fate has decreed that Cambyfes the son of Cyrus shall die in this place. For while he was in Egypt, having consulted the oracle of Butus, which was very famous in that country, he was told that he should die at Ecbatan; which he understanding of Ecbatan in Media, resolved to save his life by avoiding that place; but what he thought to avoid in Media he found in Syria. And therefore being informed that the place, where he received the wound, was called Ec-^cbatan, taking it for certain that he must die there, he assembled the chief Persian lords that served in the army, and having represented to them the true state of the case, he earnestly exhorted them never to submit to the impostor, or suffer the sovereignty to pass again from the Persians to the Medes, of which nation Smerdis the Mage was, but to use their utmost endeavours to place on the throne one of their own blood. But the Persians suspecting all this was said by him out of hatred to his brother, had no regard to it, and Cambyfes dying a few days after of his wound which mortified, they quietly submitted to the person whom they found on the throne, supposing him to be the true Smerdis. To this delusion Prexaspes greatly contributed by saying that he had not killed Smerdis the son of Cyrus ^d with his own hand ^e.

Cambyfes reigned seven years and five months. When he came first to the crown, the Samaritans begged of him that he would put a stop to the building of the temple at Jerusalem. And their application was not in vain, for though he had so much respect for the memory of his father, as not openly to revoke his decree, yet in a great measure he frustrated the design of it by laying the Jews under such difficulties that they could not pursue the work ^a.

Smerdis the Mage mounts the throne. This prince is called in scripture ^a Artaxerxes, by Herodotus Smerdis, by Æschylus Mardys, by Ctesias Spendadates, and by Justin Orapastes. As soon as he had taken upon him the sovereignty, he granted to all his subjects an exemption from taxes and ^e all military service for three years, and treated them with such beneficence, that all the nations of Asia, the Persians only excepted, expressed great sorrow on the revolution that happened a few months after. And further to secure himself on the throne he married Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, thinking that in case of a discovery he might hold the empire by her title. She had been before married to her brother Cambyfes, who upon the above-mentioned decision of the royal judges, having married one of his sisters, took to wife also the other. And the Mage pretending to be her brother, married her upon the same footing. But the precautions he made use of to prevent his being discovered, only increased the suspicion that he was not the true Smerdis. He had married all his predecessor's wives, and among the rest Pbedyma the daughter of Otanes a Persian nobleman of the first rank. Otanes to be fully satisfied in this matter sent a trusty messenger to his daughter to know of her whether the King was really Smerdis the son of Cyrus, or some other man. Pbedyma returned answer, that as she had never seen Smerdis the son of Cyrus, she could not satisfy his curiosity. Otanes by a second message desired her to enquire of Atossa, who could not but know her own brother, whether this were he or not. But his daughter let him know, that she was not allowed to speak with Atossa, or see any other of the women, because the king, whoever he was, had

- a from the very beginning of his reign lodged his wives in distinct and separate apartments. This answer greatly increased the suspicion of Otanes, who thereupon sent a third message to his daughter directing her when she should be next invited to his bed to take the opportunity, while he was asleep, of feeling whether he had ears or no; for Cyrus having formerly caused the ears of Smerdis the Mage to be cut off for a crime he had been guilty of, he told her, that if the king had ears she might be sure that he was Smerdis the son of Cyrus; but if otherwise, he could be no other than Smerdis the Mage, and therefore unworthy of possessing the crown of her person. Phedyma answered, that the danger was very great, because if the king had no ears and should surprise her endeavouring to find out such a truth, he would not fail putting her to death: nevertheless in obedience to the commands of her father she would make the attempt, and take upon her to satisfy his doubt. And accordingly the next time she was called to his bed, as soon as she perceived him fast asleep she took the opportunity of making the trial, and finding he had no ears, early next morning acquainted her father therewith, whereby the imposture was discovered. Otanes upon this information imparted the whole affair to Gobryas and Aspatbines, Persians of great distinction and whose honour he could rely on. These three agreed among themselves that each of them should name one of his most trusty friends to be admitted into the secret. Pursuant to this resolution Otanes named Intaphernes, Gobryas Megabyfus, and Aspatbines Hydarnes. In the mean time Darius, the son of Hystaspes arriving at Susa from Persia where his father was governour, they all agreed to make him privy to all their resolutions, which they did accordingly. Darius at their first meeting told them, that he thought no man in Persia but himself had known that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was really dead, and the crown usurped by a Mage, and therefore he was come with a design to kill the usurper, without imparting his design to any other, that the glory of such an action might be entirely his own. But since others were apprised of the imposture, he was of opinion that the usurper should be dispatched with all expedition, delays being in such cases very dangerous, and the best-concerted designs easily disappointed. Otanes on the other hand was for putting off the execution of their design till some better opportunity offered, and not attempting the enterprize till they had increased their number. But Darius remonstrating the danger there was of being discovered and betrayed if they let the present opportunity slip, or imparted their design to others, and openly protesting, that if they did not make the attempt that very day he would prevent any one from accusing him by disclosing the whole matter to the Mage; it was unanimously agreed that they should not separate under any pretence whatsoever, but immediately upon the breaking up of their meeting, go to the palace, and either put the usurper to death, or die in the attempt.
- c WHILE they were concerting their measures, the two Mages in order to remove all suspicion engaged Prenaspes in their interest, and with great promises prevailed upon him to give his word, and oblige himself by oath never to discover the fraud they had put upon the Persians. Prenaspes, as we have related above, knew that Smerdis the son of Cyrus was not living, having by the command of Cambyfes put him to death with his own hand. The Mages having engaged Prenaspes to be silent, acquainted him farther, that having determined to assemble all the Persians under the walls of the palace, they desired he would ascend a certain tower, and from thence publicly declare that the king upon the throne was truly Smerdis the son of Cyrus. Prenaspes having taken upon him this office, the Mages summoned the Persians together, and commanded him to mount the tower, and from thence harangue the people. Prenaspes began his discourse with the genealogy of Cyrus, and then put the Persians in mind of the great favours the nation had received from that prince. After having extolled Cyrus and his family, to the great astonishment of all, he sincerely declared all that had passed, and told the people, that the apprehensions of the danger he must inevitably run by publishing the imposture had constrained him to conceal it so long; but now, his remorse no longer suffering him to act such a dishonourable part, he acknowledged that he had been compelled by Cambyfes to put his brother to death with his own hand, and that the person who possessed the throne was Smerdis the Mage. He then begged pardon of the gods and men for the crime he had committed by compulsion and against his will, and fulminating many imprecations against the Persians if they should neglect to recover the sovereignty and punish the usurper, he threw himself head-long from the top of the tower, and died on the spot. 'Tis easy to imagine what confusion the news of this accident occasioned in the palace.

Lords forced in to the palace.

In the mean time the conspirators, not knowing what had happened, were going to the palace determined to execute their design. On their way they were informed of what Prenafpes had said and done, which obliging them to retire and confer together, Otanes earnestly desired them anew to defer the enterprize. But Darius still insisting upon the immediate execution, and rejecting all proposals of delay (P), they fell in with his opinion and went directly to the palace. The guards respecting their dignity, and not suspecting persons of their rank and figure, permitted them to pass without asking them any questions. But as they came near the king's apartment, the eunuchs, who attended there to receive messages, refused them admittance, and threatened the guards for permitting them to pass. Upon this the seven Persians encouraging each other drew their swords, killed all that opposed their passage, and penetrated to the very room where the two Mages were consulting about the late affair of Prenafpes. They no sooner heard this tumult and uproar, but the one taking up a bow and the other a javelin, the weapons that came first to hand in that confusion, they engaged the conspirators. He, who had the bow, soon found that weapon of no use in so close an action; but the other with his javelin wounded Aspatbines in the thigh, and struck out the eye of Intapbernes. One of the brothers being killed, the other retired into a room adjoining to the place where they fought, with a design to shut himself in; but was so closely pursued by Darius and Gobryas, that they broke into the room with him. Gobryas having seized him, held him fast in his arms, but as it was quite dark in that place, Darius stood still, not knowing how to direct his blow, and fearing to strike lest he should kill his friend instead of the enemy; which Gobryas perceiving, desired him to strike though he should kill them both. Upon this Darius resolved to put all to the venture, and by good fortune killed the usurper. Having thus dispatched the two brothers, they cut off their heads, and leaving their two wounded companions to secure the palace, the other five carrying the head of the two Mages, with their hands all smeared with blood, marched out of the palace, exposed the heads to the eyes of the people, and declared the whole imposture. The Persians being informed of what had passed, were so enraged against the impostors, that they fell upon the whole sect, and killed every Mage they met; and if night coming on had not put an end to the slaughter, no one of that order had been left alive. The day on which this happened was ever afterwards celebrated by the Persians with the greatest solemnity, called by the name of Magophonia, or the slaughter of the Mages. On that festival the Mages durst not for many years after appear abroad, but were obliged to shut themselves up in their houses.

Smerdis reigned only eight months, during which time a stop was put to the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. For as soon as he was seated on the throne, the Samaritans acquainted him, that the Jews were rebuilding their city and temple, that they had always been a rebellious and stubborn people, and that if he allowed them to finish that work they would without doubt withdraw their obedience from the king, whereby he would lose all the provinces on that side the Euphrates. For the truth of what they said concerning the ungovernable temper of the Jews, they referred him to the records of his predecessors, which they desired him to enquire into touching this matter. And accordingly Smerdis upon these remonstrances having caused the records to be carefully examined, and finding with what difficulty the Jews had been reduced by Nabuchadnezzar, issued an edict, forbidding them to proceed any farther in the work they had begun, and charged the Samaritans to see

b But to return to the conspirators; when the tumult and disorders, which attend such events, were appeased, they met to consult among themselves what form of government they should introduce. Otanes was for a republick, Megabyzus spoke for an oligarchy, and Darius declared for monarchy. The opinion of the latter was, after a long debate, embraced by all except Otanes, who finding his sentiments over-ruled, told them that since they were resolved to set up a king he would not be their competitor for a dignity which he abhorred, and that being determined not to govern as a king he would not be governed by one, and therefore was willing to give up his right to the crown on condition that neither he nor his posterity should be subject to the royal power. The other six granted him his demand; whereupon he immediately retired, and his descendants alone retained their liberty, which they enjoyed even in our author's days, being then no farther subject to the king than it suited their conveniency, and only obliged to conform to the customs and manners of the country.

UPON his departure the other six began to deliberate in what manner they should proceed to the election of a new king. But in the first place they unanimously agreed that whosoever of them should be chosen, he should every year present Otanes and his posterity with a Median vest, a mark of great distinction among the Persians, because he had been the chief author of the enterprize. In the next place they determined, c that the seven should have full liberty to enter into all the apartments of the palace without being introduced; and that the king should not be allowed to marry a woman out of any other family than of the seven conspirators. Then taking the future election into consideration, they thought fit to refer it to the gods; and accordingly they all agreed to meet the next morning by the rising of the sun on horse-back at an appointed place in the suburbs of the city, and that he, whose horse first neighed, should be king. For the sun being the chief deity of the Persians, they imagined by this method to refer the election to him. Ochares, who had the charge of Darius's horses, hearing of this agreement, led a mare over-night to the place appointed and brought to her his master's horse. The next morning the six Persians repairing to the place pursuant to their agreement, Darius's horse remembering the mare immediately neighed, and his competitors dismounting adored him as king.

THE Persian empire being thus restored by the valour of these seven lords, they were raised by the new king to the highest dignities, and honoured with most ample privileges; in all publick affairs they were the first to deliver their opinions; and ever afterwards the Persian kings of this race had seven chief counsellors privileged in the same manner, and by whose advice all the publick affairs of the kingdom were transacted. Under this character we find them often mentioned in scripture.

Darius was the son of Hystaspes a noble Persian of the royal family of Achaemenes who had attended Cyrus in all his wars, and was at that time governor of the province of Persia. Darius is called in the writings of the modern Persians Gushasp, and his father Lorasph, and are famous among the Persians to this day. Darius the better to establish himself on the throne married the two daughters of Cyrus, Aossa and Artystona. The former had been wife to her brother Cambyzes, and also to the Mage, but Artystona had not been married before, and proved the most favoured and beloved of all his wives; for to these he added Parmys the daughter of the true Smerdis, and Phedyma the daughter of Otanes, who detected the Mage. Having thus confirmed his power, he divided the whole empire into twenty satrapies or governments, and appointed a governor over each division, ordering them to pay an annual tribute. Persia alone was excepted from all manner of taxes; the Ethiopians

(Q) That Cambyzes was the Abasuerus and Smerdis the Artaxerxes of scripture is plain from their obstructing the work of the temple. For they are said in the sacred history to have reigned between Cyrus and Darius by whose decree the temple was finished. But none reigning between Cyrus and Darius except Cambyzes and Smerdis, we must conclude that none but Cambyzes and Smerdis could be the Abasuerus and Artaxerxes, who are said in Ezra (20) to have put a stop to this work.

His revenue. and inhabitants of Colchis were enjoined to make only some presents, and the Arabians to furnish yearly such a quantity of frankincense as was equal in weight to a thousand talents. By this establishment Darius received the yearly tribute of 14560 Euboic talents, besides several other sums of small consequence.

Intaphernes put to death. Darius in the very beginning of his reign put to death Intaphernes one of the seven conspirators, on the following occasion. Intaphernes went to the palace to confer with Darius; but attempting to enter, pursuant to the agreement above-mentioned, in virtue of which they were to have free access to the king at all hours except when he was alone with some of his wives, he was stoppt by the door-keeper and a messenger, under colour that the king was in company with one of his wives. Intaphernes not believing them drew his scimeter, and having cut off both their noses and ears fastened their heads in a bridle, and so left them. In this condition they went in, and shewing themselves to the king, acquainted him with the cause of the ill usage they had received. Darius apprehending that this attempt might have been concerted by the six, sent for them, one after another, and asked whether they approved the action. But finding that Intaphernes alone was guilty, he caused him to be seized with his children and family, lest his relations, whom he suspected, should raise a rebellion. While they were under confinement, the wife of Intaphernes made such loud complaints and lamentations at the gates of the palace, that Darius touched with compassion granted her the life of any one among her relations, leaving her the choice of the person. She after some deliberation chose her brother. Which Darius hearing, asked her, why she had so little regard for her husband and children as to save the life of her brother rather than theirs. The woman readily answered, that she could get another husband, and have by him other children if she should be deprived of those she had; but could never have another brother, her father and mother being already dead. The king was so well pleased with this answer, that he not only pardoned her brother, but saved also her eldest son. The others were all put to death with Intaphernes, without any regard to his late deserts *.

Year of the flood 2478. Before Christ 521.

The building of the temple resumed by a new edict of Darius.

In the beginning of the second year of Darius the Jews resumed the work of the temple, being exhorted thereto by the prophet Haggai *. Which the Samaritans understanding, applied themselves to Tatnai whom Darius had appointed governor of Syria and Palestine, acquainting him, that the Jews were not authorized to pursue that work, which if perfected would encourage them to shake off the Persian yoke. Upon these remonstrances Tatnai accompanied by Setbarboznai, who seems to have been governor of Samaria, went up to Jerusalem, and after viewing the work enquired of the elders, by what authority they had resumed it. The elders produced the decree of Cyrus; whereupon the governor, who was a man of great justice and probity, wrote to the king, fairly stating the case, and desiring that search might be made into the archives for the decree of Cyrus, which the Jews produced to justify themselves in what they were doing. The king upon the receipt of this letter ordered the archives of Babylon and Ecbatan to be carefully examined, and the decree being found in those of the latter, for Cyrus was at Ecbatan in Media when he granted it, the king commanded it to be strictly observed in every particular, and having sent it to Tatnai and Setbarboznai enjoined them to see it fully and effectually put in execution, decreeing that whosoever should attempt to alter the edict, or prevent its being put in execution, should have his house pulled down, and a gibbet being made of the timber of it, he should be hanged thereon. On the publication of this decree at Jerusalem, the work of the temple went on very successfully and the state of the Jews in Judea and Jerusalem was entirely restored (R) b.

Year of the flood 2482. Before Christ 517. The Babylonians revolt.

ABOUT the beginning of the fifth year of Darius, the Babylonians not being f able to live any longer in subjection to the Persians, who not only loaded them with heavy taxes, but had removed the imperial seat from Babylon, formerly the mistress of the east, to Susa, and thereby greatly diminished the splendor of that city, attempted to retrieve their ancient grandure by setting up for themselves against the Persians, as they had done in former times against the Assyrians. a this view, taking advantage of the troubles that had happened first on the death of Cambyfes, and afterwards on the murder of the usurper Smerdis, they had privately stored their city with all manner of provisions for many years, and at last broke out into an open rebellion, which drew Darius with all his forces to besiege the city. The Babylonians seeing themselves shut up by so numerous and powerful an army, turned all their thoughts to the supporting of a long siege, which they imagined would tire out the enemies troops. To prevent the consumption of their provisions they took the most desperate and barbarous resolution, that ever was put in execution by any nation. They agreed among themselves to get rid of all unnecessary mouths, and therefore drawing together all the women, old men and children, they strangled them without distinction, whether wives, fathers, mothers, or sisters, every one being allowed to save only the wife he liked best, and a maid-servant to do the work of the house *.

Darius having lain before Babylon a year and eight months, and being no less tired than his army with so tedious a siege, endeavoured by various stratagems and artifices to take the place; among others he made use of that which had succeeded so well with Cyrus. But all his efforts were rendered ineffectual by the unwearied vigilance of the Babylonians. When he was ready to break up the siege and return to Persia, Zopyrus one of his chief commanders put him in possession of the town by the following contrivance. He cut off his nose and ears, and having mangled his body in a most cruel manner with stripes, fled to the Babylonians thus disfigured, feigning to have been so treated by Darius for advising him to raise the siege. The Babylonians seeing a man of that distinction so barbarously used, believed all he said against Darius, and assuring themselves of his fidelity, gave him the command of some forces. With these he sallied out, and having surrounded ten thousand Persians, which Darius by agreement had posted near the walls, he cut them all in pieces on the spot. A few days after in another sally he killed two thousand more; which so pleased the Babylonians, that he was appointed commander in chief of all their forces. Being vested with this command, he made a third sally, and put four thousand more Persians to the sword. Upon this success Zopyrus acquired such credit, that the guard of the city was entirely committed to his care. Not long after Darius, pursuant to the agreement they had made, advanced with the whole body of his army, and surrounded the city. The Babylonians mounting the walls made a vigorous defence; but in the mean time Zopyrus opening the gates of Belus and Ciffia, introduced the Persians, and delivered the city up to Darius, who without this stratagem could never have mastered it. Thus Babylon was taken a second time, and Darius being put in possession of it, beat down the walls from 200 cubits high to 50; and of these walls only Strabo^d is to be understood to speak, where he tells us that the walls of Babylon were only fifty cubits high. As for the inhabitants, after having impaled about three thousand of the most guilty and active in the revolt, he pardoned the rest. And because the Babylonians had destroyed their women, he took care to furnish them with wives, enjoining the neighbouring provinces to send 50000 women to Babylon, without which supply the place must soon have become depopulated. As for Zopyrus he was deservedly rewarded by Darius with the highest honours he could heap upon him during the whole course of his life. That prince frequently used to say, that he would willingly lose twenty Babylons rather than see Zopyrus so disfigured. Besides many other ample rewards he bestowed upon him the revenues of Babylon for life, free from all charges and taxes, and could never after behold him without shedding many tears *.

AFTER the reduction of Babylon, Darius undertook an expedition against the Scythians inhabiting those countries, which lie between the Danube and the Tanais. His pretence for this war was to revenge the calamities which they had brought upon Asia, when they invaded that country about 120 years before, and held it in subjection for the space of 28 years, as we have related in part in the history of Media †, and shall more fully in that of the Scythians *. This he gave out as the motive inducing him to a war, which his ambition alone, and desire of extending his conquests prompted him to. Having made vast preparations for this expedition, and levied an army of 700,000 men, he marched to the Thracian Bosphorus, and having there passed over on a bridge of boats, he reduced all Thrace; from Thrace he advanced to the Ister or Danube, where he had appointed his fleet to join him. Here he marched his army over another bridge of boats, and entered Scythia. The Scythians, after having conferred together about the measures they should take to oppose so powerful an enemy, determined not to venture an engagement in the open field, but to withdraw themselves from the frontiers in proportion as the Persians advanced, laying waste the country and filling up the wells and springs. Pursuant to this resolution they met Darius on the frontiers; and finding him disposed to give them battle, they retired, drawing from country to country till his army was quite tired with such tedious and fatiguing marches. At last he began to be sensible of the danger he was in of perishing with all his forces; and having resolved to give over that rash enterprize and retire home, he lighted in the night a great number of fires, and leaving the old men and sick behind him in the camp, he marched off with all possible expedition in order to reach the Danube. The Scythians perceiving the next morning that the enemy was decamped, detached a considerable body to the Danube, who, as they were well acquainted with the roads, arrived at that river before Darius. The Scythians had sent expresses before-hand to persuade the Ionians, whom Darius had left to guard the bridge, to break it down, and retire to their own country. Now they pressed them to it more earnestly, representing to them, that as the time prescribed by Darius was expired, they were at liberty to return home without breaking their word, or being wanting to their duty; for Darius had given them leave to break down the bridge, and withdraw to their own country, if he did not return at a prefixed time, which was already elapsed. Hereupon the Ionians began to consult among themselves whether or no they should comply with the request of the Scythians. Miltiades, prince of the Chersonesus of Thrace, having the publick interest more at heart than his own private advantage, was for embracing so favourable an opportunity of shaking off the Persian yoke; breaking down the bridge, and thereby cutting off Darius's retreat. All the other commanders fell in with him except Hystieus prince of Miletus, who represented to the Ionian chiefs, that their power was linked with that of Darius; since it was under his protection; that each of them was lord in his own city, and that the cities of Ionian would not fail to depose them and recover their liberty, if the Persian power should sink or decline. This speech made a deep impression upon the Ionian generals, and private interest prevailing over the publick good, they determined to wait for Darius, but in order to deceive the Scythians, and prevent them from using any violence, they declared that their design was to retire pursuant to their request; and the better to impose upon the enemy, they began to break down the bridge, encouraging the Scythians to return back, meet Darius and defeat him. They readily complied with the Ionians request, but missed Darius, who arrived safe at the bridge, repassed the Danube, and returned into Thrace. Here he left Megabyzus, one of his chief generals, with part of his army to complete the conquest of that country. With the rest of his troops he repassed the Bosphorus, and took up his quarters at Sardis, where he spent the winter, and the greatest part of the year following to refresh his army, which had suffered extremely in that rash and unsuccessful expedition.

Megabyzus having brought all Thrace under subjection, dispatched seven Persian noblemen, that served under him, to Amyntas king of Macedon, enjoining him to acknowledge Darius for his master by the delivery of earth and water. Amyntas not only complied with their request, but received them into his house, and having prepared a sumptuous feast entertained them with great magnificence. At the end of the entertainment, the Persians being heated with wine, desired Amyntas to bring in his concubines, wives and daughters. Though this was contrary to the custom of the country, the king, fearing to displease them, did as they required. But the Persians not observing a due decency on that occasion, the king's son, by name Alexander, being no longer able to see his mother and sisters treated in such a manner, contrived to send them out of the room as if they were to return immediately, and at the same time had the precaution to get his father out of the company. In the mean time he caused a like number of young men to be dressed like women, and armed with poniards under their garments. These he brought into the room instead of the others, and when the Persians began to use them as they had treated the women, they drew their poniards, fell upon the Persians and killed both the noblemen and their attendants. Great search was made by Megabyzus for these noblemen, but Alexander a having with large presents bribed Babares, who was sent to enquire after them, their death was concealed, and the whole matter stifled *.

THE Scythians to be revenged on Darius for invading their country, having passed the Danube laid waste all that part of Thrace which had submitted to the Persians, as far as the Hellepont, and loaded with booty returned home without meeting with any opposition. Thrace plundered by the Scythians.

Darius having sufficiently refreshed his troops after the Scythian expedition, began to think of extending his dominions eastwards, and in order to facilitate his design resolved in the first place to make a discovery of those countries. With this view he caused a fleet to be built and equipped at Caspapyrus, a city on the river Indus. The command of this fleet he gave to Scylax a Grecian of Caryandia a city of Caria, who was well versed in maritime affairs. His orders were to sail down the current, and make the best discoveries he could of the countries lying on either side of the river till he arrived at the southern ocean; from thence he was to steer his course westward, and that way return back to Persia. Scylax, having exactly observed his instructions, and sailed down the river Indus, entered the Red-sea by the straits of Babelmandel, and on the 30th month from his first setting out landed in Egypt at the same place, from whence Necho king of Egypt formerly sent out the Phœnicians, who were in his service, to sail round the coasts of Africa. From hence Scylax returned to Susa, where he gave Darius a full account of his observations. Darius's conquest of India.

c Darius hereupon entered India at the head of a numerous army; and reducing that large country, made it the 20th province of the Persian empire. Our author gives us no account of this important war; he only says, that Darius received from the provinces he conquered in this expedition an annual tribute of 360 talents of gold, according to the number of the days of the Persian year at that time ^b (S).

Darius after his return to Susa from the Scythian expedition, had appointed his brother Artabernes governor of Sardis, and given Otanes the government of Thrace and the adjacent countries along the sea-coast, in the room of Megabyzus. In the mean time a sedition happening in Naxos the chief island of the Cyclades in the Egean sea, now called the Archipelago, the principal inhabitants being over-powered by the populace were banished the island. In their distress they had recourse to Aristagoras, beseeching him to restore them to their country. Aristagoras at that time resided at Miletus, and governed that city as deputy to Hyftieus (T), to whom he was both nephew and son-in law. When Aristagoras understood their case he resolved to improve the opportunity, and attempt to make himself master of Naxos. With this view he promised to give the exiles all the assistance he could. But not being power- The revolt of the Ionians.

(S) This payment was made according to the standard of the Euboic talent, the same with the Attick and therefore, according to the lowest computation, amounted to one million and ninety-five thousand pound sterling.

(T) Darius on his return to Sardis after his unhappy expedition against the Scythians, being informed that he owed his own safety and that of his whole army to Hyftieus, who had prevailed upon the Ionians not to destroy the bridge on the Danube, sent for that prince and desired him freely to ask what favour he pleased for the eminent service he had done him. Hyftieus desired the king to grant him the Edonian Myrcinus, a territory upon the river Strymon in Thrace, with the liberty of building a city there. His request being granted he returned to Miletus, and having there equipped a fleet he sailed for Thrace, took possession of the territory granted him, and began the intended city. Megabyzus, who was then governor of Thrace for Darius, being apprized how prejudicial that project might prove to the king's affairs, on his return to Sardis represented to Darius, that this new city stood upon a navigable river; that the country round about it afforded abundance of timber for the building of ships; that it was inhabited by several nations both Greeks and Barbarians, which could furnish great numbers of men fit both for the sea and land service; that if once these nations should be governed by such a skilful and enterprising prince as Hyftieus, they might soon become so powerful both by sea and land, that the king of Persia would not be able to keep them in subjection, especially since they might be supplied with gold and silver from the mines, with which that country abounded, to carry on any enterprize. Darius being by these remonstrances made sensible of the mistake he had committed, dispatched a messenger to Hyftieus, enjoining him to repair to Sardis in order to deliver his advice concerning matters of the utmost consequence. Having thus drawn him to Sardis, he took him with him to Susa, pretending that he wanted such an able counsellor, and faithful friend to be always about him, and telling him that he should be able to find him something in Persia, which would make him ample amends both for Myrcinus and Miletus. Hyftieus finding himself under a necessity of complying, attended Darius to Susa, and left Aristagoras governor of Miletus in his absence. To this Aristagoras the banished Naxians applied for relief (21).

ful enough to accomplish his design himself, he communicated the matter to Artaphernes the king's brother, governor of Sardis, representing to him that this was a fair opportunity of reducing Naxos; that if he were once master of that island, all the rest of the Cyclades might be easily brought under subjection; that the isle of Eubœa lying very near the other would be an easy conquest, and from thence the king would have a free passage into Greece. Artaphernes was so well pleased with these proposals, that instead of the hundred ships, which Aristagoras demanded, he promised him two hundred, provided the king approved of the enterprize. And accordingly having obtained the king's consent he sent the next spring to Miletus the number of ships which he had promised, under the command of Megabates a noble Persian of the Achæmenian family. But his commission being to obey the orders of Aristagoras, and the haughty Persian not brooking to be under the command of an Ionian, a dissension arose between the two generals, which was carried so far, that Megabates to be revenged on Aristagoras gave the Naxians secret intelligence of the design that was carrying on against them. Hereupon they made such preparations for their defence, that the Persians after having spent four months in besieging the chief town of the island, and consumed all their provisions, were obliged to retire. The project having thus miscarried, Megabates threw all the blame upon Aristagoras, and his false accusations being more favourably heard than the just defence of the other, Artaphernes condemned him to defray all the charges of the expedition, giving him to understand that they would be exacted with the utmost rigour. As he was not able to pay so large a sum, he foresaw that this must end not only in the loss of his government, but his utter ruin. This desperate situation made him entertain thoughts of revolting from the king, as the only expedient, whereby he could extricate himself from his present difficulties. No sooner had he formed this design, but a messenger arrived from Hystieus who confirmed him in it, (U). Hystieus after several years continuance at the Persian court, being weary of the manners of that nation, and desirous to return to his country, thought this the most likely means to accomplish his desire. For he flattered himself, that if any disturbances should arise in Ionian, he could prevail with Darius to send him thither to appease them, as in effect it happened. Aristagoras finding his own inclinations backed by the orders of Hystieus, imparted his design to the leading men of Ionian, whom he found ready to come into his measures, and therefore being now determined to revolt, applied himself wholly to make all manner of preparations for so great an undertaking¹.

volt.

THE next year Aristagoras to engage the Ionians more resolutely to stand by him, re-instated them in their liberty and all their former privileges. He began with Miletus, where he divested himself of his power, and gave it up into the hands of the people. He then undertook a journey through all Ionian, where by his example and credit he prevailed upon all the other petty princes, or, as the Greeks then called them, tyrants, to do the same. Having thus united them all into one common league, of which he himself was declared the head, he openly revolted from the king, and made great preparations both by sea and land for carrying on a war. To strengthen himself the more against the Persians, in the beginning of the following year he went to Lacedæmon to engage that city in his interest. But not being able to prevail upon Cleomenes (W), who was at that time king of Lacedæmon, to send

(U) Hystieus being desirous to impart his design to Aristagoras, and finding no other means, by reason all the passages leading into Ionian were guarded, shaved the hair of one of his servants in whose fidelity he most confided, and having imprinted the message on his head, kept him at Susa till his hair was grown again. He then dispatched him to Miletus without any other instructions than that upon his arrival he should desire Aristagoras to cut off his hair and look upon his head (22).

(W) Cleomenes having appointed him a time and place for an interview, Aristagoras represented to him, that the Lacedæmonians and Ionians were countrymen; that Sparta being the most powerful city of Greece, it would be much to their honour to concur with him in the design he had formed of restoring the Ionians to their ancient liberty; that the Persians, their common enemy, were not a warlike people, but extremely rich, and consequently would become an easy prey to the Lacedæmonians; that, considering the present spirit and disposition of the Ionians, it would not be difficult for them to carry their victorious arms even to Susa, the metropolis of the Persian empire, and the place of the king's residence. At the same time he shewed him a description of all the nations and cities, through which a send him any succours, he proceeded to Athens, where he met with a much more favourable reception. For he had the good fortune to arrive there at a time, when the Athenians were disposed to close with any measures against the Persians, being highly exasperated against them on the following occasion. Hyppias, the son of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, having been banished about ten years before, and tried in vain several other ways to bring about his restoration, at length applied himself to Artabernes at Sardis; and having insinuated himself into his favour, did all that lay in his power to stir him up against them. The Athenians having intelligence of this, sent ambassadors to Sardis, desiring Artabernes not to give ear to what any of their out-laws should insinuate to their disadvantage. The answer of Artabernes to this embassy was, that if they desired to live in peace, they must recall Hyppias. This haughty message incensed the Athenians to a great degree against the Persians, and Aristagoras arriving there just at this juncture, easily obtained whatever he desired. The Athenians ordered a fleet of twenty ships to be immediately equipped and sent to the assistance of the Ionians. Is joined by the Athenians.

b THE Ionians having at last drawn together all their troops, and being reinforced with the twenty Athenian ships, and five more from Eretria, a city in the island of Eubœa, they set sail for Ephesus, and having left their ships there, they marched by land to the city of Sardis, which they easily made themselves masters of. As most of the houses were built with reeds, an Ionian soldier having accidentally set one of them on fire, and the flame spreading, the whole city was reduced to ashes; but the citadel, whither Artabernes had retired, was preserved. After this accident, the Persians and Lydians drawing together their forces, and other troops coming full march to their assistance, the Ionians, who had not been able to force the citadel, judged it was high time for them to withdraw; and accordingly marched back with all possible expedition in order to reembark at Ephesus. But before they had reached that place they were overtaken by the enemy, and defeated with great slaughter. The Athenians, who escaped, immediately hoisted sail and returned home; nor could they ever afterwards be prevailed upon to concern themselves in this war. However, their having engaged thus far gave rise to that war, which was carried on afterwards for several generations by the two nations, and ended at last in the utter destruction of the Persian empire. For Darius being informed of the burning of Sardis, and hearing that the Athenians had been concerned in that undertaking, determined from that time to make war upon Greece, and that he might never forget his resolution, he commanded one of his officers to cry every day to him with a loud voice while he was at dinner three times, Remember the Athenians. In the burning of Sardis the temple of Cybele, the chief goddess of that country, accidentally taking fire, was entirely consumed. This accident served afterwards as a pretence to the Persians for burning all the temples of Greece. But the true motive which led them to this we shall have occasion to mention hereafter. which they were to pass, engraved on a plate of brass, which he had brought along with him. Cleomenes desired three days time to consider of the matter, which being expired, he asked Aristagoras in how many days one might travel from the coast of Ionis to the city where the king resided. Aristagoras though an artful man, and far superior in all respects to Cleomenes, yet made a slip, as our author observes, in his answer to this demand; for as he designed to draw the Spartans into Asia, he ought to have lessened the distance from the coasts of Ionis to Susa; whereas he told him plainly, 'twas a journey of three months, which Cleomenes no sooner heard than interrupting him from proceeding in his discourse concerning the way, commanded him to depart Sparta before sun-set, for advising the Spartans to take a march into Asia, not to be performed in less than three months after their landing. Cleomenes then withdrew; but Aristagoras, taking an olive-branch in his hand after the manner of suppliants, followed him home to his house, and endeavoured to prevail upon him by arguments of another nature, that is, by presents; but before he made any offer he desired him to bid his daughter Gorge, a child about eight or nine years old, to withdraw; but Cleomenes telling him that he might speak freely without apprehending any thing from so young a child, Aristagoras began with the promise of ten talents in case Cleomenes would comply with his request, and receiving a denial, proceeded gradually in his offers till he came to the sum of fifty talents, and then the girl cried out, Fly, father, fly, else this stranger will corrupt you. Cleomenes was so well pleased with the child's admonition, that he immediately retired to another apartment, and ordered Aristagoras that instant to depart his dominions (23).

The Ionians succeed against the Persians.

THE Ionians though deserted by the Athenians, and considerably weakened by their late overthrow, did not lose courage, but pursued their point with great resolution. Their fleet sailed to the Hellepont, and the Propontis, where they reduced the city of Byzantium, and most of the other Greek cities on those coasts. As they were sailing back they made a descent in Caria, and obliged the inhabitants to join them in this war. The people of Cyprus likewise entered into the same confederacy, and openly revolted from the Persians. The Persian generals in those quarters, finding that the revolt began to be universal, drew together what troops they had in Cilicia and the neighbouring provinces, and at the same time enjoined the Phœnicians to assist them with their whole naval power. The Ionians as they were sailing to Cyprus fell in with the Phœnician fleet, attacked and dispersed them. But at the same time the Persian troops, that were landed in Cyprus, having gained a compleat victory over the rebels, and killed in the engagement Aristagoras himself, the leading man and first author of their revolt, the Ionians reaped no advantage from their victory by sea; for the whole island of Cyprus was again brought under subjection¹.

Aristagoras

AFTER the reduction of Cyprus, Daurises, Hymeas, and Otanes, three Persian generals, and all sons-in-law to Darius, having divided their forces into three bodies, marched three different ways against the revolters. Daurises held his course to the Hellepont, and from thence, after possessing himself of the revolted cities, marched against the Carians, whom he overthrew in two successive battles; but in a third being drawn into an ambuscade, he was slain with several other Persians of distinction, and his whole army cut in pieces. Hymeas after having taken the city of Cius in Myfia, reduced all the Ilian coast, but falling sick at Troas, soon after died. Artaphernes and Otanes with the rest of the Persian generals, finding that Miletus was the center of the Ionian confederacy, resolved to march thither with all their forces, concluding, that, if they could carry that city, all the others would submit of their own accord. Pursuant to this resolution they entered Ionis, and Æolia, where their main strength lay, and took the city of Cleomena in Ionis, and Cyma in Æolia; which was such a blow to the whole confederacy, that the supposed son of the Ionian leader, Aristagoras, not finding himself in a condition after that loss to make head against the enemy, resolved to abandon Miletus, and consult his own safety by retiring to some more distant place. Accordingly he embarked with such as were willing to follow him, and set sail for the river Strymon in Thrace, where he seized on the territory of Myrcinus, which had been formerly given by Darius to Hystiaus. But as he was besieging a place situated beyond those limits, he was killed by the Thracians, and all his army cut in pieces. On his departure from Miletus, he left the government in the hands of Pythagoras an eminent citizen, who being informed, that Artaphernes and Otanes designed to bend all their force against Miletus, summoned a general assembly of the Ionians. In this meeting it was agreed, that they should not attempt to bring an army into the field, but only to fortify and store their city with all manner of provisions for a siege, and to draw all their forces together to engage the Persians at sea; thinking themselves, by reason of their skill in maritime affairs, most likely to have the advantage in a naval engagement. The place appointed for their general rendezvous, was Lada, a small island over-against Miletus, where accordingly they met with a fleet of 353 sail. At the sight of this fleet the Persians, though double their number, avoided engaging, till by their emissaries they had secretly corrupted the greatest part of the confederates, and engaged them to desert the common cause. When they came to an engagement, the Samiens, Lesbians and several others hoisting sail, returned to their respective countries. As the remaining fleet of the confederates did not consist of above 100 ships, they were quickly overpowered by the Persians, and almost entirely destroyed. The city of Miletus was immediately besieged both by sea and land, and soon taken by the conquerors, who razed it to the ground the sixth year after the revolt of Aristagoras. All the other towns that had revolted returned, either by force or of their own accord, to their duty. Those that stood out were treated as they had been threatened before-hand. The handsomest of their youths were made eunuchs, and their young women sent into Persia; their cities and temples were reduced to ashes. Such were the calamities the Indians drew upon themselves by seconding the ambitious views of two enterprising men Aristagoras and Hystiaus.

a THE latter had his share in the general calamity; for being taken by the Persians and carried to Sardis, he was immediately crucified by order of Artaphernes, who hastened his execution without consulting Darius, lest his affection for him should incline him to pardon one, who, if he were again let loose, would not fail to create new disturbances. It afterwards appeared that Artaphernes's conjecture was well grounded; for when Hyistius's head was brought to Darius, he expressed great displeasure against the authors of his death, and caused his head to be honourably interred, as the remains of a person, to whom he professed infinite obligations. He was the most bold, restless and enterprizing genius of his age; with him all means were good and lawful, that served to promote the end he had in view, acknowledging no other rule of his actions than his own interest and ambition, to which he readily sacrificed the good of his country, and the lives of his nearest relations. But we shall have occasion to bring him again upon the scene in the history of Ionia and the Greek colonies in Asia.

b THE Phanician fleet having reduced all the islands on the coasts of Asia, Darius recalled all his other generals, and appointed Mardonius the son of Gobrias, a young Persian nobleman, who had lately married one of his daughters, to be commander in chief of all the forces quartered on the coasts of Asia, ordering him to invade Greece, and revenge on the Athenians and Eretrians the burning of Sardis. Mardonius having rendezvoused his forces at the Hellepont, marched, pursuant to his orders, through Thrace into Macedonia, ordering his fleet first to reduce Thasus, and then to coast along the shore as he marched by land, that they might be at hand to act in concert with each other. On his arrival in Macedonia all the country terrified at such a mighty army submitted. But the fleet in doubling the cape of mount Aibos in order to gain the coasts of Macedonia was intirely dispersed by a violent storm, which destroyed upwards of 300 ships and 20,000 men. His land-army met at the same time with a misfortune no less fatal; for being encamped in a place not sufficiently secured and fortified, the Bryges, a people of Thrace, attacking him in the night broke into the camp, slew a great number of his men, and wounded Mardonius himself, who, being disabled by these losses to prosecute his design either by sea or land, marched back into Asia without reaping any advantage for his master, or glory for himself in this expedition.

c Darius hearing of the ill success of Mardonius, and ascribing it to his want of experience, thought fit to recall him, and appoint two other generals in his room, Datis a Mede, and Artaphernes his own nephew, being the son of Artaphernes the king's brother, and late governor of Sardis. But before he would make any further attempts upon Greece he judged it expedient first to sound the Greeks, and try how those different states stood affected to, or were averse from, the Persian government. With this view he sent heralds to all their cities to demand earth and water in token of submission. On the arrival of these heralds many of the Greek cities, dreading the power of the Persians, complied with their demands; as did also the inhabitants of Ægina, a small island over-against, and not far from Athens. But at Athens and Sparta they did not meet with so favourable a reception, being in one place thrown into a deep ditch, and in the other into a well, and bid fetch earth and water from thence. This they did in the heat of their passion, but when they came to a cooler temper they were ashamed of what they had done, looking upon it as a violation of the law of nations, and accordingly sent ambassadors to the king of Persia at Susa to offer him what satisfaction he pleased for the affront they had put upon his heralds. But Darius declaring himself fully satisfied with that embassy, sent the ambassadors back to their respective countries, though those of Sparta voluntarily offered themselves as victims to expiate the crime which their countrymen had been guilty of.

d Darius being entirely bent upon the reduction of Greece hastened the departure of his generals Datis and Artaphernes. Their instructions were to plunder the cities of Eretria and Athens, to burn down to the ground all their houses and temples, to make all the inhabitants of both places slaves and send them to Darius; for which purpose they went provided with a great number of chains and fetters. The two generals, having appointed their fleet to meet at Samus, set sail from thence with 600 ships and 500,000 men, steering their course to Naxos, which island they easily made themselves masters of, and having burnt the chief city and all temples both of this and the other islands in those seas, they stood directly for Eretria, a town in Eubœa, which they took after a siege of seven days by the treachery of Euphorbus and Philagrus, two chief citizens. Having taken Eretria, pillaged the city, set fire to the temples in revenge for those that had been burnt at Sardis, and enslaved the inhabitants pursuant to their orders, they sailed to Attica. Hyppias the son of Pisistratus, who as we have said above, had fled to the Persians conducted them after they had landed, to the plains of Marathon. Hence they sent heralds to Athens, acquainting the citizens with the fate of Eretria, in hopes that this news would frighten them into an immediate surrender. The Athenians had sent to Lacedæmon to desire succours against the common enemy, which the Lacedæmonians granted, but they could not set out till some days after by reason of an ancient and superstitious custom, which obtained at Sparta, and did not allow them to begin a march before the full moon. Not one of their other allies offered to assist them, such a terror had the Persian army struck into the cities of Greece. The inhabitants of Platœa alone furnished them with a thousand men. In this extremity the Athenians were obliged to arm their slaves, which was contrary to their practice on all other occasions.

Miltiades's

THE Persian army commanded by Datis consisted of 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horse, that of the Athenians amounted in the whole but to 10,000 men. It was commanded by ten generals, one of which was Miltiades, whom we shall have occasion to mention often in the history of Greece. These ten generals were to have the command of the army, each for one day in his turn. When the army was assembled a dispute arose among them, whether they should venture an engagement in the field, or only fortify and defend the city. They were all for the latter opinion, except Miltiades, who declared that the only way to raise the courage of their own troops, and strike a terror into the enemy, was to advance boldly and attack them with intrepidity. Aristides convinced by the speech of Miltiades embraced his opinion, and brought over to it some of the other commanders. Callimachus likewise, who had been very sanguine at first against such a rash enterprize, fell in at last with Miltiades, and a resolution was taken to engage the enemy in the open field. All the commanders, who were for venturing a battle, when their turn came to command the army, yielded that honour to Miltiades, all sentiments of jealousy giving way to the publick good; but though he accepted the power, yet he would not hazard an engagement before his own day. As soon as that came he endeavoured by the advantage of the ground to make up what he wanted in strength and number. He drew up his army at the foot of a mountain, that the enemy might not surround them, or fall upon his rear. He covered his flank with large trees, which he caused to be cut down for that purpose, and to render the Persian cavalry useless. The Athenian forces were so drawn up that they were equal in front to the Persians; but because they had not a sufficient number of men in the center, that part was extremely weak, the main strength of the army consisting in the wings. All things being thus disposed, and the sacrifice, according to the custom of the Greeks, performed, Miltiades without waiting the motions of the Persians, commanded the signal for the battle to be given, when the Athenians fell upon the enemy with such courage and resolution as can hardly be expressed. The Persians seeing the Athenians advance, imputed their resolution to folly and despair, being not only few in number, but entirely destitute of horse, and without stirring prepared themselves to receive them. After a long and obstinate fight, the Persians and Sacæ broke the center of the Athenians, having made their greatest efforts against that part. The center was commanded by Aristides, and Themistocles, who with great intrepidity made head against the whole Persian army till being bore down by their numbers and quite overpowered, they were obliged to give ground. But the Athenians and Platœans, who were in the two wings, having defeated the wings of the enemy, came up to the relief of their center, just as they were betaking themselves to a precipitous flight, after having maintained a running fight for some hours. At their arrival the scale was quickly turned, for attacking the enemy in flank they soon put them in disorder, and obliged them with great slaughter to fly to their fleet, whither they pursued them, took seven of their ships, and burnt a great many more. In this action several Athenians of great distinction were slain, and amongst others Callimachus and Stasileus, two of the chief commanders with only 200 private men, whereas the Persians left even according to Herodotus, who makes it much less than any other author, above 6000 dead in the field of battle, and besides a great many were killed in the flight, burnt in

- a their ships, and drowned in the sea, as they attempted to save themselves on board their vessels (X). Hippias was killed in the battle; that ungrateful citizen, who in order to recover the unjust dominion usurped by his father Pisistratus, had put himself at the head of those who were come with a design to reduce to ashes that city to which he owed his birth¹. Immediately after the battle an Athenian soldier, stained all over with blood, hastened to Athens to acquaint his fellow-citizens with the good success of their army at Marathon. When he arrived at the publick palace where the magistrates were assembled, he was so spent, that having uttered these words, Rejoice, rejoice, the victory is ours, he fell down dead at their feet². The Persians were so sure of the victory, that they had brought marble along with them to Marathon in order to erect a trophy there. This marble the Athenians seized, and caused it to be formed of it by the famous Pheidias in honour of the goddess Nemesis, whose province it was to punish unjust actions³.

AFTER this defeat the Persian fleet, instead of sailing by the islands in order to return to Asia, doubled the cape of Sunium with a design to surprize Athens before the return of the army. But the Athenian troops being apprised of their design, decamped from the plains of Marathon, and marched with such expedition that they arrived at Athens before the enemy's fleet, and by that means disappointed their measures⁴.

- c Datis and Artabernes arriving in Asia, that they might seem to have reaped some advantage from this expedition, sent the Eretrian captives to Susa. Darius had expressed great indignation against the Eretrians before the reduction of their city, and charged them with the guilt of beginning the war; but finding they were now his prisoners and entirely in his power, he could not find in his heart to do them any harm, but gave them a village in the country of Cissia to inhabit, which was but a day's journey distant from *Susa*⁵. Here *Apollonius Tyaneus*⁶ found their descendants a great many ages after.

- d As soon as the day of the full moon was over, the Lacedæmonians began their march with two thousand men, and arrived in three days on the confines of Attica, having marched in so short a time 1200 *Stades*⁷; such was their eagerness to be present at the battle: but a silly and ridiculous superstition prevented their having a share in the most glorious action recorded in history; for the battle was fought the day before they arrived. However, they proceeded to Marathon, where they found the fields covered with dead bodies, and having congratulated the Athenians on the happy success of the battle, they returned home⁸.

- Darius* upon the news of the unsuccessful return of his army was so far from being discouraged by such a disaster, that he added the defeat at Marathon to the burning of Sardis, as a new motive spurring him on to pursue the war with more vigour. He therefore resolved to head the army in person, and issued orders to all his subjects in the several provinces of the empire to attend him in this expedition. But after he had spent three years in making the necessary preparations, a

(X) Justin tells us (24) that the Persians lost on this occasion what by the sword, what by shipwreck 200,000 men; on the other hand, Herodotus, who flourished very near those times, makes the loss of the Persians, if no error has crept into his copy, to have amounted only to 6300, which bears no proportion to the vastness of their army, and 192 Athenians. The whole Persian army, according to Valerius Maximus (25), consisted of 300,000 men. Plutarch seems to insinuate the same (26). Justin (27) and Orosius say that they were in all 600,000 men. Emilius Probus (28) tells us that they were 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse. Of the Athenians there were 10,000, and 1000 Platæans, say Justin and Orosius; but Probus assures us that the Athenians with their auxiliaries were in all but 1000. This ever-memorable victory was gained, if we believe

Plutarch (29) upon the 6th day of Budromion, the third month in the Attic calendar, after the summer solstice, Phanippus being at that time prætor at Athens; that is, in the third year of the 72d olympiad, four years before the death of Darius, as we read in Severus Sulpitius (30), and ten years before Xerxes passed over into Greece, as Thucydides informs us (31). Most authors tell us, that Hippias was slain in this battle; but Suidas says that he escaped and died afterwards in the island of Lemnos. Themistocles, who became afterwards so famous, on this occasion first entered the school of war. We cannot omit in this place the glorious behaviour of one Cragyrus an Athenian soldier, who having first his right and then his left hand cut off while he was endeavouring to prevent one of the enemies ships from putting off, took hold of it at last with his teeth.

a new war broke out, occasioned by the revolt of Egypt. This gave him no small uneasiness; however as he was wholly bent on his expedition against Greece, he resolved not to lay that aside, but at the same time to send part of his forces to reduce Egypt, and with the rest to march in person against his old enemies the Greeks (Y). But when he had prepared all things for these two expeditions, a great contest arose between his sons concerning the succession. For according to an ancient custom among the Persians the king was obliged, before he set out on any expedition, to name his successor; a custom wisely established to prevent the many inconveniencies that attend an unsettled succession. Darius thought himself the more obliged to comply with this custom as he was already advanced in years, and two of his sons seemed to have a just claim to the crown upon his demise. Darius had three sons by the daughter of Gobryas, his first wife, all born before he came to the crown, and four more by Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, all born after his accession to the throne. Of the first Artabazanes was the eldest, of the latter Xerxes; and these two were competitors for the succession. Artabazanes, or, as Justin calls him, Artamenes, urged that he was the eldest son, and therefore, according to the custom of all nations, ought to be preferred in the succession to the younger. On the other hand Xerxes alledged, that he was the son of Atossa daughter of Cyrus, who had founded the Persian monarchy, and claimed the kingdom in the right of his mother; it being more agreeable to justice, said he, that the crown of Cyrus should devolve upon one, who was a descendant of Cyrus, than upon one that was not. Darius had not yet declared in favour of either, when Damaratus, king of Sparta, being driven out by his subjects, arrived at Susa, and hearing of this dispute, secretly suggested to Xerxes another argument to support his pretensions; namely, that he was born after his father was invested with the royal dignity, whereas Artabazanes was only the son of Darius a private man; to him therefore the crown belonged as the king's eldest son, and not to Artabazanes the eldest son of Darius. He further supported his argument by the example of the Lacedæmonians, who excluded from the crown the children that were born before their fathers accession, if they had any to succeed born after their advancement to the throne. These reasons appeared so just to Darius, that he declared Xerxes heir apparent to the crown. Our author is of opinion that Xerxes was named to the succession not so much by the strength of this plea, as by the influence his mother Atossa had over the inclinations of Darius, who in this matter was entirely governed by her authority * (Z).

THE succession being thus settled, and all things ready both for the Egyptian and Grecian expedition, Darius died in the second year of the revolt of Egypt, after having reigned 36 years. This prince was endowed with many excellent qualities; his wisdom, clemency and justice are greatly commended by the ancients. He had the honour to have his name recorded in holy writ *, as a favourer of God's peo-

(Y) Diodorus Siculus (32) seems to insinuate that Darius marched into Egypt to reduce the rebels, and that he succeeded in the enterprize. That historian relates, that upon Darius's desiring to have his statue placed before that of Sesostrius, the chief priest of the Egyptians told him, that he had not equalled the glory of that conqueror, and that the king, no ways offended at the Egyptian priest's freedom, reply'd, that he would endeavour to surpass it. He adds further, that Darius had several conferences with the Egyptian priests upon matters of religion and government, and that having learnt of them with what gentleness their ancient kings used to treat their subjects, he endeavoured, after his return into Persia, to form himself upon their model. But Herodotus, more worthy of belief in this particular than Diodorus, only observes, that Darius resolved to make war at the same time upon Egypt and Greece; and to invade Greece in person, while part of his troops were employed in the reduction of Egypt.

(Z) Justin and Plutarch (33) place this dispute

after the decease of Darius, and both take notice of the prudent conduct of the two brothers on so nice an occasion. Artabazanes, according to them, was absent when the king died, and Xerxes immediately took all the ensigns of royalty, exercising all the functions of the regal dignity. But upon his brother's returning home he quitted the diadem and tiara, went out to meet him, and shewed him all imaginable civility. They agreed to make their uncle Artabanes the arbitrator of their difference, and to acquiesce, without any further appeal, to his decision. During the whole time this dispute lasted, all the demonstrations of an entire and fraternal affection passed between the two competitors. And when it was decided, as the one did not insult, so the other did not repine or express any dissatisfaction at the sentence, but immediately prostrating himself before him, acknowledged him for his master, and placed him upon the throne with his own hand. He continued all his life firmly attached to his interest, and at last died in his service in the battle of Salamis.

a ple, a restorer of the temple, and a promoter of the true worship at Jerusalem (A). His kindness towards the Israelites was rewarded with a numerous issue, a long reign, and great prosperity. For though the Scythian and Greek expeditions proved unsuccessful, yet he was very fortunate in all his other undertakings, having not only restored and entirely settled the empire of Cyrus, which had been very much shaken by the unpolitic government of Cambyfes and usurpation of Smerdis, but also added many great and rich provinces to that prince's conquests, namely India, Thrace, Macedonia, and the isles of the Ionian sea.

Xerxes succeeding his father employed the first year of his reign in carrying on the preparations for the reduction of Egypt, which his father had begun. He confirmed, upon his first accession to the crown, all the privileges granted by his father to the Jews, and particularly that, which assigned them the tribute of Samaria for furnishing them victims to be offered in the temple ^b.

In the second year of his reign he marched against the Egyptians, and having reduced the rebels, and brought the country to a worse condition of slavery than what they had felt under his predecessors, he appointed his brother Achamenes governor of that province, and returned to Susa. Puffed up with this success against the Egyptians he determined to invade Greece. But before he engaged in an enterprise of that importance, he thought fit to assemble his council, and take the advice of the most illustrious persons of his court. When they were assembled, he laid before them the design he had of invading Greece, and acquainted them with the motives that prompted him to that expedition (B). Mardonius, the same person who had been unsuccessful in the reign of Darius, hoping that the command of the army would be bestowed upon him, not only approved of the king's determination, but extolled him above all the kings that had preceded him, and endeavoured to set forth the indispensable necessity they all lay under of revenging the dishonour done to the Persian name at Sardis and Marathon. The rest of the council, perceiving that the flattering discourse of Mardonius pleased the king, durst not venture to contradict it, but all kept silence for some time. At last Artabanes, the king's uncle, a prince venerable both for his age and prudence, addressing Xerxes, used all his endeavours to divert him from his present resolution, and at the same time reproached Mardonius with want of sincerity, and shewed how much he was to blame for desiring rashly to engage the nation in a war, which nothing but his own ambitious and self-interested views could tempt him to advise. He concluded with these words:

d “ If a war be resolved upon, let the king remain in Persia, and our children be deposited in his hands. Then go on with your expedition, attended by the best forces you can chuse, and in what numbers you think fit. If the issue be favourable, I am willing to forfeit my own life, and the lives of my children. But on the contrary, if the event be such as I have foretold, then let your children suffer death, and you also, if ever you return.” Artabanes expressed his senti-

(A) The Jews (34) have a tradition, that the prophets Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, died in the last year of Darius, and that on their death the spirit of prophecy ceased among the Jews, which was the sealing up of vision and prophecy spoke of by Daniel (35). And misled by the same tradition, they tell us that the kingdom of Persia ended the same year; for they confound this Darius with the other, who was conquered by Alexander, and will have the Persian empire to have lasted only 52 years, which they reckon thus: Darius the Mede reigned one year, Cyrus three, Cambyses, according to them the Achæmenes who married Esther, 32 years. This last Darius they take to be the same with Artaxerxes, who sent Ezra and Nehemiah to Jerusalem, to restore the Jews to their ancient state. For they tell us, that Artaxerxes was a name common to the Persian kings, as that of Pharaoh was to those of Egypt. This shews how little they were acquainted with the Persian history; and their countryman

Josephus seems to have been as much in the dark, with respect to Persia, as they were.

(B) These were, the desire of following the footsteps of his predecessors, who had distinguished their names and reigns by noble enterprises; the obligation he was under to be revenged on the Athenians, who without any provocation had fallen upon Sardis, and burnt down the sacred groves and temples; the eager desire he had to wipe off the dishonour his country had received at Marathon; and lastly the prospect of many great advantages that would accrue to him from this war, which would be attended by the conquest of Europe, the most rich and fertile country in the universe. He added, that this war had been resolved on by his father Darius, and that he meant only to execute his designs. He concluded his speech with promising ample rewards to such as should distinguish themselves in this expedition, and desiring them to deliver their opinions in this matter with freedom (36).

ments in very respectful and inoffensive terms; but nevertheless Xerxes was extremely offended, and replied with indignation, that if Artabanus were not his uncle he should suffer that moment the due punishment for such an audacious behaviour, and commanded him to stay at home among the women, whom he too much resembled, while he marched at the head of his troops where his duty and glory called him. However when the first emotion of his anger was past, he owned that he had been to blame for treating his uncle with such harsh language, and was not ashamed to repair his fault by openly confessing that the heat of his youth and want of experience had made him trespass against the regard that was due to a prince so worthy of respect as Artabanus^a. At the same time he declared that he was ready to follow his advice, and lay aside the design of invading Greece, notwithstanding a phantom had appeared to him the night before in his sleep, and warmly exhorted him to undertake the war. All the Persians, who composed the council, were overjoyed to hear the king speak in that manner, and prostrating themselves before him, strove to outdo each other in extolling the prudence of his conduct. But he did not long continue in that mind; nay Artabanus himself, the only man who had openly disapproved the expedition, whether frightened by a dream (C), or dreading the king's displeasure, became a most sanguine and zealous promoter of the war^d.

with Xerxes.

Xerxes being now resolved to attack Greece, that he might omit nothing which could contribute to the success of his undertaking, entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians, who were at that time the most powerful people of the west, whereby it was agreed that while the Persians invaded Greece, the Carthaginians should fall upon the Greek colonies in Sicily and Italy, that thereby they might be diverted from helping each other. The Carthaginians appointed Hamilcar their general, who not only raised what forces he could in Africk, but with the money sent him by Xerxes hired a great many mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, and Italy; so that his army consisted of 300,000 men, besides a proportionable number of ships for transporting his forces, and the necessary provisions^c. And thus Xerxes, agreeable to the prophecy of Daniel^f, having by his strength through his riches stirred up all the nations of the then known world against the realm of Greece; that is, all the west under the command of Hamilcar, and all the east under his own banners, set out from Susa to enter upon this war in the fifth year of his reign, after having spent three years in making vast preparations throughout all the provinces of his wide-spreading empire. From Susa he marched to Sardis, which was the place appointed for the general rendezvous of all his land-forces, while his navy advanced along the coasts of Asia Minor towards the Hellepont.

Two things Xerxes commanded to be done before he came to the sea-side; the one was a passage to be cut through mount Athos. This mountain reaches a great way into the sea in the form of a peninsula, and is joined to the land by an isthmus twelve furlongs over. The sea in this place is very tempestuous, and the

(C) Herodotus tells us, that Xerxes reflecting in the night-time on the opinion of Artabanus, was very much perplexed, and concluded at last, that a war with Greece could not turn to his advantage. Having thus altered his resolution he fell asleep, and saw in a dream a man of an uncommon stature and beauty standing by him, and uttering these words: Have you then changed your design of leading an army into Greece, after having ordered the Persians to assemble their forces? You have not done well to alter your resolution, nor will you find any man of your opinion. Resume therefore without delay the enterprize you determined to undertake. The Phantom, having pronounced these words, disappeared; and the next morning Xerxes, neglecting his dream, summoned the council, and acquainted them, that he had altered his mind with regard to the Grecian expedition, and wished them joy of the advantages of peace which they were to reap at home. But the night following the same Phantom appeared again to Xerxes, telling him that if he did not undertake without delay a war against Greece, he should become little and contemptible in as short a time as he had been raised to greatness and power. The king terrified with this second dream sent for Artabanus, acquainted him with what had happened, and entreated him to put on the royal robes, to sit on the throne, and pass the night in his bed. Artabanus at first begged to be excused as not deserving the honour of sitting in the king's throne; but being pressed by Xerxes, who was persuaded that if the dream was from the gods Artabanus would see the same vision, he at last complied with his desire, and clothed himself with the royal robes. As he slept in the king's bed the same Phantom appeared to him threatening him with the greatest calamities if he continued to oppose the king's intentions. This so terrified Artabanus, that he came over to the king's first opinion, believing that there was something divine in these repeated visions, and the war against Greece was resolved on (37).

a Persian fleet had formerly suffered shipwreck in doubling this promontory. To prevent the like disaster, Xerxes caused a passage to be cut through the mountain broad enough to let two galleys, with three banks of oars each, pass in front. By this means he sever'd from the continent the cities of Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleone. Our author observes, that Xerxes undertook this enterprize only out of ostentation, and to perpetuate the memory of his name, since he might, with far less trouble, have caused his fleet to be conveyed over the Isthmus, as was the practice in those days * (D).

He likewise commanded a bridge of boats to be laid over the Helleſpont for the passing of his forces from Asia into Europe. The sea, which separates Sestos and Abydus, where the bridge was built, is seven furlongs over. The work was carried on with great expedition by the Phœnicians and Egyptians, who had no sooner finished it, but a violent storm arising, broke it in pieces, and dispersed or dashed against the shore the vessels of which it was composed. Which when Xerxes heard, he fell into such a violent transport of anger, that he commanded 300 stripes to be inflicted on the sea, and a pair of fetters to be thrown into it, enjoining those, who were trusted with the execution of his orders, to pronounce these words: Thou salt and bitter element, thy master has condemned thee to this punishment for offending him without cause, and is resolved to pass over thee in spite of thy billows and insolent resistance. The extravagant folly and madness of this prince did not stop here; he commanded the heads of those, who had the direction of the work, to be struck off †.

In their room he appointed more experienced architects to build two other bridges, one for the army, the other for the beasts of burden, and the baggage. When the whole work was compleated, and the vessels, which formed the bridges, secure against the violence of the winds, and the current of the water, Xerxes departed from Sardis, where the army had wintered, and directed his march to Abydus. When he arrived at that city, he desired to see all his forces together, and to that end ascending a stately edifice of white stone, which the Abydenians had built on purpose to receive him in a manner suitable to his greatness, he had a free prospect to the coast, seeing at one view both his fleet and land forces. The sea was covered with his ships, and the large plains of Abydus with his troops quite down to the shore. While he was thus surveying with his own eyes, the vast extent of his power, and dreaming himself the most happy of mortals, his joy being all on a sudden turned into grief, he burst out into a flood of tears, which Artabanus perceiving, asked him, what had made him in a few moments pass from an excess of joy, to so great a grief? The king replied, that considering the shortness of human life, he could not restrain his tears; for of all these numbers of men

(D) This prince believing that the very elements were under his command, wrote to mount Athos in the following terms; Athos, thou proud and aspiring mountain, that liftest up thy head to the very skies, I advise thee not to be so audacious as to put rocks and stones, that cannot be cut, in the way of my workmen. If thou makest that opposition, I will cut thee entirely down, and throw thee headlong into the sea (38). Our modern travellers tell us, that they can perceive no traces of this great work, and most of them are of Juvénal's opinion expressed in these words; Perforatus Athos? quicquid Græcia mendax audit in historia. The directors of this enterprize were Bubaris, the son of Megabyzus, and Artabæus the son of Arbæus, both Persians. It was carried on in the following manner: All the forces on board the fleet were employed in the undertaking; they first drew a line before the city of Sanae, situated at the foot of mount Athos towards the land, and then divided the ground among themselves, each nation having their portion allotted them. When the trench was considerably sunk, those who were at the bottom, continued to dig, delivering the earth to their companions standing on ladders, who handed it to such as stood higher, till it was conveyed to those that waited to receive it at the edge of the canal, and by them carried to another place. Our author observes (39) that by digging perpendicularly, and making the bottom of equal breadth with the top, all the workmen, except the Phœnicians, had double the labour, by reason the earth fell down continually in great quantities from the upper parts. But the Phœnicians opened the ground, which was assigned to them, twice as large as others had done, and sloped the ground gradually, till they came to the bottom. In a large meadow adjoining to this place, there was a court of justice, and a market furnished with corn and other necessaries brought from Asia. This work does not seem to us so very surprising and incredible, as some would make it, when we consider the number of hands, and the time that were employed in perfecting it. For Herodotus tells us, that three whole years were spent in the undertaking, and an incredible number of workmen obliged to labour day and night in their turns. Besides the canal was not cut through, as Juvénal seems to insinuate, but behind mount Athos, where the Isthmus was but a mile and a half over, and broad enough only to let two galleys pass in front.

Artabanus's

not one, said he, will be alive a hundred years hence. Artabanus, who neglected a no opportunity of instilling into the young prince's mind sentiments of kindness towards his people, finding him touched with a sense of tenderness and humanity, endeavoured to make him sensible of the obligation that is incumbent upon princes to alleviate the sorrows and sweeten the bitterness, which the lives of their subjects are liable to, since it is not in their power to prolong them. In the same conversation Xerxes asked his uncle, whether, if he had not seen the vision which made him change his mind, he would still persist in the same opinion, and dissuade him from making war upon Greece. Artabanus sincerely owned, that he still had his fears, and was very uneasy concerning two things, the sea and the land; the sea, because there were no ports capable of receiving and sheltering such a fleet, if a storm should arise; the land, because no country could maintain so numerous an army. The king was very sensible of the strength of his reasoning, but as it was now too late to go back, he made answer, that in great enterprizes men ought not to enter into so nice a discussion of all the inconveniences that may attend them; that bold and daring undertakings, though subject to many evils and dangers, are preferable to inaction however safe; that great successes are no otherwise to be obtained than by venturing boldly; and that if his predecessors had observed such scrupulous and timorous rules of politicks, the Persian empire would never have attained to so high a degree of glory and grandeur^a.

the Hellespont.

ALL things being now in readiness, and a day appointed for the passing over of the army, as soon as the first rays of the sun began to appear, all sorts of perfumes were burnt upon the bridge, and the way strewed with myrtle. At the same time Xerxes pouring a libation into the sea out of a golden cup, and addressing the sun, implored the assistance of that deity, begging that he might meet with no impediment so great as to hinder him from carrying his conquering arms to the utmost limits of Europe. This done, he threw the cup into the Hellepont, with a golden bowl and a Persian scimiter, and the foot and horse began to pass over that bridge, which was next to the Euxine, while the carriages and beasts of burden passed over the other, which was placed nearer the Ægean sea. The bridges were boarded and covered over with earth, having rails on each side, that the horses and cattle might not be frightened at the sight of the sea. The army spent seven days and seven nights in passing over, though they marched day and night without intermission, and were by frequent blows obliged to quicken their pace. At the same time the fleet made to the coasts of Europe. After the whole army was passed, Xerxes advanced with his land-forces through the Thracian Chersonesus to Doriscus, a city at the mouth of the river Hebrus in Thrace; but the fleet steered a quite different course, standing to the westward for the promontory of Sarpedon, where they were commanded to attend farther orders. Xerxes having encamped in the large plains of Doriscus, and judging them convenient for reviewing and numbering his troops, dispatched orders to his admirals to bring the fleet to the adjacent shore, that he might take an account both of his sea and land-forces. His land-army upon the muster was found to consist of one million and seven hundred thousand foot, and fourscore thousand horse, which together with twenty thousand men, that conducted the camels, and took care of the baggage, amounted to one million eight hundred thousand men. His fleet consisted of twelve hundred and seven large ships, and three thousand gallies and transports; on board all these vessels there were found to be five hundred seventeen thousand six hundred and ten men. So that the whole number of sea and land-forces, which Xerxes led out of Asia to invade Greece, amounted to two millions three hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and ten men. Our author tells us, that on his passing the Hellepont to enter Europe, an inhabitant of that country cried out; O Jupiter, why art thou come to destroy Greece, in the shape of a Persian, and under the name of Xerxes with all mankind following thee; whereas thy own power is sufficient to do this without their assistance? After he had entered Europe, the nations on this side the Hellepont, that submitted to him, added to his land-forces three hundred thousand more, and two hundred and twenty ships to his fleet, on board of which were twenty-four thousand men. So that the whole number of his forces, when he arrived at Thermopylae, was two millions, six hundred and forty-one thousand, six hundred and ten men, without including servants, eunuchs, women, sutlers, and other people of that sort, who were computed to

- a equal the number of the forces; so that the whole multitude of persons, that followed Xerxes in this expedition, amounted to five millions, two hundred, eighty-three thousand two hundred and twenty^e (E). Among these millions of men, there was not one that could vie with Xerxes either in comeliness or stature, or that seemed more worthy of that great empire. But this is a poor commendation, when it is not accompanied with other qualifications. Accordingly Justin, after he has mentioned the number of his troops, emphatically concludes, but this vast body wanted a head. Besides the subordinate generals of each nation, who commanded the troops of their respective countries, the whole army was under the command of six Persian generals, viz. Mardonius the son of Gobryas, His generals.
 b Triatacbmes the son of Ariabanus, Smerdones the son of Otanes (the two latter were cousins to Xerxes) Masistes the son of Darius by Atossa, Gergys the son of Ariarxus, and Megabyzus the son of the celebrated Zopyrus. The ten thousand Persians, who were called the immortal band, obeyed no other commander but Hydarnes. The fleet was commanded by four Persian admirals, and likewise the cavalry had their particular generals and commanders.

Xerxes, having thus numbered his sea and land forces at Doris, marched from thence through Thrace, Macedon, and Thessaly towards Attica, ordering his fleet to follow him along the coast, and to regulate their motions according to the motions of the army. Where-ever he came, he found provisions prepared before-hand pursuant to the orders he had sent, and each city was obliged to entertain him, which cost immense sums, and gave occasion to the saying of a citizen of Abdera, after the king's departure, that his countrymen might thank the gods for Xerxes moderation in being satisfied with one meal a day^e.

In the mean time Lacedæmon and Athens, the two most powerful cities of Greece, against which Xerxes was most exasperated, having had intelligence of the enemies preparations and motions, sent ambassadors to Argos, into Sicily, to the islands of Corcyra and Crete, to desire succours, and conclude a league against the common enemy. The people of Argos offered a very considerable number of troops on condition they should have an equal share with the Lacedæmonians in the command. Athenians and Spartans prepare against him.

- d The latter consented, that the king of Argos should have the same authority as either of the kings of Sparta; but this offer did not satisfy the Argians, who thereupon ordered the ambassadors to depart the territories of Argos before sun-set. From Argos they proceeded to Sicily, where Gelo, the most powerful prince in all the Greek colonies, offered to assist them with a very numerous army and a mighty fleet, provided they appointed him commander in chief of all their forces both by sea and land. This proposal was rejected by the Athenian ambassadors, who told him that they did not want a general, but an army, and without pressing him any further departed. The inhabitants of Corcyra, now Corfu, immediately put to sea with a fleet of 60 ships, but advanced no farther than the coasts of Laconia, where they

(E) This is the computation of Herodotus, and with him agree Plutarch (40) and Isocrates (41); but Diodorus Siculus (42), Pliny (43) Ælian (44), and others fall far short of this number, making the army which Xerxes led against Greece, not much more numerous than that with which his father invaded Scythia. These probably mistook the one for the other. Herodotus is the most ancient author that has written of this war, and lived in the very age, wherein it happened; wherefore we have preferred his account to that of others, the rather because we find it to be the general opinion of all the ancients, whether Greeks or Latins, that this was the greatest army that ever was brought into the field, and the account of Herodotus best agrees with the verses engraved on the monument of those Greeks that were slain at Thermopylae, where it is said that they fought against three millions, as we read the inscription in Herodotus, or against two, as we find in Diodorus Siculus (45). Josephus (46) tells us, that his countrymen too bore a part in this expedition, and proves it from a passage out of Charilus (47), where it is said, that Xerxes was attended by a People who used the Phœnician language, and dwelt in the Solymæan land on hills near a great lake. As Jerusalem was also called Solyms, and all the country thereabouts was mountainous, and lay near the great lake Asphaltides, commonly called the lake of Sodom, this description seems plainly to suit the Jews. But Scaliger (48), Cunæus (49), and Bochart (50), understand those verses of Solyms in Pisidia. However Salmassius (51) maintains the contrary opinion; and truly it is not at all likely, that when Xerxes obliged all the other nations to send their quota's of men, the Jews alone should be exempted. Whether therefore those mentioned by Charilus were Jews or not, it must be allowed that they also bore part in this expedition.

The people of Crete having consulted the oracle to know what resolution they should take on this occasion, absolutely refused to enter into the league. Thus were the Lacedæmonians and Athenians abandoned by all their countrymen, except the Thespians and Platæans, who sent small bodies to their assistance. The first thing they took care of in so critical a conjuncture was to put an end to all intestine divisions and discords; and accordingly a peace was concluded between the Athenians and the people of Ægina, who were actually at war. In the next place they appointed a general, the Athenians chusing Themistocles, and the Spartans conferring the supreme command of their forces upon Leonidas one of their kings. The only thing that now ^b remained, was to determine in what place they should meet the Persians, in order to dispute their entrance into Greece. After various proposals and disputes, it was resolved, that they should send a body of four thousand men to Thermopylæ, which is a narrow pass, being but 25 foot broad, between the mountains that divide Thessaly from Greece, and the only way through which the Persians could enter Æolia, and advance by land to Athens. The command of this small body was given to Leonidas, a prince of extraordinary courage, who accordingly marched with all possible expedition to his post, determined either to stop the innumerable army of Xerxes with that handful of men, or die in the attempt. Such was also the resolution of the 300 Spartans who attended him, and had been all chosen by himself. ^c

In the mean time Xerxes advancing near the straits, was strangely surprized to find that the Greeks were resolved to dispute his passage. For he had always flattered himself, that on his approach they would betake themselves to flight, nor attempt to oppose his innumerable forces with so small a body, their whole army consisting of but eleven thousand two hundred men, and of these scarce four thousand being employed to defend the pass. He sent out a scout on horseback to view their numbers, and discover how they were encamped. The scout brought back word, that the Lacedæmonians were some performing their military exercises, and others putting their hair in order; for their custom was, as Damaratus (F), who was then in the Persian camp, informed the king, to comb and put in order their hair when they ^d were to expose their lives to the greatest dangers. However Xerxes entertaining still some hopes of their flight, waited four days, without undertaking any thing, on purpose to give them time to retreat. During this time he used his utmost endeavours to gain and corrupt Leonidas, promising to make him master of all Greece, if he would come over to his party. His offers being rejected by that publick-spirited prince with contempt and indignation, the king ordered him by a herald to deliver up his arms. Leonidas in a stile, and with a spirit truly Laconical, answered him in a few words; Come thyself and take them. ^e Xerxes at this answer, transported with rage, commanded the Medes and Cissians to march against them, take them all alive, and bring them in fetters to him. The Medes not able to stand the shock of the brave Greeks, soon betook themselves to flight, and shewed, as our author ^e observes, that Xerxes had many men, but few soldiers. In their room Hydarnes was ordered to advance with that body, which was called immortal, and consisted of ten thousand chosen men. But when they came to close with the Greeks, they succeeded no better than the Medes and Cissians, being obliged to retire with great slaughter.
The next day, the Persians, reflecting on the small number of their enemies, and supposing so many of them to be wounded, that they could not possibly maintain a second fight, resolved to make another attempt, but could not by any efforts make the Greeks give way; on the contrary they were themselves put to a shameful flight.
The valour of the Greeks exerted itself on this occasion in such an extraordinary manner, that Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his throne, apprehending the intire destruction of his army ^f.

(F) Damaratus was one of the two kings of Sparta, who being banished by the adverse party, had sought refuge at the Persian court, where he was entertained with the greatest marks of honour and distinction. As the courtiers were one day expressing their surprize, that a king should suffer himself to be banished, Damaratus told them, that at Sparta the laws were more powerful than the king. This prince was in great esteem at the Persian court, but neither the injustice of the Spartan citizens, nor the kind treatment of the Persian king could make him forget his country. He no sooner knew that Xerxes designed to invade Greece, but he secretly acquainted the Greeks with his resolution, and on all occasions spoke his sentiments to the king with a noble freedom and dignity (52).

Xerxes

- a Xerxes, having lost all hopes of forcing his way through troops that were determined to conquer or die, was extremely perplexed and doubtful what measures he should take in this posture of affairs; when one Epialtes, the son of Eurydemus, in expectation of a great reward, came to him, and discovered a secret passage to the top of the hill which overlooked and commanded the Spartan forces. The king immediately ordered Hydarnes thither with his select body of ten thousand Persians, who marching all night arrived at break of day, and possessed themselves of that advantageous post. The Phocæans, who defended this pass, being over-powered by the enemies numbers, retired with precipitation to the very top of the mountain, prepared to die gallantly. But Hydarnes neglecting to pursue them, marched down the mountain with all possible expedition, in order to attack those, who defended the straits in the rear. Leonidas being now apprized that it was impossible to bear up against the enemy, obliged the rest of his allies to retire, but stayed himself with the Thebians, Thebans, and three hundred Lacedæmonians; all resolved to die with their leader, who, being told by the oracle that either Sparta should be destroyed or the king lose his life, determined without the least hesitation to sacrifice himself for his country. The Thebans indeed remained against their inclination, being detained by Leonidas as hostages, for they were suspected to favour the Persians. The Thebians with their leader Demophilus could not by any means be prevailed upon to abandon Leonidas and the Spartans. The augur Megistias, who had foretold the event of this enterprize, being pressed by Leonidas to retire, sent home his only son, but remained himself and died by Leonidas. Those who stayed did not feed themselves with any hopes of conquering or escaping, but look'd upon Thermopylae as their graves. And when Leonidas, exhorting them to take some nourishment, said that they should all sup together with Pluto, with one accord they set up a shout of joy as if they had been invited to a banquet^a.
- Xerxes*, after pouring out a libation at the rising of the sun, began to move with the whole body of his army, as he had been advised by Epialtes. Upon their approach Leonidas advanced to the broadest part of the passage, and fell upon the enemy with such undaunted courage and resolution, that the Persian officers were obliged to stand behind the divisions they commanded, in order to prevent the flight of their men, who not being able to stand so violent a shock, would, without that precaution, have immediately turned their backs. Great numbers of the enemies falling into the sea were drowned, others were trampled under feet by their own men, and a great many killed by the Greeks, who, knowing they could not avoid death upon the arrival of those who were advancing to fall upon their rear, exerted their utmost efforts. In this action fell the brave Leonidas, which Abrocomes and Hyperantibus, two of the brothers of Xerxes, observing, advanced with great resolution to seize his body and carry it in triumph to Xerxes. But the Lacedæmonians more eager to defend it than their own lives, repulsed the enemy four times, killed both the brothers of Xerxes with many other commanders of distinction, and rescued the body of their beloved general out of the enemies hands. But in the mean time the army, that was led by the treacherous Epialtes, advancing to attack their rear, they retired to the narrowest place of the passage, and drawing all together, except the Thebans, posted themselves on a rising ground. In this place they made head against the Persians, who poured in upon them on all sides, till at length, not vanquished, but oppress'd and overwhelmed by numbers, they all fell except one who escaped to Sparta, where he was treated as a coward and a traitor to his country, every one avoiding his company, and giving him the ignominious nick-name of Ariflodemus the run-away (G); but not long after

(G) Some say, as our author informs us (53) that Eurytus and Ariflodemus, both Spartans, being obliged by a violent distemper in their eyes to retire to Alpeni, were there some time in suspense whether they should return to Sparta, or to Thermopylae, and there die with the rest of their countrymen. At last Eurytus, hearing that the Persians had gained the top of the mountain, called for his armour, and ordered his servant to lead him into the field of battle (for he had almost quite lost his sight) where he was killed. But Ariflodemus wanting courage staid at Alpeni, and after the battle returned safe to Sparta. Others say, that both Eurytus and Ariflodemus had been dispatched some whither with orders from the army, and that the latter might have been back before the fight, but delayed on purpose to avoid the danger, whereas his companion arrived in due time and died in the field. It is also said, that another of the three hundred Spartans by name Pantites, survived this action and returned to Sparta. But not being able to bear the reproaches of the Spartans he laid violent hands on himself. As for

he made a glorious reparation of his fault in the battle of Plataea, where he distinguished himself in an extraordinary manner. Those who signalized themselves most among the Lacedæmonians were Alpheus and Maron, both sons of Orisipphantus; among the Thebians, Dithyrambus, but above all Leonidas and Dieneces; Dieneces was a Spartan, and distinguished himself on this occasion above all his countrymen, the king excepted. When a Trachinian told him before the battle, that the army of the Barbarians was so numerous, that with one flight of their arrows they would hide the sun, he answered without betraying the least fear, that he was glad to hear it, because he liked to fight in the shade. Xerxes enraged against Leonidas to the last degree for daring to oppose him, caused his head to be struck off, and his body to be put upon a cross, which barbarous treatment redounded more to his own ignominy than to the dishonour of that great hero. Some time after a magnificent monument was erected at Thermopylae in honour of those brave defenders of Greece, with two inscriptions, the one general and relating to all those who died on this occasion, importing that the Greeks of Peloponnesus to the number only of four thousand made head against the Persian army consisting of three millions: the other related to the Spartans in particular, and was composed by the poet Simonides to this purport; Go, passenger, and acquaint the Spartans that we died here in obedience to their just commands. At those tombs a funeral oration was yearly pronounced in honour of the dead heroes, and publick games performed with great solemnity, wherein none but the Lacedæmonians and Thebians had any share, to shew that they alone were concerned in the glorious defence of Thermopylae (H).

Xerxes's indignity to the body of Leonidas.

The famous sea-fight of Artemisium.

Xerxes on this occasion lost 20,000 men; and being sensible that so great a loss was capable of alarming and discouraging his friends, he caused all those that were killed, except a thousand, whose bodies he left in the field, to be privately buried, and then proceeded in his march through Boeotia to Attica, where he arrived four months after he had passed the Hellepont.

THE very same day, on which happened the glorious action at Thermopylae, the two fleets engaged at Artemisium a promontory of Eubœa. That of the Greeks consisted of 271 sail; but the Persian fleet was far more numerous, though they had lost a few days before, in a violent storm which continued four days, above 400 ships. Notwithstanding this loss they sent 200 ships with orders to sail round the island of Eubœa, and encompass the Grecian fleet, that none of their ships might escape. The Greeks having intelligence of this design, set sail in the night-time in order to attack them by day-break. But having missed this squadron, they advanced to Aphetae where the whole Persian fleet lay, and after several encounters, in which the Athenians gained considerable advantages, they came to a general engagement, which was very obstinate, and the success pretty equal. However the Greeks found it necessary, their ships having suffered a great deal, to retire to some safer place to refit, and accordingly steered their course to the straits of Salamis, a small island very near, and over against Attica. Though the engagement at Artemisium did not bring matters to an absolute decision, yet it contributed greatly to encourage the Athenians, who were now convinced, that the enemies, notwithstanding their great number, were not invincible^m.

Athens deserted by its citizens.

As Xerxes entered Attica, the Athenians not being in a condition to make head against so powerful an army, were prevailed upon by Themistocles to put all the citizens on board the fleet, to secure their wives and children in Salamis, Ægina and Trazene, and to abandon the city of Athens, which they were noways in a condition to defend. The Persians arriving in the neighbourhood of Athens wasted the

for the Thebans and their general Leontides, they were obliged for some time to fight against the Persians in conjunction with the other Greeks. But they no sooner saw the Persians descending the hill to attack them in the rear, but they abandoned the rest of their allies, and approaching the Persians with their arms stretched out, told them that they had always favoured the Persians, that they had been the first among the Greeks to present them with earth and water, and that they were come to Thermopylae against their will, and no ways guilty of the loss they had sustained. Thus the Thebans saved their lives, though the enemies killed many of them as they advanced to surrender themselves. Many others were by command of Xerxes branded with the royal mark as slaves, and among these was Leontides their general (54).

(H) There was besides these inscriptions a third relating to the augur Megistias, expressed in these words: Under this stone lies divine Megistias slain by the Medes; with an undaunted heart he saw his fate approaching, and refused to live when the Spartans had resolved to die (55).

a whole country, putting all to fire and sword. A detachment was sent to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delpbos, which was exceeding rich by reason of the many offerings and donatives sent thither from all the parts of the east. If we may believe what Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus relate of this matter, the Persians no sooner advanced near the temple of Minerva, but a violent storm arising accompanied with impetuous winds, thunder and lightening, two great rocks rolled down from mount Parnassus, and crushed the greatest part of that detachment. The main body of the army arriving at Athens found it deserted by all its inhabitants, except a small number of citizens, who literally interpreting Apollo's oracle, That Athens should be saved by wooden walls, had fortified that place with boards and pallisadoes. They defended themselves with incredible courage and resolution, and at last, as they would hearken to no terms of accommodation whatsoever, were all cut in pieces. Xerxes burnt the city and all its temples down to the ground, and immediately dispatched a messenger to Susa with the agreeable news of his success to his uncle Artabanus, in whose hands he had left the government during his absence^a.

Taken and

Persians.

In the mean time the Grecian fleet being reinforced by a great many ships, which joined them from several parts of Greece to the number of 300 sail, Eurybiades, commander in chief of all the naval forces, summoned a council in order to consult about the measures that seemed most proper in the present state of affairs. In this council a great debate arose among the commanders; some, and among these Eurybiades, were for retiring to the Isthmus of Corinth, that they might be nearer the army, which guarded that passage under the command of Cleombrotus the brother of Leonidas. Others, at the head of whom was Themistocles who commanded the Athenian fleet, was for remaining at Salamis, the most advantageous place they could chuse to engage the numerous fleet of the enemies. For in the straits of Salamis the Persians could not, by reason of the narrowness of the sea, extend their line beyond that of the Greeks, and consequently would be obliged to fight upon equal terms without reaping any advantage from their numbers. After many warm disputes Eurybiades with all the other commanders came over to the opinion of Themistocles, fearing that the Athenians, whose ships made up above one half of the fleet, would separate from the allies, if they abandoned that post, as Themistocles in his speech had insinuated. It was therefore unanimously resolved, that in the straits of Salamis, they should wait for the Persian fleet, and there engage them^c.

The Grecian
mis.

A council of war likewise was held on the side of the Persians in order to determine whether they should hazard a naval engagement, or no. All the commanders were for engaging, because they knew this advice to be most agreeable to the king's inclinations. Queen Artemisia was the only person that opposed this resolution. She was queen of Halicarnassus, and followed Xerxes in this war with five ships, the best equipped of any in the fleet, except those of the Sidonians. This princess distinguished herself on all occasions by her singular courage, and still more by her prudence and conduct; for our author observes, that there was not one who gave Xerxes so good advice as this heroine. She represented in the council of war, we are speaking of, the dangerous consequences of engaging a people that were far more expert in maritime affairs than the Persians, alledging that the loss of a battle at sea would be attended with the ruin of their army, whereas by spinning out the war, and advancing into the heart of Greece, they would create jealousies and divisions among their enemies, who would separate from one another, in order to defend each of them their own country, and that then the king might, almost without striking a blow, make himself master of Greece. This advice, though very prudent, was not followed, but an engagement unanimously resolved upon. Xerxes, in order to encourage his men with his presence, caused a throne to be erected on the top of an eminence, whence he might safely behold whatever happened, having several scribes about him to write down the names of such as should signalize themselves against the enemies. The approach of the Persian fleet with the news that a strong detachment from the army was marching against Cleombrotus, who defended the Isthmus, struck such a terror into the Peloponnesians, that they could not by any entreaties be prevailed upon to stay any longer at Salamis. Being therefore determined to put to sea, and sail to the Isthmus, Themis-

^a HERODOT. I. viii. c. 51.

^c Idem, I. viii. c. 56, & seq.

Stocles privately dispatched a trusty friend to the Persian commanders, informing them of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their fleet round the island in order to prevent their escape. The same messenger assured Xerxes that Themistocles, who had sent him that advice, designed to join the Persians as soon as the battle began, with all the Athenian ships. The king, giving credit to all he said, immediately commanded a strong squadron to sail round the island in the night in order to cut off the enemies flight. Early next morning as the Peloponnesians were preparing to set sail, they found themselves encompassed on all sides by the Persian fleet, and were against their will obliged to remain in the straits of Salamis, and expose themselves to the same dangers with their allies. The Grecian fleet consisted of 380 sail, that of the Persians of 2000 and upwards. Themistocles avoided the engagement till a certain wind, which rose regularly every day at the same time, and was entirely contrary to the enemy, began to blow. As soon as he found himself favoured by this wind, he gave the signal for battle. The Persians, knowing that they fought under their king's eye, advanced with great resolution; but the wind blowing directly in their faces, and the largeness and numbers of their ships embarrassing them in a place so strait and narrow, their courage soon abated; which the Greeks observing, used such efforts, that in a short time breaking into the Persian fleet they entirely disordered them, some flying towards Phalerus, where their army lay encamped, others saving themselves in the harbours of the neighbouring islands. The Ionians were the first that betook themselves to flight. But queen Artemisia distinguished herself above all the rest, her ships being the last that fled; which Xerxes observing cried out, that the men behaved like women, and the women with the courage and intrepidity of men. The Athenians were so incensed against her, that they offered a reward of ten thousand drachma's to any one that should take her alive; but she in spite of all their efforts got clear of the ships that pursued her, and arrived safe on the coast of Asia. In this engagement, which was one of the most memorable actions we find recorded in history, the Grecians lost 40 ships, and the Persians 200, besides a great many more that were taken with all the men and ammunition they carried. Many of their allies dreading the king's cruelty, made the best of their way to their respective countries. Xerxes being under no small apprehension lest the conquerors should sail to the Hellepont and there obstruct his return, left Mardonius in Greece with an army of 300,000 men, and marched with the rest towards Thrace in order to cross the Hellepont. As no provisions had been prepared before-hand, his army underwent great hardships during the whole time of his march, which lasted five and forty days. The soldiers were obliged to live upon herbs, and even the bark and leaves of trees, which occasioned innumerable distempers that swept off the greater part of them. The king finding that his army was not in a condition to pursue the march so expeditiously as he desired, advanced with a small retinue, leaving the rest behind; but when he arrived at the Hellepont, he found the bridge broke down by the violence of the storms, and was reduced to the necessity of crossing over in a fishing-boat. From the Hellepont he continued his flight to Sardis, where he took up his quarters for the ensuing year.

THE first thing the Athenians took care of after the battle, was to send the first fruits of their victory to Delphos, where they enriched the temple with the spoils of those, who not long before had pillaged it. Their next thought was to reward those who had signalized themselves above the rest. It was a custom in Greece, that after an engagement the commanding officers should declare, who, in their opinion, had most distinguished themselves during the conflict, by writing down the names of the person that deserved the first, and of him who deserved the second prize. On this occasion each captain, being ambitious of that honour, wrote down his own name in the first place, and in the second the name of Themistocles, which plainly proved that he deserved the preference to all. And accordingly he was distinguished with honours, which to that time had never been bestowed upon any other, as we shall have occasion to relate in the history of Greece.

ABOUT the same time that the actions of Thermopylae and Salamis happened, the formidable army of the Carthaginians, consisting of 300,000 men, was entirely defeated by Gelo king of Syracuse. We shall give a particular account of this victory in the history of the Carthaginians.

From thence he sent Alexander king of Macedon with very advantageous offers to the people of Athens in order to draw them off from the common alliance. The offers he made were, to rebuild at the king's charges their city, and whatever other edifices had been demolished the year before in Attica; to suffer them to live according to their own laws; to reinstate them in all their former possessions, and to add to them whatever other lands they should desire. Alexander, as being their ancient friend, exhorted them in his own name to lay hold on so favourable an opportunity of resettling their affairs, representing that they were not in a condition to stand out against so powerful an enemy. But the Athenians could not by any means be prevailed upon to desert the interest of Greece. Whereupon Mardonius marched with all his army into Attica, wasting and destroying whatever he found in his way. Attica wasted by Mardonius. The Athenians not being in a condition to withstand such a torrent retired to Salamis, Ægina and Trazene, and the second time abandoned their city. Mardonius entered Athens, and demolished whatever had escaped their fury the preceding year. In the mean time the joint forces of Greece being drawn together on the Isthmus of Corinth, Mardonius thought fit to march back into Bæotia. For that being an open and level country was more fit for him to engage in than Attica, which was rough, craggy, full of hills and narrow passes. On his return into Bæotia he encamped on the banks of the Asopus. The Greeks followed him thither under the command of Pausanias king of Sparta, and of Aristides, commander in chief of the Athenians. The Persians army, according to the computation of Herodotus, consisted of 350,000, according to Diodorus, of 500,000 men. That of the Grecians did not amount to the number of 110,000. Mardonius in order to try the courage of the Greeks sent out his cavalry, in which the main strength of his army consisted, to skirmish with the enemy. The Megarians, who were encamped on a plain, sustained the first onset: but in spite of all their resolution were forced to give way, being overwhelmed with the enemies arrows. As they were giving ground, a detachment of 300 Athenians with a small number of bow-men advanced to their relief. Masistius, general of the Persian horse, and one highly esteemed in Persia, seeing them advance in good order, commanded his cavalry to face about and attack them. The shock was very violent, both parties endeavouring to shew by the issue of this encounter what might be the success of a general engagement. The victory was a long time doubtful, but at last, Masistius being killed, the Persians betook themselves to flight. The death of Masistius was greatly lamented by the Persians, who to shew their concern for the loss of so brave a commander cut off their hair, and likewise the manes of their horses, filling the camp with loud cries and lamentations. After this encounter the two armies continued for the space of ten days only looking at one another. At last Mardonius, who was of a fiery temper, not being able to bear any further delays, and his provisions being almost consumed, called a council of war in order to deliberate whether they should give battle, or retire till such time as they were supplied with fresh provisions. Artabazus, a nobleman of great distinction and experience, was of opinion that they should not hazard a battle, but retire under the walls of Thebes, where they should be in a condition to lay in stores of provisions and forage. He alleged, that by delaying they might cast a damp upon the ardour of the enemies, and in the mean time by sending rich presents to their leaders prevail upon them to betray the common liberty without hazarding a battle. The Thebans were of the same opinion; but that of Mardonius, who was for engaging, prevailed, none of the other commanders daring to contradict him; and the result of their deliberations was, that they should give battle the next day. Alexander king of Macedon, who in his heart favoured the Greeks, came secretly about midnight into their camp, and informed Aristides of all that had passed.

in the Persian army, and had been often routed by the Spartans. But Mardonius upon the intelligence he had of this new disposition made the like change, which obliged the Greeks to return to their former stations; and the Persians likewise ranged their army according to their first disposition. Thus did all that day pass without any action. In the evening the Greeks held a council of war, in which it was resolved that they should decamp, and retire to some other place more conveniently situated for water. Night coming on, and the officers endeavouring at the head of the bodies they commanded to make what haste they could to the new camp that was marked out for them, great confusion happened, some going one way, and some another, without observing any order in their march. At last they stopped near the little city of Platæa. Mardonius being informed that the Greeks were retired by night, drew up his army in battle-array, and pursued them with great shouts, as if he were not to fight, but to strip and plunder a flying enemy. He did not fail on this occasion to insult Artabanus, reproaching him with his cowardly prudence, and the false notion he had conceived of the Lacedæmonians, who never fled, as he pretended, before the enemy. Having passed the Asopus, he came up with the Lacedæmonians and Tegeans, who were separated from the body of the army to the number of 53,000 men. Pausanias finding himself thus attacked by the whole Persian army, dispatched a messenger to acquaint the Athenians, who had taken another rout, with the danger he was in. The Athenians immediately put themselves on their march to succour their distressed allies, but were attacked, and to their great regret prevented by those Greeks who sided with the Persians. The battle being thus fought in two different places, the Spartans were the first who broke into the very center of the Persian army, and after a most obstinate resistance put them to flight. Mardonius mounted on a white horse signalized himself on this occasion, and at the head of 1000 chosen men, made a great slaughter of the enemies; but he falling, the whole Persian army was easily routed, which those Greeks, who had engaged the Athenians, hearing, retired with precipitation, leaving the Athenians masters of the field. The Persians fled to their former camp, which they had fortified with an inclosure of wood. The Lacedæmonians pursued them, but were not able to force the entrenchment, not being accustomed to besiege towns, or storm fortified places. The Athenians hearing that the Persians were thus shut up in their camp, gave over pursuing the Greeks, and hastened to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, whom they found busied in forcing the enemies camp with more valour than skill. Wherefore they took upon themselves that labour, and soon made a breach in the wall, through which entering together with the Lacedæmonians, they made such a dreadful slaughter of the enemies, that of 300,000 scarce 3000 made their escape. Artabanus, who from Mardonius's imprudent conduct had but too well foreseen the misfortune that befel them, after having distinguished himself in the engagement, made a timely retreat with the 40,000 men he commanded, and being arrived safe at Byzantium, from thence passed over into Asia. During the whole engagement the Spartans lost but 91 men, the Tegeans 16, and the Athenians 52. When they came to determine who had behaved with most courage, they all gave judgment in favour of Aristodemus, who was the only one that had saved himself at Thermopylæ, and had now wiped off the blemish of his former conduct by a most glorious death. The spoil was immense, consisting in vast sums of money, in gold and silver cups, vessels, tables, bracelets, rich beds, and all sorts of furniture. They gave the tenth of all to Pausanias, who distinguished himself in a very extraordinary manner, and the others were rewarded, each according to his merit. Thus was Greece delivered not only from the present, but all future invasions of the Persians, who henceforward never more appeared on this side the Hellepont.

THE same day that this battle was fought at Platæa, the Grecian fleet gained as memorable a victory at Mycale, a promontory in Asia, over the remainder of the Persian navy. For at the same time that the land-forces of Greece rendezvoused on the Isthmus of Corinth, their fleet met at Egina, under the command of Leotychides the other king of Sparta, and Xanthippus the Athenian. Thither ambassadors came to their commanders from the Ionians inviting them into Asia, to deliver the Greek colonies from the Persian yoke. On this invitation they immediately set sail for Asia, steering

■ their course by Delos, where they were met by other ambassadors from Samos; who brought them intelligence that the Persian fleet, which had wintered at Cuma, was then at Samos, where it might easily be destroyed, earnestly entreating them at the same time not to neglect so favourable an opportunity. Hereupon they sailed forthwith to Samos, but the Persian fleet receiving timely notice of their design retired to Mycale, where the army lay encamped, consisting of 100,000 men, the remainder of those Xerxes had brought back out of Greece the year before. Here they drew their ships ashore, and threw up an entrenchment quite round, which they fortified with palisadoes, being determined to sustain a siege. The Greeks arriving at Mycale, found all the enemies ships within the circumvallation, and a numerous army disposed along the coast; but however, did not meet with the least opposition in landing their men, and drawing them up in battle-array; which when they had done, they attacked the enemy with such vigour that they obliged them to fly to their entrenchments, and pursued them so close that they entered the camp at the same time. When the enemy saw their entrenchments forced, all the auxiliaries betook themselves to flight; but the Persians though reduced to a small number still continued to dispute the entrance of their camp against the Greeks pouring in on all sides. But in the mean time the Lacedæmonians, who had taken a wider compass, arriving with other troops of the allies, the Persians likewise abandoned their post, and saved themselves by flying to the neighbouring hills. Before the engagement they had appointed the Milesians to guard the narrow passages of the mountains, that they might have a safe retreat in case they were put to flight, and sure guides to conduct them through the mountains, the Milesians being well acquainted with the country. But they treacherously brought back by other ways to the enemy such as fled to them; by which means a very small number escaped the general slaughter of that day. The two Persian generals Mardonius and Tigranes died in the field with many other commanders of great distinction. The Greeks having made a great slaughter of the enemies both in the field and in the pursuit, set fire to their ships, burnt the whole camp, and set sail for Samos loaded with an immense booty consisting of 70 chests of money, besides many other things of an inestimable value. And thus ended all the great designs of Xerxes in a most miserable disappointment, a small number of those millions of men now remaining, with which the year before he marched so proudly over the Hellepont.

THE battle of Platæa was fought in the morning, and that of Mycale in the afternoon of the same day, and yet all the Greek writers pretend that the victory at Platæa was known at Mycale before the engagement began there, though those two places were parted by the whole Ægean, a sea of several days sail. But Diodorus Siculus clears up this matter, telling us that Leotychides observing his troops to be in great pain for their countrymen at Platæa, lest they should be overpowered by the humerous army of Mardonius, in order to raise their spirits and courage, caused a report to be spread in the army, that the Persians were defeated at Platæa, though at that time he knew nothing of the matter.

Xerxes upon the news of these two overthrows left Sardis with the same hurry and precipitation as he had left Athens after the battle of Salamis, making all the haste he could towards Persia, that he might get as far as possible out of the reach of the conquering enemy. But before he set out, he gave orders that all the temples of the Greek cities in Asia should be burnt and demolished; and his orders were so far executed that not one temple was left standing except that of Diana at Ephesus (1).

(1) We will not pretend to determine whether Xerxes's resentment after so many defeats prompted him to this, or a singular zeal for the institution of the Mages, in whose religion he had been thoroughly instructed by Zoroastres. For that religion expressing a great detestation of worshipping God by images, its zealous were for destroying all idolatrous temples where-ever they came. And to keep Xerxes steady in their party, not only several of the chief doctors of the Mages, but Osanes himself, who was then at the head of the whole sect, attended him during the whole time of this expedition (56). So that if we may credit Cicero (57), it was at their instigation, that all those temples were destroyed.

THE Grecian fleet after the battle of Mysale steered their course first to Samos, and thence to the Hellepont in order to possess themselves of the bridges, which Xerxes had caused to be laid over those straits; but finding them broke by storms, Leotychides with his Peloponnesian forces sailed home. Xantippus with the Athenians and his allies the Ionians remaining there made himself master of Sestus and the whole Thracian Chersonesus, where the army was enriched with an immense booty, which on the approach of the winter they carried home, every one returning then to their respective countries. Xantippus finding all the materials of the bridges at Cardia, whither they had been conveyed by order of Xerxes, carried them with him to Athens, where they were preserved for many years as a monument of the many victories, which the Greeks obtained in this war. From this time the Ionian cities in Asia shaking off the Persian yoke recovered their ancient liberty, and maintained it as long as that empire subsisted.

driven out of Greece.

THE Greeks, having settled their affairs at home, resolved to pursue the war, and drive the Persians out of all the Greek cities in Asia, and the neighbouring islands. With this view they equipped a powerful fleet, which sailing to Cyprus under the command of Pausanias and Aristides, drove the Persians out of that island, and restored the inhabitants to their ancient liberty.

Xerxes' incestuous intrigue with his daughter-in-law.

WHILE Xerxes resided at Sardis, he conceived a violent passion for the wife of his brother Masistes, a prince of extraordinary merit, and who had served the king with great zeal and fidelity. As she was a woman of great virtue, and had a singular value for her husband, she could by no solicitations be prevailed upon to defile his bed. However the king still flattering himself that by heaping favours upon her he might at last conquer her virtue, married his eldest son Darius whom he appointed his successor to the crown, to Artaynta this princess's daughter. As this was the greatest favour he could bestow on the mother, he expected it would engage her to comply with his desires. But Xerxes finding her virtue proof against all temptations, he changed his inclinations for the mother, and fell passionately in love with the daughter, who was now the wife of his own son, and did not follow the glorious example of her mother's firmness and virtue. While this intrigue was carrying on, Hamestris, wife to Xerxes, having wrought a very rich and curious mantle, presented it to the king, which he, being wonderfully pleased with it, put on when he first visited his mistress. In the conversation he had with her he desired her to ask whatever favour she pleased, binding himself by an oath to deny her nothing. Hereupon Artaynta desired him to give her the mantle. Xerxes foreseeing the bad consequences that would necessarily ensue from his complying with her request, did all that lay in his power to dissuade her from insisting upon her first demand. He offered her immense treasures, with cities and an army to be solely at her disposal, which was one of the greatest presents that the Persian kings could make. But not being able to prevail upon her, and thinking himself bound by his imprudent promise and rash oath, he yielded to her demand, and gave her the mantle, which she immediately put on and publicly wore as a trophy of her power over the king's affections. Hamestris being now confirmed in the suspicion she had entertained, was incensed to the highest degree; but instead of venting her rage against the daughter, who alone was faulty, resolved to be revenged on the mother, whom she looked upon as the author of the whole intrigue, though she was no ways privy to it.

Hamestris's cruelty to the innocent wife of Masistes.

For the better executing of her design she waited the great festival, which was annually celebrated on the king's birth-day; on which occasion the king, according to the established custom of the country, used to grant his queen whatever she demanded. This day being come she asked that the wife of his brother Masistes might be delivered into her hands. Xerxes, who apprehended the queen's design, was struck with horror at his demand, both out of regard to his brother, and because he knew that his wife was quite innocent, and therefore at first withstood her request. But being at last overcome by her importunity, he consented with the utmost reluctance to her request, and ordering his guards to seize the innocent princess, delivered her into the hands of the revengeful and enraged Hamestris, empowering her to treat her as she pleased. In consequence of this power Hamestris caused her breasts, tongue, nose, ears and lips to be cut off and thrown to the dogs before her face, and then sent her home in that miserable condition to her husband. In the mean time

- a Xerxes had sent for his brother to prepare him for this melancholy and tragical adventure. He first told him that he must part with his wife, and that he designed to supply her place with one of his own daughters. But Masistes, who was passionately fond of his wife, could not be induced by any offers whatsoever to divorce her. Whereupon Xerxes in great wrath told him, that since he refused his daughter, he should neither have her nor his own wife, and with this inhuman reply dismissed him. Masistes from this speech apprehending some great misfortune, made all the haste he could home to see what had passed during his absence. On his arrival he found his wife in that deplorable condition we have described, and being exasperated to the highest degree, as the case did justly deserve, he immediately assembled all his family, servants and dependants, and set out with all possible expedition for the province of Bactriana, of which he was governour, with full resolution as soon as he arrived there, to induce the Bactrians to revolt and revenge such a barbarous usage in the severest manner. But Xerxes hearing of his sudden departure, and suspecting from thence his design, sent a party of horse after him, who overtaking him, cut him in pieces with his wife, children and all his retinue. There is another action no less cruel and impious related of Hamestris. She caused fourteen children of the best families in Persia to be buried alive, as a sacrifice to the infernal gods.
- b UPON the death of Masistes, Xerxes appointed Hystaspes his second son to be governor of Bactria, which obliging him to live at a distance from court, gave his younger brother Artaxerxes an opportunity of mounting the throne before him, as will be seen in its proper place *.
- Xerxes* being wholly discouraged by a continual series of heavy losses and shameful defeats, gave over all thoughts of war and conquests, and never afterwards suffered his ships to appear in the Egean sea, or his forces on the coasts. He gave himself entirely up to luxury and ease, minding nothing but the gratifying of his lusts and vicious inclinations. This dissolute manner of life drew upon him the contempt and hatred of his subjects, which encouraged Artabanus, a native of Hyrkania, captain of his guards, and who had long been his chief favourite, to conspire against him. He prevailed upon Mithridates, one of the eunuchs of the palace, to engage in the conspiracy, and being by him let into the king's bed-chamber, murdered him in the 21st year of his reign while he was asleep. He then went to Artaxerxes the king's third son, and charged Darius his elder brother with the murder, as though an eager desire of ascending the throne had prompted him to that execrable crime. He told him at the same time, that he designed to cut him off next in order to secure the crown to himself, and therefore he ought to guard himself against all dangers. Artaxerxes, being then a very young man, rashly believed whatever Artabanus told him, and without further examination went immediately to his brother's apartment, and there, being assisted by Artabanus and his guards, murdered him. The next heir was Hystaspes, the second son of Xerxes; but as he was then in Bactriana, of which province he was governor, Artabanus placed Artaxerxes on the throne; but with a design to let him enjoy the sovereignty only till such time as he had formed a party strong enough to drive him from it, and seize it himself. His great authority had gained him many dependents, and besides he had seven sons, who were all of robust bodies, courageous, and raised to the highest dignities of the empire. His confidence in these inspired him with this design, but while he was hastening to put it in execution, Artaxerxes being informed of the whole plot by Megabyzus, who had married one of his sisters, was before-hand with him in a counter-plot, and killed him before his treason was ripe for execution. His death secured to Artaxerxes the possession of the kingdom * (K). He is said to have been the handsomest man of the age he lived in, and a prince of a very mild and generous disposition. He is called, or rather nick-named, by the Greeks Macrocheir,

(K) Whether Artabanus possessed himself of the throne, and held it seven months, as some authors affirm, or was killed by Artaxerxes before he accomplished his design, is no easy matter to determine with any certainty. The seven first months however of the reign of Artaxerxes, are by Eusebius (58) assigned to Artabanus, but whether because he ruled so long in his name, or on what other account, is not easy to determine.

that is long-handed, by reason of the more than ordinary length of his hands (L);^a but in scripture he bears the name of Abasuerus as well as that of Artaxerxes, and is the same who had Esther for his queen (M).

Artaxerxes
Longimanus.

HAVING by the death of Artabanus removed one dangerous competitor, he had still two great obstacles in his way, viz. his brother Hystaspes in Bactria, and the party of Artabanus at home, which gave him the first trouble. Artabanus, as we have hinted above, had seven sons and many partisans, who immediately gathered together to revenge his death. Whereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which many Persians of distinction fell on both sides. But at length Artaxerxes, having prevailed, put to death all those who were privy to the plot. Those, especially, who had any hand in the murder of his father, were punished in a most severe and exemplary manner. The eunuch Mitbridates, who betrayed him, was boated, a punishment which was in use among the Persians, and we have already described where we give an account of the manners of that nation. Artaxerxes, having thus crushed the faction of Artabanus at home, was in a condition to send an army into Bactria, which had declared in favour of his brother. But here he was not attended with the like success; for the two armies engaging, Hystaspes stood his ground, and though he did not carry the day, he sustained no considerable loss, both parties retiring with equal success to prepare for a second encounter. The next year Artaxerxes drawing together a far more powerful army, as having the greater part of the empire at his devotion, overpowered Hystaspes, and by a complete victory secured to himself the quiet possession of the empire. To prevent all further disturbances, he removed such governors of cities and provinces as he suspected to be affected to either of the factions he had overcome, putting others in their room whom he could safely trust. He afterwards applied himself to the reforming of many abuses and disorders that had crept into the government; whereby he gained great reputation, and won the hearts of his

(L) Strabo (59) tells us that he was so called because his hands were so long, that when he stood upright, he could touch his knees with them; but according to Plutarch (60), he had that name because his right hand was longer than his left. He is named by the Latins Longimanus, which answers the Greek Μακροχρῆς.

(M) Some are of opinion that Darius Hystaspis was the king Abasuerus who married Esther, and that Atoffa was the Vashti, and Artysfona the Esther of scripture (61). But this opinion is quite inconsistent with what we read of these persons in prophane history. For Herodotus tells us (62), that Artysfona was the daughter of Cyrus, and therefore she could not be Esther; and that Atoffa had four sons by Darius, all born after he ascended the throne (63); and therefore she could not be that queen Vashti, whom the king divorced in the third year of his reign (64), nor he consequently that king Abasuerus. Besides, Atoffa had such an ascendant over the king, that he was influenced by her on his death-bed to disinherit his elder sons by a former wife, and settle the crown on Xerxes her son; whereas the Abasuerus of scripture divorced Vashti by an unalterable decree, and therefore could never admit her again to his bed (65). What induced the learned primate of Ireland to be of this opinion was, that Abasuerus in the book of Esther (66), is said to have laid a tribute on the land, and on the isles, and the same is said of Darius Hystaspis by Herodotus (67); but this Strabo ascribes to Darius Longimanus (68), as we read in the printed copies; and the surname of Longimanus with the description of the person in that place, plainly shews that Darius was there by mistake of the transcribers put instead of Artaxerxes, seeing no Darius ever bore that name, and what is said there of Darius is applicable to none but Artaxerxes.

Scaliger is of opinion (69) that Xerxes was the Abasuerus, and his queen Hamestris the Esther of scripture; induced thereunto by the similitude he finds between Hamestris and Esther. But the similitude of their characters is a far stronger proof that Hamestris could not be Esther, as must appear from what we have already related of queen Hamestris, and shall have occasion to add in the sequel of this history. A woman of so vile a character cannot have been that queen of Persia, who by the name of Esther is so renowned in holy writ, and is celebrated there as the instrument, by whom God was pleased in so signal a manner to deliver his people from that utter destruction which was designed against them. Besides we are told by Herodotus (70) that Xerxes had a son by Hamestris, who was marriageable in the seventh year of his reign, and Esther was not till that time married to Abasuerus (71).

There being no such objections as to Artaxerxes Longimanus, he must, in our opinion, have been the Abasuerus who married Esther. This we find confirmed by the Septuagint, by the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther, and by Josephus. The Septuagint throughout the whole book of Esther translate Abasuerus by Artaxerxes. The apocryphal additions to that book constantly call Esther's husband Artaxerxes, and from several circumstances related of him both in the canonical and apocryphal Esther, it is very plain that this Artaxerxes could not be Artaxerxes Memon. Josephus (72) tells us in express terms, that Esther's husband was Artaxerxes Longimanus. Severus Sulpitius, and many others both antient and modern writers fall in with Josephus. The extraordinary favour and kindness, which Artaxerxes Longimanus shewed the Jews beyond all other kings that reigned in Persia, is a convincing proof that they had such a powerful advocate as Esther to intercede for them. †

a subjects throughout all the provinces of the empire *. Artaxerxes, being now settled in the peaceable possession of the whole Persian empire, appointed rejoicings and feasts to be made for the space of 180 days in the city of Susa, on the conclusion of which he gave a great entertainment to all the princes and people that were then in that city, which lasted seven days. Vashti the queen at the same time made a like feast in her apartment for the women; and here the history of Hadasab or Esther, for which we refer the reader to that book, takes place.

In the fifth year of Artaxerxes's reign the Egyptians revolted, and making Inarus, The Egyptians revolt, assisted by the Athenians. prince of the Lybians, their king, called in the Athenians to their assistance, who having at that time a fleet of 200 ships lying off the island of Cyprus, laid hold of that

b invitation, looking upon it as a very favourable opportunity of weakening the Persian power, by driving them from so rich a kingdom. Upon the news of this revolt, Artaxerxes, having raised an army of 300,000 men, was resolved to march himself against the rebels. But being dissuaded from venturing his person, he gave the command of all the land-forces to Achæmenides one of his brothers (N), who arriving in Egypt at the head of his numerous army encamped on the banks of the Nile. In the mean time the Athenians having defeated the Persian fleet, and either sunk or taken fifty of their ships, sailed up the Nile, and landing their forces, under the command of Chabritimis their general, joined Inarus and the Egyptians. They afterwards attacked with joint forces Achæmenides, routed his army, and killed 100,000 Year of the flood 2530. Before Christ 469. of his men with the general himself. The remainder fled to Memphis, whither the c conquerors pursuing them, took two parts of the town; but the Persians securing themselves in the third called the White-wall, which was by much the best fortified part of the city, there suffered a siege of three years, during which time they made a most vigorous defence, till they were succoured by the forces that were sent to their relief *.

Artaxerxes hearing of the defeat of his army in Egypt, and how much the Athenians had contributed to it, sent ambassadors to the Lacedæmonians with large sums of money in order to engage them to make war upon the Athenians, and by that means oblige them to recall their troops to the defence of their own country. But the Lacedæmonians rejecting his offers, he resolved to make a diversion by sending d Themistocles, (who had taken shelter in the Persian court, whither the envy of his enemies at home had driven him, as we shall relate in the history of Greece) at the head of a powerful army to invade Attica. But that great commander not knowing how to decline the command of a prince who had heaped so many favours upon him, and on the other hand being unwilling to make war upon his own country, resolved to put an end to his life. And accordingly having invited all his friends to a banquet, and sacrificed a bull, he drank a large draught of the blood, and soon after died *. Upon his death Artaxerxes ordered Artabazus governour of Cilicia and Megabyzus governour of Syria, to raise an army for the relief of those who were besieged in the White-wall. These generals soon drew together 300,000 e men, but were obliged to wait till the fleet was equipped in order to transport them into Egypt, which could not be got ready till the ensuing year. Inarus hearing of the formidable preparations that were making by these Persian governours to relieve the besieged, redoubled his attacks on the White-wall, and made his utmost efforts to carry it; but the Persians within defended themselves with such bravery, that the Egyptians and Athenians made no considerable progress towards the reduction of the place *.

In the third year of the siege, and ninth of Artaxerxes, the Persian fleet being equipped, Artabazus took the command of it; and set sail towards the Nile, while Megabyzus at the head of the land-forces marched to Memphis. On his arrival he

of the reign of Xerxes was governour of Egypt. But they were certainly misled by the similitude of names; for Ctesias tells us, that Artaxerxes gave the command of the troops to the son of Hæmestris, who could not be Achæmenes.

not only obliged Inarus and his auxiliaries to raise the siege of the White-wall, but in a pitched battle entirely defeated them with great slaughter of the Egyptians, who suffered most in this engagement. After this defeat Inarus, though wounded in the thigh by Megabyzus, retired with the Athenians and such of the Egyptians as were willing to follow him, to the city of Biblos in the island of Prosopotis, which being surrounded by the navigable branches of the Nile, the Athenians stationed their fleet in one of them, and held out a siege of a year and half. In the mean time the rest of the Egyptians submitted to the conqueror, and returned to their obedience, Amyrtaeus alone maintaining a party against him in the fens, where he ruled many years, the Persians not being able to reduce him by reason of the inaccessibleness of the place. Inarus and his auxiliaries in the island of Prosopotis defended themselves with such vigour, that the Persians despairing to reduce them by the ordinary methods of war, had recourse to an extraordinary expedient whereby they soon accomplished their design. They quite drained, by cutting many canals, that arm of the Nile, where the Athenian fleet lay, and by that means opened a passage for the whole army to enter the island. Inarus seeing all was now lost, delivered up himself, the Egyptians, and about 50 Athenians to Megabyzus, on condition their lives should be spared. But the rest of the Athenians, to the number of 6000, refused to surrender, and, having set fire to their fleet, drew up in battle-array, resolved to die sword in hand, and sell their lives at the dearest rate in imitation of the Lacedæmonians that fell at Thermopylae. The Persians, perceiving they had taken this desperate resolution, did not think it advisable to attack them; but rather to offer them reasonable terms, and come to a composition. The terms were, that they should leave Egypt, and have a free passage home by sea or land. They accepted the conditions, delivered up the island with the city of Biblos to the conquerors, and marched to Cyrene, where they embarked for Greece; but most of them perished before they reached their native country. Neither was this the only loss the Athenians sustained on this occasion. Another fleet of 50 sail being sent by them to relieve those, who were besieged in the island of Prosopotis, arrived at one of the mouths of the Nile soon after their countrymen had surrendered, and having entered the river without knowing what had happened, were at the same time attacked by the Persian fleet, and galled with such showers of darts and arrows by the land-forces from the shore, that they were all killed, except some few who broke through the enemies fleet and escaped. Thus ended the fatal war, which the Athenians had carried on for the space of six years in Egypt, and that kingdom was anew united to the Persian empire, and continued so during the remaining part of the reign of Artaxerxes. Inarus and the other prisoners taken in this war were sent to Susa, and Sartamas appointed governor of Egypt.

Cimon's success in Cyprus and against the Persian fleet.

THE Athenians having equipped another fleet of 200 sail gave the command of it to Cimon, enjoining him to drive the Persians from the island of Cyprus. Cimon in pursuance to his orders took Citium, Malum, and several other cities of that island, and from thence sent 60 sail to the assistance of Amyrtaeus in the fens of Egypt. Artabazus being then in those seas with a fleet of 300 ships, Cimon as soon as his Squadron returned from Egypt, fell upon him, took 100 of his ships, destroyed many others, and pursued the remainder to the coasts of Phanicia. Being flushed with his success, on his return he landed his men in Cilicia, where he found Megabyzus with an army of 300,000 men, marched against him, and having put him to flight with a great slaughter of his men, returned to Cyprus with a double triumph.

Artaxerxes
makes peace with the Athenians.

Artaxerxes tired with a war in which he had sustained so great losses, resolved with the advice of his counsellors and ministers to put an end to so many calamities by coming to an accommodation with the enemy. Accordingly he sent orders to his generals, who were charged with the management of the Cyprian war, to conclude a peace with the Athenians on the best terms they could. Hereupon Megabyzus and Artabazus sent ambassadors to Athens to propose an accommodation, which was agreed upon by the deputies of both sides on the following terms. 1. That all the Greek cities of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws. 2. That no Persian ships of war should enter those seas that lie between the Cyanean and the Chelidonian islands, that is, from the Euxine sea to the coasts of Pamphylia. 3. That no Persian general should come by land within three days

a march of those seas. 4. That the Athenians should not commit any hostilities in the territories of the king of Persia. These articles being sworn to by both parties, peace was proclaimed. Thus ended this war, which had lasted from the burning of Sardis by the Athenians fifty-one years compleat, and destroyed numberless multitudes both of Greeks and Persians ¹.

Artaxerxes being continually importuned by his mother for five years together to deliver to her Inarus and the Athenians who had been taken with him in Egypt, that she might sacrifice them to the manes of her son Achæmenes, yielded at last to her unwearied solicitations. Whereupon this inhuman princess, without any regard to the conditions which had been with the greatest solemnity ratified, caused Inarus ^{Inarus cruci-} to be crucified, and the heads of all the rest to be struck off. Megabyzus, who had ^{fed.} engaged his word that their lives should be spared, looked upon this as a dishonour ^{Megabyzus} done him, and therefore retiring to Syria, of which province he was governor, ^{revolts, and} raised there an army, and openly revolted. The king immediately sent Osiris, one ^{defeats Osiris.} of the chief lords of the court, with an army of 200,000 men to suppress this rebellion. But Megabyzus in a general engagement wounded him, took him prisoner, ^{Year of the} and put his numerous army to flight. Artaxerxes hearing that his general was taken, ^{flood 2542.} sent a messenger to demand him, and Megabyzus generously released him as soon as ^{Before Christ} his wounds were cured ^{457.}.

THE next year Artaxerxes sent another army against him under the command of ^c Menostanes son to Artarius the king's brother, and governor of Babylon. This general was attended with no better success than the other, for he was in the same manner defeated and put to flight, leaving Megabyzus master of the field, and all the baggage. The king being sensible that he could not get the better of him by dint of arms, sent his brother Artarius and his sister Amytis, who was wife to Megabyzus, with several other persons of distinction, to persuade him to return to his duty. By their mediation the difference being made up, the king granted him his pardon, and he returned to court. But not long after a lion being ready to fall upon the king as he was hunting, Megabyzus, to shew his zeal and affection for his sovereign, threw a dart at the lion, and killed him. But the king still retaining ^d ill-will against him, upon pretence that he had affronted him in shooting first at the lion, commanded his head to be struck off; and it was with the utmost difficulty, that Amytis his sister, and Hamestris his mother, prevailed upon him to change the sentence of death into that of perpetual banishment. Megabyzus was therefore sent to Cyria, a city standing on the Red-Sea, and sentenced to lead the rest of his life there under confinement. However five years after he made his escape from thence, and under disguise got safe to his own house at Susa, where, by the intercession of his wife, and mother-in-law, he was reinstated in the king's favour, and enjoy'd it till his death, which happen'd some years after in the 76th year of his age. He was ^{Reinstated.} greatly lamented by the king and the whole court, being the best counsellor and ^e greatest general of the whole empire. To him Artaxerxes owed both his life and his crown at his first accession to the government. But it is of dangerous consequence in a subject to have too much obliged his sovereign; for this was the true source of all the misfortunes that befel Megabyzus ¹.

IN the 34th year of the reign of Artaxerxes, a war breaking out between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, commonly called the Peloponnesian war, both parties sent ambassadors to the king, imploring his assistance ¹. But we do not find that Artaxerxes returned them any answer before the seventh year of that war, when he sent an ambassador to the Lacedæmonians named Artapernes, with a letter written in the Assyrian tongue, wherein he told them, that several ambassadors had come to him from them, but the purport of their embassies differed so widely, that he could not comprehend what they requested, and that therefore he had thought proper ^f to send them a Persian to let them know, that if they had any proposals to make, they should send a trusty person along with him, by whom he might be informed what they desired him to do. This ambassador arriving at Eion, on the river Strymon in Thrace, was there taken prisoner by one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet, who sent him to Aibens, where he was treated with the utmost civility and respect, the Athenians being extremely desirous to regain the favour of the king his master ¹. The year following, as soon as the season allowed the Athenians to put to sea, they sent back the ambassador in one of their own ships at the expence ^a of the publick, and appointed some of their citizens to attend him to the court of Perfia with the character of ambassadors. But when they landed at Ephesus, they there received news of the king's death; whereunto the Albenians not thinking it advisable to proceed farther, took their leave of Artabernes, and returned to Albens ^m.

Artaxerxes favoured the Jews above all the kings of Perfia, but what happened to them during his reign we shall relate in the history of that people as in a more proper place. This prince died in the 41st year of his reign, and was succeeded by Xerxes, the only son he had by his queen. But by his concubines he had seventeen, among whom were Sogdianus, or, as Ctesias calls him, Secundianus, Ochus, ^b and Arsites. Xerxes having drank immoderately at a great entertainment, retired to his bed-chamber to refresh himself with sleep after his debauch. This opportunity Sogdianus laid hold of, and being led into the bed-chamber by Pharnacyas one of Xerxes's eunuchs, slew him after he had reigned 45 days, and possessed himself of the kingdom ⁿ.

SCARCE was Sogdianus seated on the throne when he put to death Bagoraxus the most faithful of all his father's eunuchs. He had been appointed to superintend the interment of Artaxerxes, and of the queen, Xerxes's mother, who had died the same day as her royal consort. After he had conveyed both their bodies to the burial-place of the Persian kings, he found on his return Sogdianus in possession of the crown, with whom he had formerly had some small difference. This Sogdianus remembred, and taking for a pretence to quarrel with him something relating to the obsequies of his father, caused him to be stoned to death. By these two murders he became very odious both to the nobility and the army, and being jealous lest some of his brothers might treat him as he had treated Xerxes, he sent for Ochus, whom he chiefly suspected, with a design to murder him the moment he arrived. Ochus had been by his father appointed governor of Hyrcania, and being well apprised of his brother's design, under several pretences put off his coming to court till he had drawn together a powerful army, with which he advanced to the confines of Perfia, openly declaring that he designed to revenge the death of his brother. This decla- ^dration brought over to him many of the nobility and several governors of provinces, who being highly dissatisfied with the cruelty and ill-conduct of Sogdianus, put the Tiara on Ochus's head, and proclaimed him king. Sogdianus seeing himself thus deserted, contrary to the Advice of his best friends, came to an accommodation with Ochus, who having him in his power, caused him to be thrown into ashes (O), where he died a cruel death ^o.

Arsites seeing in what manner Sogdianus had supplanted Xerxes, and had been ^e afterwards driven from the throne by Ochus, began to entertain thoughts of treating Ochus in the same manner. With this design, though he was his brother by the same father and mother, he broke out into an open rebellion against him, being encouraged thereunto, and assisted by Artypbius, the son of Megabyzus. Ochus, whom henceforth we shall call Darius, sent Artasyras, one of his generals against Artypbius,

(O) This punishment was invented for him, and became afterwards common in Perfia. Ochus had sworn that Sogdianus should not die by the sword, by poison or of hunger. To keep his word, he contrived this new sort of punishment; it is described in the 13th chapter of the second book of the Maccabees, thus: An high tower was filled to a certain height with ashes, and the criminal being thrown headlong into them, they were by a wheel perpetually turned round him till he was suffocated. Thus this wicked prince lost his life, and his empire, after he had reigned six months and fifteen days (75).

(P) He is placed in Ptolemy's canon as the immediate successor to Artaxerxes Longimanus according to the stile of that canon, which constantly ascribes to the predecessor the whole year in which he dies, and places him as the next successor, who was on the throne in the beginning of the ensuing year. As the reigns of Xerxes and Sogdianus made up but eight months, and these did not reach to the end of the year, in which Artaxerxes died, they are in the canon cast into the last year of Artaxerxes, and Darius is placed next him as if he had been his immediate successor.

a while he marched in person against his brother Artabazus. Artabazus with the assistance of his Greek mercenaries twice defeated the general who had been sent against him. But these being gained over with large bribes, he lost the third battle; and being reduced to great straits, surrendered himself to Darius, upon hopes given him of mercy. The king was for putting him to death immediately, but was diverted from it by Parysatis his wife and sister. She was daughter to Artaxerxes by another mother, an intriguing and crafty woman; and by her advice the king was entirely governed in affairs of the greatest importance. The counsel she gave him on this occasion was to treat Artabazus with great clemency, that by such usage of a rebellious servant he might the better encourage his brother to throw himself upon his mercy, and then dispose of them both as he pleased. Darius followed her counsel, and had the success he proposed. For Artabazus being informed of the gentle usage Artabazus had met with, concluded that he, as a brother, should be treated at least with the same indulgence and good-nature. Flattered with this hope, he came to an agreement with the king, and surrendered himself into his hands. Darius having him in his power, was very much inclined to pardon him, but was prevailed upon by Parysatis, to put both him and Artabazus to death, by suffocating them in ashes.¹

b He also put to death Parnacius for being concerned in the murder of Xerxes; and Monasthenes, another eunuch, who was the chief favourite of Sogdianus, was condemned to die a cruel death, which he prevented, by laying violent hands on himself. These executions did not procure him the tranquillity he expected: for his whole reign was disturbed with violent commotions raised in various parts of the empire. One of the most dangerous, was that which was stirred up by Pisutnes, governor of Lydia, who setting up for himself raised an army of Greek mercenaries under the command of Lycon, an Athenian. Against him Darius sent Tissaphernes, appointing him at the same time governor of Lydia in his room. Tissaphernes, who was an artful and crafty man, found means of gaining the Greeks who served under Pisutnes, and inducing both them and their general to change sides. Whereupon Pisutnes not being in a condition to carry on the war, surrendered upon promise of pardon. But the king the instant he was brought before him, sentenced him to death, and accordingly he was, pursuant to the king's order, suffocated in ashes. But his death did not put an end to the troubles which he had raised; for his son Amorgas with the remainder of the army still opposed Tissaphernes, and for two years continued to infest the maritime powers of Asia Minor, till he was at length taken prisoner by the Peloponnesians at Iasus, a city of Ionia, and delivered by the inhabitants to Tissaphernes, who put him to death.²

Darius had scarce quelled this rebellion, when he found himself involved in new troubles. His court, and we may say, the whole empire, was governed by the eunuchs, Artaxares, Artibarzanes, and Atibous. These he consulted and followed their advice in all the momentous affairs of the government. But Artaxares was the chief favourite, and nothing was transacted but by his direction. Intoxicated with this power, he began to entertain thoughts of ascending the throne; and accordingly formed a design of cutting off Darius. With this view, that he might not be thought an eunuch, which was a strong objection to his being acknowledged king, he married and wore an artificial beard, giving out that he was not what to that time the Persians had taken him to be. But his wife, who was privy to the whole plot, and perhaps glad to get rid of such a husband, discovered the whole matter to the king. Whereupon he was seized and delivered up to Parysatis, who caused him to be put to a cruel and ignominious death.³

c But the greatest misfortune that befel Darius, during the whole time of his reign, was the revolt of Egypt, which broke out the same year that Pisutnes rebelled. For though Darius got the better of the latter rebellion, yet he could never again reduce Egypt. Amyrtaeus, who had reigned in the reign of Egypt ever since the revolt of Inarus, being apprised of the discontents of the Egyptians, and finding them disposed to enter into any measures for the recovery of their liberty, sailed out of his fens, and being joined by the inhabitants, who flocked to him from all parts, he drove the Persians quite out, and became king of the whole country. Being thus in possession of all Egypt by the total expulsion of the Persians, he resolved to attack them in Phenice too, having the Arabians in confederacy with him for this undertaking. News of this being brought to the court of Persia, the fleet, which the king had equipped with a design to assist the Lacedemonians, was recalled to the defence of his own dominions^a.

Darius's success against the revolted provinces.

WHILE Darius was carrying on a war against the Egyptians and Arabians, the Medes revolted; but being defeated, were forced to return to their former allegiance, and in punishment of their rebellion, reduced to harder subjection than before, as is usually the case^b. Darius seems to have been likewise successful against the Egyptians; for Amyrtaeus being dead, after a reign of six years, his son Pausiris succeeded him, as Herodotus informs us^c, in the kingdom, with the consent of the Persians, which shews that they were masters of Egypt.

Cyrus the younger appointed governor of Asia Minor.

Year of the flood 2592. Before Christ 407.

Darius having thus settled the affairs of Media and Egypt, invested Cyrus his youngest son with the supreme command of all the provinces of Asia Minor. He was a very young man to be intrusted with so much power; for being born after his father's accession to the crown, he could not have been above sixteen years old when he received this important commission. But as he was the darling of his mother Parysatis, who had an absolute sway over the king her husband, she obtained this command for him, with a view to put him in a condition to contend for the crown after his father's death; and this use he accordingly made of it, to the great disturbance of the whole empire, as we shall see hereafter^d. On his receiving his commission, he was ordered to assist the Lacedemonians against the Athenians, contrary to the wise measures observed by Tissaphernes, who by sometimes helping one side, and sometimes the other, had so balanced matters between them, that they continued to harass each other, without being at leisure to disturb the Persians, who had so long been the common enemies of both. This order given, Cyrus soon discovered the weakness of the king's politics. For the Lacedemonians having with the assistance given them by Cyrus, soon overpowered the Athenians, sent first Timbra, and after him Dercyllidas, and at last Agisilaus their king to invade the Persian provinces in Asia, where they made great conquests, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by distributing large sums of money among the demagogues or governors of the Greek cities, found means to rekindle the war in Greece, which obliged the Lacedemonians to recall their troops for their own defence^e.

Sent to assist the Lacedemonians.

Becomes obnoxious to his father.

Cyrus having put to death two noble Persians, sons to a sister of Darius, for no other reason but because they had not, in meeting him, wrapt up their hands in their sleeves, as was customary among the Persians, in the presence of their kings, Darius recalled him to court, on pretence that he was indisposed and desired to see him. Cyrus well knowing how great an ascendant his mother had over the king, prepared for his journey; but before he set out, he ordered such large subsidies to be sent to Lyfander, general of the Lacedemonians, as enabled him to gain that memorable victory over the Athenians at the Goats-river on the Hellepont, which put an end to the Athenian power, and the Peloponnesian war after it had lasted twenty-seven years^f. Darius was highly incensed against Cyrus, not only on account of the death of his two nephews, but because he had presumed to challenge honours that were due only to the king; and therefore designed to deprive him of his government. But upon his arrival, the queen not only reconciled his father to him, but used all her art to have him declared heir to the crown, by reason he was born after his father's accession to the throne, which had given the preference to Xerxes in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. Darius could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with her request; but however bequeathed him the government of those provinces which he ruled before. Not long after Darius Nothus died after he had reigned nineteen years, and was succeeded by Artaxerxes, his eldest son by Parysatis, who on his ascending the throne, took the name of Artaxerxes, and was for his extraordinary memory called by the Greeks, Mnemon, that is, rememberer^g. While he was attending his father on his death-bed, he desired to be informed by what art he had so happily managed the government, that by following the same rule, he might be blessed with the like success. The dying king gave him this memorable answer, that he had ever done, to the best of his knowledge, what religion and justice required, without swerving from the one or the other^h.

Artaxerxes was no sooner settled on the throne but Statira his queen, whom he was very fond of on account of her extraordinary beauty, employed her power with him to the utter ruin of Udiastes, who had killed her brother Teriteuchmes. This

b quarrel had its rise in the reign of Darius, and the whole was a complication of adultery, incest, and murder, which raised great disturbances in the royal family, and ended in the ruin of all who were concerned in it. Statira was daughter to Hidarnes, a Persian lord, and governor of one of the chief provinces of the empire. Artaxerxes, then called Arfaces, falling in love with her, married her; and at the same time Teriteuchmes her brother married Hamestris, one of the daughters of Darius, and sister to Arfaces, by reason of which marriage he was appointed on his father's death to succeed him in his government. But falling in love with his own sister Roxana, no ways inferior in beauty to Statira, that he might without any constraint enjoy her, he resolved to dispatch his wife Hamestris, and raise a rebellion in c the kingdom. Darius being acquainted with his wicked designs, engaged Udiastes, an intimate friend of Teriteuchmes, to murder him, which he did accordingly, and was rewarded by the king with the government of his province. Mitbridates, the son of Udiastes, who was one of Teriteuchmes's guards, and greatly attached to his master, hearing that his father had committed this murder, uttered all manner of imprecations against him; and to shew his abhorrence of so vile an action, seized on the city of Zaris, and openly revolting, declared for the son of Teriteuchmes. Mitbridates was by the king's forces blocked up in the city of Zaris, and with him the son of Teriteuchmes: All the rest of the family of Hidarnes were apprehended and delivered to Parysatis, to execute her revenge upon them for the ill usage done or d intended against her daughter. That cruel princess began with Roxana, whose beauty had been the occasion of all this mischief, and caused her to be sawed in two. The others were all beheaded, except Statira, whom she spared at the earnest intreaties and thro' the importunate tears of her husband Arfaces, contrary to the opinion of Darius, who told her that she would afterwards have occasion to repent it. Thus the case stood at the death of Darius. But Arfaces was no sooner settled on the throne than Statira prevailed upon him to deliver Udiastes into her hands; whereupon she caused his tongue to be drawn out at his neck, and made him die in the most exquisite torments she could invent, in revenge of the part he had acted in the ruin of her family. His son Mitbridates she appointed governor of his province, for the attachment he had shewn to Teriteuchmes. But Parysatis bitterly resenting this fact, poisoned the son of Teriteuchmes, and not long after Statira herself, as we shall hereafter relate ^b.

e Cyrus returning to his government of Asia Minor full of resentment for the sentence of death, which his brother had pronounced against him, resolved to revolt, and use his utmost endeavours to drive him from the throne. With this view he employed Clarchus, a Lacedæmonian general, to raise a body of Greek troops for his service, under pretence of a war which the Lacedæmonians were to carry into Thrace. Alcibiades the Athenian being well apprised of the true end for which these levies were made, passed over into the province of Pharnabazus with a design to proceed from thence to the Persian court, and acquaint Artaxerxes with the whole scheme. Had he arrived there, a discovery of such importance had without all doubt procured him the favour of that prince, and the assistance he wanted for the re-establishment of his country. But the partisans of the Lacedæmonians at Athens, that is the thirty tyrants, fearing the negotiations of so superior a genius, found means to induce Pharnabazus to put him to death; whereby the Athenians lost the great hopes they had conceived of speedily recovering their former state ^c.

phernes, assembled troops openly; and to amuse the court more speciously, made a grievous complaints to the king against that governor, demanding his protection and assistance in the most submissive manner. Artaxerxes, being deceived by these appearances, believed that all Cyrus's preparations were designed only against Tissaphernes, and not being displeased that they should be at variance with each other, suffered him to raise what forces he pleased ^a.

THE young prince lost no time on his side, and hastened the execution of his great design. As he had assisted the Lacedæmonians against the Athenians, and put them in a condition of gaining those victories which made them masters of Greece, he thought he might safely disclose to them his design, and ask their assistance for the accomplishing of it. The Lacedæmonians readily granted him his demand, dispatching immediately orders to their fleet to join that of the prince, and to obey in all things the command of Tamos his admiral. But they took care not to mention Artaxerxes, pretending not to be privy to the designs that were carrying on against him. This precaution they used, that in case Artaxerxes should get the better of his brother, they might justify themselves to him for what they had done ^a.

THE army which Cyrus had raised consisted of 13000 Greeks, who were the flower of his army, and 100,000 regular troops of other nations. Clearchus the Lacedæmonian commanded all the Peloponnesian troops, except the Acheans, who were led by Socrates of Achaia. The Boeotians were under Proxenes a Theban, and the Thessalians under Menon. The other nations were commanded by Persian generals, of whom the chief was Ariæus. The fleet consisted of 35 ships under Pythagoras a Lacedæmonian, and 25 commanded by Tamos an Egyptian, admiral of the whole fleet ^f. Cyrus opened his design to none of the Greeks except Clearchus, fearing the boldness of the enterprise might discourage the officers as well as the soldiers. Proxenes, between whose family and Xenophon's an ancient friendship subsisted, presented that young Athenian to Cyrus, who received him favourably, and gave him a commission among the Greek mercenaries ^a. Cyrus, having at length got all things ready, set out from Sardis, directing his march towards the upper parts of Asia, the troops neither knowing where, nor in what war, they were to be employ'd; for Cyrus had only given out that he was marching against the Pisidians, who with frequent incursions harassed his province. However, Tissaphernes judging these preparations to be too great for so small an enterprise, set out with all possible expedition from Miletus to give the king a true account of them. Artaxerxes being now well apprised of his brother's designs, assembled a numerous army to receive him. In the mean time Cyrus advancing with long marches arrived at the straits of Cilicia, where he found Syennesis, king of that country, prepared to dispute his passage; wherein he would have easily succeeded, had he not been obliged to abandon that important pass to defend his own territories against Tamos and the Lacedæmonian fleet which appeared upon the coasts ^a.

Clearchus.

WHEN they arrived at Tarsus the Greeks refused to proceed any farther, suspecting that they were marching against the king, and protesting that they did not enter into the service upon that condition. Clearchus at first made use of his authority to quell the tumult, but with very ill success; and therefore, desisting from force, he pretended to enter into their views, and advised them to send deputies to Cyrus to know from his own mouth against whom they were to be employed. By this artful evasion he appeased the tumult, and was himself chosen for one of the deputies. Cyrus, whom he had acquainted before-hand with what had happened, answered, that he was going to attack Abrocomas, who was at twelve days march distance, encamped on the banks of the Euphrates. The Greeks plainly saw that this was not his true design, but nevertheless shewed themselves willing to proceed, on condition that their pay was increased. This Cyrus willingly granted, and having gained their affections during the march by treating them with extraordinary kindness and humanity, he at last declared that he marched against Artaxerxes. Upon this some complaints were heard at first, but they soon gave way to expressions of joy and satisfaction, occasioned by that prince's magnificent promises to the army ⁱ.

- a Cyrus arriving, after a long march, in the plains of Cunaxa in the province of Babylon, found there Artaxerxes with an army of 900,000 men ready to engage him. Whereupon, leaping out of his chariot he ordered his troops to stand to their arms, and fall into their ranks, which was done with great expedition, he not allowing them time to refresh themselves. Clarchus advised Cyrus not to charge in person, but to remain in the rear of the Greek battalions. This advice Cyrus rejected with indignation, saying that he would not render himself unworthy of the crown for which he was fighting. As the king's army drew near, the Greeks fell upon them with such fury, that the wing opposite to them was at the very first or set put to flight; whereupon Cyrus was, with loud shouts of joy, proclaimed king by those who stood round him. But he, in the mean time, perceiving that Artaxerxes was wheeling about to attack him in flank, advanced against him with 600 chosen horse, killed Artagerfes, captain of the king's guards, with his own hand, and put the whole body to flight. In this encounter discovering his brother, he cried out, I see him, and spurring on his horse engaged him with great resolution, which in some degree turned the battle into a single combat, each of the two brothers endeavouring to assure himself of the crown by the death of his rival. Cyrus killed his brother's horse, and wounded him on the ground; but he immediately mounted another, when Cyrus attacked him again, gave him a second wound, and had already lifted up his hand to give him a third, which the king's guards observing, they all discharged their arrows, aiming at him alone, and he at the same time throwing himself headlong upon the king, was run through by his javelin, and pierced with innumerable arrows. He fell dead upon the spot; and all the chief lords of his court, resolving not to survive their master, were killed in the place where he fell: A certain proof, says Kenophon, that he well knew how to chuse his friends, and that he was truly beloved by them. Some writers tell us, that Cyrus was killed by a Carian soldier. Mitbridates, a young Persian nobleman, boasted that he had given him the mortal blow with his javelin, which entered his temple, and pierced his head quite through. Artaxerxes, after having caused his head and right hand to be cut off, pursued the enemy to their camp, and there possessed himself of great part of their baggage and provisions. The Greeks had defeated the king's left wing commanded by Tissaphernes, and the king's right wing, commanded by himself, had routed the enemies left; and as neither knew what had happened elsewhere, both parties believed they had gained the day. But Tissaphernes acquainting the king that his men had been put to flight by the Greeks, he immediately rallied his troops in order to attack them. The Greeks, under the command of Clarchus, easily repulsed them, and pursued them to the neighbouring hills. As night was drawing near, the Greeks halted at the foot of the hill, much surprized that neither Cyrus himself nor any messenger from him appeared; for they yet knew nothing of his death, or the defeat of the rest of the army. They determined therefore to return to their camp, which they did accordingly; but found there that the greatest part of their baggage had been plundered, and all their provisions taken, which obliged them to pass the night in the camp without any sort of refreshment. The next morning as they were still expecting to hear from Cyrus, they received the sad news of his death, and the defeat of that part of the army. Whereupon they sent deputies to Ariæus, who had retired to the place whence they had marched the day before the action, offering him, as conquerors, the crown of Persia in the room of Cyrus. Ariæus rejected the offer, and acquainted them, that he intended to set out early the next morning on his return to Ionis, advising them to join him in the night. They followed his directions, and under the conduct of Clarchus began their march, and arrived at his camp about midnight, whence they set out on their return to Greece *. They were at a vast distance from their own country, in the very heart of the Persian empire, surrounded by a numerous and conquering army, and had no way to return again into Greece but by forcing their retreat through an immense tract of the enemies country. But their valour and resolution mastered all these difficulties; and in spite of a powerful army, which pursued and harassed them all the way, they made a retreat of 2325 miles through provinces belonging to the enemy, and got safe to the Greek cities on the Euxine sea. This was the longest march, and most memorable retreat, that ever was made through an enemy's country. Clarchus had the conduct of it first, but he being cut off by the treachery of Tissaphernes, Xenophon was chosen in his room, and to his valour and wisdom it was chiefly owing that at length they got safe into Greece. As he believed that he had killed Cyrus with his own hand, and looked upon that as the most glorious action of his own life, to dispute that honour with him was wounding him in the most tender part. Being therefore informed that the Carian foldier, whom we have mentioned above, laid claim to that glory, he caused him to be delivered to Parysatis, who had sworn the destruction of all those who were in any ways concerned in the death of her son. She made that unhappy wretch suffer the most exquisite torments she could invent during ten days, and then put him to a most cruel death. Mithridates likewise having boasted that it was he who gave Cyrus his mortal wound, was treated in the manner we have described, where we spoke of the punishments used among the Persians †. Masabates, one of the king's eunuchs, who by his order had cut off the head and hand of Cyrus, being delivered to Parysatis, was flea'd alive, and his skin stretched before his eyes upon two stakes prepared for that purpose. Nor did the cruelty and resentment of Parysatis stop here; for having conceived an implacable hatred against Statira for reproaching her, as if she had countenanced her son Cyrus's revolt against his brother, that revengeful woman poisoned her own daughter-in-law in the following manner. Parysatis, feigning to be reconciled to her, invited her one night to supper, and a certain bird being served up, which was a great rarity among the Persians, she divided it between Statira and herself with a knife, which was poisoned on one side only: The sound part she immediately eat, which encouraged Statira, though upon her guard, to eat the other; whereupon she was that instant seized with horrible convulsions, and died in a few hours. Artaxerxes being greatly afflicted for the loss of his beloved wife, and suspecting his mother, caused all her domesticks to be put to the rack, when Gygis one of her confidants discovered the whole. Artaxerxes caused Gygis, who was privy to the crime, to be put to a cruel death, and confined his mother to Babylon, telling her that he would never set his foot within the gates of that city while she was there; but at length time having alleviated his grief, he allowed her to return to court, where, by an entire submission to his will, she regained his favour, and bore a great sway at court to her death †.

success against Tissaphernes.

AFTER the death of Cyrus, Tissaphernes being sent back to his former government, and moreover invested with the same power which had been given to Cyrus, he began to harass and oppress the Greek cities that were within the verge of his authority, and had sided with that unfortunate prince. Whereupon they sent ambassadors to the Lacedæmonians, imploring their assistance and protection. The Lacedæmonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Atbenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Persians, and sent Thimbro with an army against them, which being strengthened by the conjunction of those forces that Xenophon brought back from Persia, they took the field against Tissaphernes. But Thimbro being soon recalled upon some complaints, and sent into banishment, Dercyllidas was appointed to succeed him. As he was both a brave general and a famous engineer, he was attended with far better success than his predecessor. Upon his first arrival finding that Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, governors of the two neighbouring provinces, were at variance with each other, he made a truce with the former, and marching against the latter with all his forces drove him quite out of Æolis, and several cities of other provinces. Pharnabazus fearing he might invade Phrygia, the chief province of his government, was glad to make a truce with him, leaving him in possession of what he had taken. Upon this truce he marched into Bithynia, where he took up his winter-quarters to avoid being chargeable to his allies. At the same time Pharnabazus took a journey to the Persian court, and there made loud complaints against Tissaphernes for concluding a peace with Dercyllidas, instead of assisting him against the common enemy. He likewise earnestly pressed the king to equip a great fleet, and appoint Conon the Atbenian, then an exile in Cyprus, admiral, telling him that as Conon was the best

- a sea commander of his time, he might by that means obstruct the passage of all farther recruits from Greece, and soon put an end to the power of the Lacedæmonians in Asia. His proposal was approved of by the king, who immediately ordered 500 talents to be paid him for the equipment of a fleet with instructions to give Conon the command of it ^{a Persian fleet put under Conon's command.}.

- In the mean time Dercyllidas, having reduced Atarna, marched into Caria, where Tissaphernes usually resided. For the Lacedæmonians believing, that if he were attacked there, he would comply with all their demands in order to save that province, had sent Dercyllidas express orders to march thither. This Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus no sooner heard, but they united against Dercyllidas, whom they came up to within so disadvantageous a post, that had they charged him immediately, he must inevitably have perished. Pharnabazus was for attacking him, but Tissaphernes, who at the battle of Cunaxa had experienced their valour, could not be brought to venture an engagement; but sent heralds to Dercyllidas to invite him to a parley, in which proposals for a peace being offered on both sides, they made a truce till the answer of their respective masters should be known. Thus Dercyllidas and his army were saved from utter destruction, through the cowardice of his enemy, when nothing else could have delivered them ^{Dercyllidas's narrow escape.}.

- In the mean time the Lacedæmonians receiving accounts from Asia, that the king of Persia was equipping a powerful fleet on the coasts of Phænice, Syria and Cilicia, and supposing it to be designed, as it truly was, against them, resolved to send Agésilas, one of their kings into Asia, in order to make a diversion. All things being ready for this expedition, Agésilas set sail with a considerable body of troops, and arrived at Ephesus before any of the king's officers had the least intimation of this design; with such secrecy and expedition was the whole managed at Sparta. Agésilas upon his arrival took the field with 10,000 foot, and 4000 horse, and, finding no body in a condition to oppose him, carried all before him. Whereupon Tissaphernes sent a messenger to enquire for what end he was come into Asia, and why he had taken up arms. Agésilas replied, that he was come to assist the Greeks inhabiting Asia and restore them to their ancient liberty. Tissaphernes, being quite unprepared for a war, assured Agésilas that his master would grant him what he demanded, provided he committed no acts of hostility till the return of an express which he had sent to court. Agésilas believed him, and a truce was agreed on and sworn to on both sides. But Tissaphernes, without any regard to his oath, made no other use of this truce than to assemble troops on all sides, and sent to the king for more forces, and as soon as he received them, he sent word to Agésilas to depart Asia, denouncing war against him in case of refusal. This message greatly alarmed the Lacedæmonians and their confederates, as not believing themselves in a condition to oppose the now numerous army of Tissaphernes, who had been joined by auxiliaries from all parts of the Persian empire. As for Agésilas himself, he heard Tissaphernes's heralds with a gay and easy air, and desired them to tell their master, that he was under great obligations to him for having made the gods by his perjury enemies to Persia and friends to Greece. Having with this answer dismissed the heralds, he drew all his forces together, and made a feint as if he intended to invade Caria; but as soon as he understood, that Tissaphernes had caused all his troops to march into that province, he turned short and fell upon Phrygia. As his coming thither was wholly unexpected, he over-ran great part of the province without any opposition, took many towns, and loaded with an immense booty marched back by the sea-coast into Ionis and wintered at Ephesus ^{Year of the flood 2603. Before Christ 396. His army, and success there.}.

- EARLY in the spring Agésilas took the field, and gave out that his design was to invade Lydia. But Tissaphernes, who had not forgot the stratagem of the former campaign, took it for granted, that he now truly intended to fall upon Caria, and accordingly made his troops march to the defence of that province. But Agésilas led his army, as he had given out, into Lydia, and approached Sardis. Whereupon Tissaphernes recalled his forces from their former rout, with a design to relieve the place. But Caria being a very mountainous country and unfit for horse, he had marched thither only with the foot, and left the horse behind on the borders of that province. Whence on their marching back to the relief of Sardis the horse being some days marches before the foot, Agésilas took the advantage of so favour. ^{Over-reached by Tissaphernes. able an opportunity, and fell upon them before the foot could come up to their assistance. The Persians were routed at the very first onset, and Agefilas, becoming by this victory master of the field, over-ran the whole country, and enriched both himself and his army with the spoils of the conquered Persians ^a.

Conon.

THE loss of this battle greatly incensed the king against Tissaphernes, and increased the suspicion which he had before conceived of him, as if he had something else in view besides his master's interest. At the same time Conon arriving at the Persian court heightened the king's displeasure with new complaints against him; for he had deprived the soldiers on board Conon's fleet of their pay, and thereby disabled him from doing the king any service. Queen Parysatis, actuated by an irreconcilable hatred against all those who had any share in the death of her son Cyrus, did not fail on this occasion to aggravate the charges brought against him. Hereupon the king resolved to put him to death, but being afraid to attack him openly by reason of the great authority he had in Asia, he charged Titbraustes, captain of the guards, with that important commission, giving him at the same time two letters; the one directed to Tissaphernes, and empowering him to pursue the war against the Greeks in what manner he thought best; the other was addressed to Arius governor of Larissa, commanding him to assist Titbraustes with his counsel and all his forces in seizing Tissaphernes. Upon the receipt of this letter Arius desired Tissaphernes to come to him, that they might confer together about the operations of the ensuing campaign. Tissaphernes, who suspected nothing, went to him with a guard only of 300 men. But while he was bathing, according to the Persian custom, and disarmed, he was seized and put into the hands of Titbraustes, who caused his head to be struck off and sent into Persia. The king gave it to Parysatis, an acceptable present to one of her revengeful temper ^b.

death.

UPON the death of Tissaphernes, Titbraustes, who was appointed to succeed him, sent great presents to Agefilas, telling him, that the cause of the war being removed, and the first author of all their differences put to death, nothing could prevent an accommodation; that the king his master would allow the Greek cities in Asia to enjoy their liberty, paying him the customary tribute, which was all that the Lacedæmonians required when they first began the war. Agefilas replied, that he could not come to any agreement without orders from Sparta. However as he was willing to give Titbraustes the satisfaction of removing out of his province, he marched into Pbrygia, which was the province of Pbarnabazus, Titbraustes paying him thirty talents to defray the charges of his march. Upon his march he received a letter from the magistrates of Sparta, giving him the command of the fleet as well as of the land-forces. By this new commission he was appointed sole commander of all the troops in Asia both by sea and land. This drew him down to the sea-coast, where he put the fleet in good order, and appointed Pisander, his wife's brother, admiral, ordering him forthwith to put to sea. In this he was more influenced by private affection for his brother-in-law, than by the due regard he ought to have had for the publick good; for though Pisander was a man of great courage and valour, yet he was not in other respects equal to that trust, as the event sufficiently proved ^c.

made chief commander by

Agefilas having settled the maritime affairs pursued his design of invading Pbrygia, where he reduced many cities, and amassed great sums of money, maintaining his army on the territories of Pbarnabazus in great affluence. From thence he marched into Papblagonia, being invited thither by Spitbridates a noble Persian who had revolted from the king. There he concluded a league with Cotys king of that country, and returning into Pbrygia took the strong city of Dascylium, and wintered there in the palace of Pbarnabazus, obliging the adjacent countries to supply his army with all sorts of provisions ^d. Titbraustes finding that Agefilas was for carrying on the war in Asia, sent Timocrates of Rhodes into Greece with large sums of money to corrupt the leading men in their cities, and rekindle a war against the Lacedæmonians. This stratagem produced the intended effect, for the cities of Thebes, Argos, Corinth, and others entering into confederacy, obliged the Lacedæmonians to recall their king, as we shall see in its proper place. a expatiating on the services he had done the Lacedemonians in their war with the Athenians, reproached them with ingratitude in the bitterest terms, since in return for so many favours they had pillaged his palace, and ravaged his lands at Dascylium, which were his hereditary estate. As what he had said was true, Agefilus and the Lacedemonians, that attended him, were to such a degree ashamed in seeing themselves so justly upbraided with ingratitude, that they knew not what to answer; nor how to excuse such an ungenerous proceeding. However, to make him the best amends they could; they obliged themselves by a solemn promise not to invade any of the provinces under his government, so long as there were others into which they might carry the war against the Persian king. They were as good as their word, and immediately withdrew with a design to invade the upper parts of Asia, and prosecute the war in the very heart of the Persian empire. But while Agefilus was projecting this expedition, a messenger arrived at the camp from Sparta, acquainting him that the Ephori recalled him to defend his own country, against which several states of Greece had formed a strong confederacy. He readily complied with this order and made all the haste thither he could, but complained at his departure, that the Persians had driven him out of Asia with 30,000 archers, alluding to the Persian Darics, which were pieces of gold stamped on one side with the figure of an archer.

Conon on his return from the Persian court having brought money enough to pay the soldiers and mariners their arrears, and supply the fleet with arms and provisions, took Pharnabazus on board, and forthwith set sail in quest of the enemies. The Persian fleet consisted of 90 vessels and upwards; that of the Lacedemonians was not so numerous, but their ships were larger. They came in view of each other near Cnidus, a maritime city of Asia Minor. Conon, who had in some measure occasioned the taking of Athens by losing the sea-fight at Egospotamos, or the Goats river, was determined to use his utmost efforts in order to retrieve that misfortune, and efface by a glorious victory the disgrace of his former defeat. On the other hand Pisander was desirous to justify by his conduct and valour the choice with Agefilus his brother-in-law had made in appointing him admiral. In effect he behaved with extraordinary courage, and had at first some advantage. But Conon having boarded his ship and killed him with his own hand, the rest of the fleet betook themselves to flight. Conon pursued them, took fifty of their ships, and having gained a complete victory put an end to the power of the Lacedemonians in those parts. The consequence of this victory was a general revolt of all the allies of Sparta; some declaring for the Athenians, and others resuming their ancient liberty. After this battle the empire of the Lacedemonians declined daily, till at length the overthrows, which they received at Leuctra and Mantineæ, completed their downfall.

The Lacedemonians defeated at Cnidus.

At this victory Conon and Pharnabazus being masters at sea sailed round the islands and coasts of Asia, reducing the cities, which in those parts were subject to the Lacedemonians. Sestos and Abydos were the only two cities that held out against them. Pharnabazus attacked them by land, and Conon by sea; but neither succeeding in the attempt, the former on the approach of winter retired home, leaving Conon to take care of the fleet, and strengthen it with as many ships as he could assemble from the cities on the Hellepont against the ensuing spring.

Conon and Pharnabazus' success against the Asiatic islands.

Conon having assembled, pursuant to his commission, a powerful fleet against the time appointed, he took Pharnabazus again on board, and steering his course thro' the islands, landed in Melos the most distant of them all. Having reduced this island, as lying very convenient for the invading of Laconia, the country of the Lacedemonians, he made from thence a descent on the coasts of that province, pillaged all the maritime places, and loaded his fleet with an immense booty. After this Pharnabazus returning to his government of Phrygia, Conon obtained leave of him to repair to Athens with 80 ships, and 50 talents, in order to rebuild the walls of that city, having first convinced him that nothing could more effectually contribute to the weakening of Sparta, than putting Athens again in a condition to rival its power. He no sooner arrived at Piræus, the port of Athens, but he began the work, which, as he had a great number of hands, and was seconded by the zeal of all those that were well inclined to the Athenians, was soon completed, and the city not only restored to its former splendor, but rendered more formidable than ever to its enemies. Thus Athens was rebuilt by the Persians, who had destroyed a it, and fortified at the expence, and with the spoils of the Lacedæmonians, who had dismantled it. Conon having rebuilt the walls of the city, of the port, and those which led from the former to the latter, and were called the Long-walls, he distributed the 50 talents, which he had received of Pharnabazus among his citizens, and offered the gods a sacrifice of an hundred oxen in thanksgiving for the happy re-establishment of his native country ^r.

sent to make peace with Artaxerxes.

THE Lacedæmonians could not behold without great concern so glorious a revolution, and finding themselves unable to maintain a war with men as brave as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia, dispatched Antalcidas one of their citizens to Tiribazus, governor of Sardis, enjoining him to conclude a peace with b Artaxerxes upon the most advantageous terms he could. The other cities of Greece in alliance with the Athenians sent at the same time their deputies, and Conon was at the head of those from Athens. The terms, which Antalcidas proposed, were, that the king should possess all the Greek cities in Asia; but the islands and other cities in Greece should enjoy their liberty, and be governed by their own laws. As these proposals were very advantageous to the king, and dishonourable to the Greeks in general, the other ambassadors were all unanimous in rejecting them. The Lacedæmonians bearing an implacable hatred to Conon for the restoring of Athens, had charged Antalcidas to accuse him to Tiribazus of having purloined the king's money for the carrying on of that work, and of having formed a design for the taking of c Æolis and Ionis from the Persians, and uniting them anew to the republick of Athens. Upon these accusations Tiribazus seized him, and having supplied the Lacedæmonians underhand with considerable sums of money for the equipping of a fleet against the Athenians, set out for the Persian court to give the king an account of his negotiations. Artaxerxes was well pleased with the terms, which the Lacedæmonians had proposed, and directed him to put the last hand to the treaty. At the same time Conon accused Tiribazus laid before the king the accusations, which the Lacedæmonians had brought d against Conon. Whereupon he was, according to some writers ^s, sent to Susa and there put to death by the king's command; but the silence of Xenophon, who was his contemporary, as to his death, makes us doubt of the truth of this event ^t.

WHILE Tiribazus was attending the court, Sutras was charged to guard the coasts of Asia in his absence. On this occasion observing the havoc, which the Lacedæmonians had made in all the maritime provinces, he conceived such an aversion to them, that he sent what supplies he could spare to their enemies the Athenians. This obliged the Lacedæmonians to send Thymbro into Asia to renew the war there; but as they were not in a condition to supply him with men or money sufficient for such an undertaking, he was soon cut off, and his army dispersed by the superior power of the Persians. Diphridas was sent in his room to carry on the war with the scattered remains of his army; but was attended with no better success, all their attempts upon Asia after the battle of Cnidus being but faint struggles of a declining power. In the mean time Tiribazus returning from Susa summoned all the deputies of the Greek cities to be present at the reading of the treaty, which had been already approved of by the king. The terms were; that all the Greek cities in Asia should be subject to the king of Persia, and besides, the islands of Cyprus and Clazomena; that the islands of Scyros, Lemnos and Imbros should be restored to the Athenians; and all the cities of Greece, whether small or great, should be declared free. By the same treaty Artaxerxes engaged to join those who accepted the terms he proposed, and assist them to the utmost of his power against such as should reject them. These conditions were equally disadvantageous and dishonourable to the Grecian name; however, as Greece was extremely weakened and exhausted by domestick divisions, and therefore no ways in a condition to carry on a war against so powerful a prince, they were all forced to swear to the treaty. This is called the peace of Antalcidas, for he was the first that proposed it, giving up to the Persians with the utmost injustice and baseness all the Greeks settled in Asia, for whose liberty Agésilas had so long contended ^u.

Artaxerxes being now quite disengaged from the Grecian war, turned his whole power against Evagoras king of Cyprus, whom he had long before designed to

- drive out of that island, but had never been at leisure to put his design in execution. Artaxerxes bends all his forces against Evagoras.
- Evagoras* was descended from the ancient kings of Salamine, the capital city of the island of Cyprus. His ancestors had held that city for many ages in quality of sovereigns; but were at last driven out by the Persians, who making themselves masters of the whole island, reduced it to a Persian province. Evagoras, who was a man of extraordinary parts, not brooking to live in subjection to a foreign yoke, expelled Abdymon a Citian, governor of Salamine, for the king of Persia, and took possession of his paternal kingdom. Artaxerxes attempted to recover that city, but being diverted by the Greek war, and finding Evagoras determined to hold out to the last, gave over, or rather put off, that enterprize. In the mean time Canon by means of
- Ctesias* the Cnidian, who was chief physician to Artaxerxes, made up all differences between Evagoras and Artaxerxes, the latter promising not to molest him in the possession of his small kingdom. But Evagoras, who was every way qualified for great undertakings, could not content himself with the city of Salamine alone. He extended his dominions, and by degrees made himself master in a manner of the whole island of Cyprus. The Amathusians, Solians and Citians alone of those Islanders held out against him. These had recourse to Artaxerxes, who becoming jealous of the power of this active and wise prince, promised them an immediate and powerful support. But being employed elsewhere, he could not perform his promise so soon as he expected. Having at length concluded a peace with the Greeks, he bent all his force against Evagoras, determined to drive him quite out of the island. The
- Athenians*, notwithstanding the treaty of peace lately made with the Persians, and the many favours received at their king's hands, could not forbear assisting their old ally, who had befriended them on all occasions. Having therefore equipped ten men of war, they sent them with all possible expedition under the command of Philocrates to assist him. But the Lacedæmonian fleet commanded by Telaucias, brother to Agessilaus, falling in with them near the isle of Rhodes, furrounded them so that not one ship could escape. The Athenians, determined to assist Evagoras at all adventures, sent Chabrias with another fleet and a considerable number of land-forces on board to join him. This new supply arrived safe, and in a short time obliged the
- whole island to submit to Evagoras. But the Athenians being forced by the articles of a new treaty, concluded between Artaxerxes and the cities of Greece, to recall Chabrias, the Persians attacked with all their forces the island of Cyprus, not doubting but they should soon reduce it, since no supplies could be sent thither from Greece. The king's army consisted of 300,000 men, and his fleet of 300 ships. The land-forces were commanded by Orontes son-in-law to Artaxerxes, and the fleet by Gaus the son of Tamus, whom we have mentioned above. Tiribazus was commander in chief both of the sea and land-forces. Evagoras seeing himself threatened with so dreadful a war, had recourse to all those princes, who were at enmity with the Persians, receiving supplies both of men and money from the Egyptians, Lybians, Arabians, Tyrians, and other nations. Besides, as he had amassed immense treasures, he hired a great - number of mercenaries of various nations. As he had about 90 ships, that is 70 of his own, and 20 from Tyre, he still intercepted all the enemies ships that brought provisions from the continent, and thereby reduced their numerous army, after their landing in the island, to such straits, that they began to mutiny, and killed several of their officers. But the whole Persian fleet putting to sea, the army was again plentifully supplied from Cilicia. At the same time Evagoras likewise received a great supply of corn, and fifty ships from Egypt, which together with those he had already, and 60 more which he caused to be fitted out with all speed, and those which he received from Egypt, making up a fleet of 200 sail, he advanced to attack the whole naval force of the Persians. At first he had the advantage, and took or destroyed several of the enemies ships; but Gaus advancing with a few ships, attacked him with such vigour, that Evagoras was obliged to retire after an obstinate resistance. The rest of the Persian fleet being encouraged by the example of their admiral, returned to the charge, and at last obtained a compleat victory, driving the enemies ships into their harbours. Evagoras with a few ships escaped to Salamine, where he was immediately closely besieged both by sea and land. After this victory Tiribazus went in person to acquaint the king with the success that attended his arms in Cyprus, and having obtained 2000 talents for the use of the army, he returned with that new supply to carry on the war more vigorously than ever. During his absence, Evagoras, leaving the defence of the city to his son Pythagoras, got through the enemies fleet in the dead of the night with ten ships and sailed for Egypt, in hopes of engaging Achoris, king of that country, to join with him with all his forces. But not obtaining from him the aid he expected, and finding on his return the city reduced to the last extremities, and himself destitute of all means of raising the siege, he was obliged to capitulate. The proposals made to him were; that he should abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamine, which he should hold of the king as a servant of his lord, and pay an annual tribute. The extremity to which he was reduced obliged him to accept the other conditions, hard as they were; but he could by no means be brought to consent to that of holding Salamine as a servant under his master, and persisted in declaring that he would hold it no otherwise than as a king under a king. Tiribazus, who commanded in chief, would not make the least alteration, nor abate any thing of his pretensions; whereupon Evagoras, being determined to die sword in hand rather than yield to such terms, broke off the conference, and applied himself intirely to the defence of the city^a.

better treaty
from Orontes.

In the mean time Orontes, who commanded the land-forces, not being able to brook the superiority with Tiribazus had over him, as being intrusted with the whole management of the war, and jealous of the success that attended him, wrote secretly to court accusing him amongst other things of forming designs against the king's interest, and holding a private correspondence with the Lacedæmonians. Upon the receipt of these letters Artaxerxes immediately dispatched orders to Orontes to seize Tiribazus and send him prisoner to court, which being without delay put in execution (P), the chief command was conferred upon Orontes. Orontes finding the army ready to mutiny under his command, made haste to conclude a treaty with Evagoras upon the terms which Tiribazus had rejected, viz. that he should hold Salamine as king of that city, paying only a small tribute to the king of Persia. Thus the siege was raised, and a peace concluded with Evagoras after a war which had cost the Persians above 50,000 talents, that is, near ten millions of our money. For the elogy and character of this prince we refer the reader to Isocrates^e.

The peace concluded with Evagoras did not put an end to the war in those parts. For Gaus resenting the unjust usage of Tiribazus, whose daughter he had married, and fearing to be involved in the same prosecution with his father-in-law, and put to death on bare suspicions, sent deputies to Achoris king of Egypt, and having concluded an alliance with him against the king of Persia, openly revolted and was joined by a great part both of the fleet and army, most of the officers being intirely at his devotion. He likewise solicited the Lacedæmonians to come into the league, assuring them that he in his turn would, at the end of the war, employ all his forces in their favour, and make them masters of all Greece. They hearkened favourably to these proposals, and embraced with joy such an opportunity of making war upon the Persians, being highly dissatisfied with the peace of Antalcidas. But before matters were ripe for execution Gaus was treacherously slain by one of his own officers, and Tachis, who took upon him to carry on the same design, soon died; whereby the vast preparations they had made came to nothing; and the Lacedæmonians never afterwards meddled with the affairs of Asia^f.

Artaxerxes had no sooner finished the Cyprian war, but he entered upon another against the Cadusians, who probably had revolted from him. This people inhabited the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian seas, and being from their infancy inured to a hard and laborious life were accounted a very warlike race. The king marched in person against them at the head of 300,000 foot, and 20,000 horse. But the country by reason of its barrenness not affording provisions sufficient to maintain so numerous an army, they were soon reduced to feed upon the beasts of burden, which accompany the army; and these became so scarce, that an ass's head was sold for 60 drachma's. The king's provisions too began to fall short, and only a few horses remained. In this sad posture of affairs Tiribazus contrived a stratagem which saved the king and the army. He followed the court in this expedition, or rather was

(P) Orontes, it seems, dreading his power with the army, was forced to catch him by a stratagem; that is, by inviting him to a private interview, and placing him upon the entrance of a deep cave, the mouth of which was covered with some rich tape-

- a. carried about as a prisoner, being in disgrace by reason of the crimes laid to his charge by Orontes, as we have said above. The Cadusians had two kings, who were incamped apart from each other. Tiribazus, who took care to be informed of all that passed in the enemy's camp, found that there was some misunderstanding between them, and that the jealousy and mistrust, which they had of each other, prevented their acting in concert. Whereupon he advised the king to enter into a treaty with them, and taking upon himself the whole management of it, went in person to one of the kings, and sent his son to the other. Each of them informed the king, to whom they applied, that the other had sent ambassadors to treat separately with Artaxerxes, and advised him to lose no time, but make his peace as soon as possible, b. that the conditions might be the more advantageous. Their negotiations had the desired effect, and both princes were brought separately to submit to the king, which saved both him and his army from impending destruction * (Q).

Over-reaches the two Cadusian kings.

THE king lost in this ill-projected expedition a great number of his best troops, and all his horses. Among others who lost their lives on this occasion was Camissares, by nation a Carian, a man of extraordinary courage and conduct. He was governor of Leuco-Syria, a province lying between Cilicia and Cappadocia, and was succeeded in that government by his son Datames, who attended Artaxerxes in this expedition, and distinguished himself in a very particular manner. Datames was the greatest commander of his time, and by none ever exceeded, as Cornelius c. Nepos, who has wrote his life, informs us, in courage, boldness and abilities for contriving and executing military stratagems. But his eminent qualities, and too great merit occasioned his ruin, as we shall have occasion to relate hereafter.

ON the king's return to Susa, the eminent service which Tiribazus had done him in that expedition, inclined him to have his cause thoroughly examined, and to grant him a fair hearing. For that purpose he appointed three commissioners, who were all of eminent rank and distinguished probity. These, after an impartial discussion of the whole affair, were unanimous in declaring him innocent; whereupon he was by the king restored to his former honours, and Orontes his accuser with disgrace banished the court d.

Tiribazus acquitted, and in high favour.

Artaxerxes being now at leisure from all other engagements resolved to reduce the Egyptians, who had long before shaken off the Persian yoke; and accordingly made great preparations for that war. Atchoris, who then reigned in Egypt, foreseeing the storm, was not wanting on his side to provide against it the best he could. He joined a great number of Greeks and other mercenaries, under the command of Cbabrias the Atbenian, to his own subjects. Pharnabazus, being charged with the management of this war, sent ambassadors to Athens, complaining of Cbabrias for engaging to serve against the king of Persia, with whom the state of Athens lived in amity, and threatening the republick with his master's resentment, if he were not immediately recalled. He demanded at the same time Iphicrates another Atbenian, e. and the best general of his time, to command the Greek mercenaries in the Persian service. The Athenians, who at that time had a great dependance on the Persian king's friendship to support them against their domestic enemies, recalled Cbabrias, ordering him to repair to Athens on pain of death by a certain day. Iphicrates was sent to take upon him the command of the Greek mercenaries in the Persian army. On his arrival having mustered the forces he was to command, he so exercised them in all the arts of war, that they became very famous among the Greeks under the name of Iphicratean soldiers. And indeed he had time enough to instruct them before they entered upon action; for the Persians being very slow in their preparations, two whole years elapsed before they were in a condition to take the field. Atchoris, king of Egypt, died in the mean time, and was succeeded by Psammutbis, who reigned only a year. After him Nepherates reigned four months, and then Neftanebis, the first of the Sebennytic race, twelve years i.

(Q) A modern writer is of opinion (76) that the Cadusians were descended from the Israelites of the ten tribes, which the king of Affyria carried out of the land of Canaan; but as he has no other foundation to ground his opinion upon but the similitude between the words Cadusian and Kedusim, which signifies Holy people, we cannot fall in with him.

Artaxerxes, that he might draw more auxiliaries out of Greece for his Egyptian war, sent ambassadors thither to put an end to their domestic broils, and declare in his name to the different states and cities of that country, that it was his pleasure they should live in peace with each other upon the terms of the treaty of Antalcidas, and that, all garrisons being withdrawn, each city should be left to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own laws. This declaration was received with pleasure by all the cities of Greece, except the Thebans, who, aspiring to the empire of all Greece, refused to conform to it^a.

And Iphicrates to Athens.

The Egyptians in war renewed.

A T length all things being in a readiness for the invasion of Egypt, the Persian army was drawn together at Ace, since called Ptolemais, the place of the general rendezvous. In a review there, the army was found to consist of 200,000 Persians under the command of Pharnabazus, and 20,000 Greeks under that of Iphicrates. Their forces by sea were in proportion to those by land; for their fleet consisted of 300 galleys, besides an incredible number of vessels which followed to furnish both the fleet and the army with necessary provisions. The army and fleet began to move at the same time, and that they might act in concert, they separated as little as possible. The war was to begin with the siege of Pelusium; but Nectanebis, having had sufficient time to provide for the defence of that place, had rendered the approach to it impracticable both by sea and land. The fleet therefore instead of making a descent, as had been at first projected, sailed from thence to the Mendesian mouth of the Nile; for the Nile at that time emptied itself into the sea by seven different channels, and each of these was defended by a fort and a strong garrison. But the Mendesian mouth of the Nile not being so well fortified as the Pelusian, where the enemy was expected, they landed their forces there without great opposition, carried the fortrefs that guarded it, and put all the Egyptians that were found in it to the sword. After this action Iphicrates was for reembarking the troops without loss of time, and attacking Memphis the capital of Egypt. Had this opinion been followed before the Egyptians recovered from the consternation, which so formidable an invasion and the blow already received had thrown them into, they would have found the place without any defence, and must have certainly taken it and re-conquered all Egypt. But the main body of the army not being yet come up, Pharnabazus would undertake nothing before their arrival. Iphicrates, in the utmost despair to see so favourable an opportunity lost, which perhaps might never be retrieved, made pressing instances for leave to attempt the place with the mercenaries only that were under his command. But Pharnabazus out of a mean jealousy of the honour that would redound to Iphicrates, should he succeed in the enterprize, would by no means hearken to his proposal. This delay gave the Egyptians time to recover their courage, and put themselves in a condition to oppose any further attempts. For Nectanebis having lodged a sufficient garrison in Memphis, with the rest took the field, and so harassed the Persians that they could not advance farther into the country; and the Nile at the accustomed period overflowing the land, the Persians were obliged to return into Phœnice, having lost great part of their army in this unsuccessful expedition. Thus ended this war, which had cost immense sums, two whole years having been spent in making the necessary preparations for so fruitless an attempt. The only effect that it produced was an irreconcilable enmity between the two generals. For Pharnabazus, to excuse himself, laid the whole blame of the miscarriage upon Iphicrates; and he, with more reason, on Pharnabazus: but being well apprised that Pharnabazus would find more credit at the Persian court than he, and remembering what had happened to Conon, that he might not meet with the like fate, privately hired a ship and retired to Athens. Pharnabazus sent ambassadors to Athens accusing him of making the Egyptian expedition miscarry, and requesting the republick to punish him according to his demerit. The Athenians made no other answer, than that if he were found guilty he should undergo the punishment he deserved. But, it seems, they were so well convinced of his innocence, that they never called him to a trial on that account; nay, he was not long after appointed sole admiral of their whole fleet¹.

TWELVE years after this expedition Artaxerxes, who had not laid aside the thoughts of subjecting Egypt notwithstanding his many miscarriages in that attempt, began to make new preparations for invading of that country. Tachos, who had

- a succeeded Nectanebus, drew together what forces he could to defend himself against so powerful an enemy. To strengthen himself the more, he sent into Greece to raise mercenaries, and prevailed with the Lacedæmonians, who were at that time exasperated against Artaxerxes for obliging them to include the Messenians in the late peace, to send a good number of troops under the command of Agefilas. This commission did no ways redound to the honour of Agefilas, for it was thought below the dignity of a king of Sparta, and a great commander, who had acquired such reputation in the world, and was then above eighty, to become a mercenary, and hire himself to a Barbarian. However Agefilas, either out of vanity to be still at the head of an army, for Tachos had promised to make him commander in chief of all his forces, or out of a prospect of great gain, willingly accepted the commission, and set sail for Egypt. On his landing he was met by Tachos, who in their first interview conceived such disadvantageous ideas of him, that he ever after slighted his counsels, and despised his person. For both he and his Egyptian generals expected to see a great and magnificent prince with an attire and equipage equal to the fame of his exploits; and not a little old man of a mean aspect, and dressed in an old robe of coarse stuff, without any pomp, magnificence, or outward shew. This hasty and ill-grounded impression proved the ruin of Tachos; for he would allow Agefilas no other command but that of the mercenaries, which alone had been sufficient to disgust so great, so old, and so experienced a commander, and was the first cause of his aversion to Tachos. The charge of the fleet he gave to Chabrias, reserving to himself the chief command over all. Having joined the Egyptians and mercenaries into one body, he resolved to march into Phenice, thinking it more adviseable to make that country the theatre of the war, than to expect the enemy at home. Agefilas, being apprised of the bad consequences that might attend this resolution, advised him against it, remonstrating that his affairs were not so well settled in Egypt as to admit of his absence, and that it would be more for his interest to manage the war abroad by his lieutenants, and stay himself in his kingdom to be at hand in case of any disturbance. Tachos despised this wise counsel, and expressed no less disregard for him on all other occasions. But the event shewed, that Agefilas's advice was the result of a very prudent forecast; for while Tachos was in Phenice, the Egyptians revolting set up Nectanebus his cousin, or, as Diodorus calls him, his son in his stead. Agefilas laying hold of this opportunity to vent his resentment against Tachos, joined the revolted, and drove him quite out of Egypt. The dethroned prince fled first to Sidon, and from thence to the Persian court, where he was not only received with great kindness, but entrusted with command of the troops against the rebels (R).

- TOWARDS the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes great disturbances arose in the Persian court rent into factions by his sons, each making parties among the nobility to support their pretensions to the crown. He had 115 sons by his concubines, and three by his queen, viz. Darius, Ariaspes, and Ochus. To put a stop to these practices and contentions he declared Darius the eldest his successor, and the better to settle him on the throne, allowed him to assume the title of king, and wear the Tiara, even in his own life-time. But this not contenting the young prince's ambition, who was also disgusted with his father for refusing him one of his concubines whom he demanded, he formed a design against the old king's life, and engaged in the conspiracy fifty of his brothers. Tiribazus, whom we have often mentioned in this history, contributed the most to his taking this unnatural resolution, and that for a like subject of discontent. Artaxerxes had promised him

(R) Plutarch condemns Agefilas as guilty of treachery in thus turning his arms against the prince who had hired him. But Agefilas alledged in his justification, that he had been sent to assist the Egyptians, and that therefore, as they had taken up arms against Tachos, he could not serve against them without new orders from Sparta. He accordingly dispatched messengers thither, and the instructions he received were, to act as he should judge most advantageous for his country; whereupon he immediately declared for Nectanebus. Thus Agefilas pretended to cover so criminal a conduct, says Plutarch; but if we remove that delusive blind of the publick good, the only true name that can be given to this action, is that of perfidy and treason (77). Xenophon endeavours to palliate this conduct by saying, that Agefilas joined that king who seemed the best affected to Greece (78).

in marriage one of his daughters, but falling in love with her married her himself, and to make him amends, having promised him another daughter, he married that likewise. These two disappointments provoked Tiribazus, to such a degree, that to revenge the affront he stirred up the young king to that wicked attempt. The number of the conspirators was already very formidable, and the day fixed for the execution of their design, when an eunuch, who was privy to the plot, discovered it to the king. Whereupon the conspirators were seized as they were entering the king's palace, and all put to death.

Darius being thus cut off, the same contention was revived, which before his being declared king had rent the court into several factions. Three of his brothers were competitors, Ariaspes, Ochus, and Arfames. The two first claimed the crown in right of their birth, being the king's sons by his queen; the third only by the king's favour, who tenderly loved him, though only the son of a concubine. Ochus prompted by his restless ambition found means to get rid of his two rivals. For Ariaspes being of an easy temper, and very credulous, he suborned the eunuchs of the palace to threaten him in the king's name in such manner, that expecting every moment to be treated as Darius had been, he poisoned himself to avoid a more cruel death. But Arfames still remaining to rival him in his pretensions, and being for his wisdom, and other princely virtues, in the opinion of his father and all others the most worthy of the crown, he caused him to be assassinated by Harpates the son of Tiribazus. This loss added to the former, and the wickedness which attended both, overwhelmed the king, who was then 94 years old, with such grief, that not being able to bear up against it, he broke his heart, and died in the 46th year of his reign^a. He was a mild and generous prince, and governed with great clemency and justice; whence he was honoured, and his authority respected throughout all the empire. This Ochus was sensible of, and well knew that it would be quite otherwise with him, the death of his two brothers having alienated the minds both of the nobility and people. To avoid the inconveniences that might attend this general hatred and aversion, he prevailed with the eunuchs and others, that were about the king's person, to conceal his death, and took upon himself the administration of affairs, giving orders, and issuing decrees in the name of Artaxerxes, as if he had been still alive; by one of these decrees he caused himself, as by his father's order, to be proclaimed king throughout the whole empire[†]. After having thus governed near ten months, believing his authority sufficiently established, he at length declared the death of his father, and openly ascended the throne, taking the name of Artaxerxes. Historians, however, most frequently call him Ochus, and under this name we shall speak of him in the sequel of this history.

It was no sooner known that Artaxerxes was dead, and Ochus in possession of the throne, but all Asia Minor, Syria, Phenice, and many other provinces openly revolted. The chief men concerned in this revolt, were Ariobarzanes governor of Phrygia, Mausolus king of Caria, Orontes governor of Mysia, and Antophradates governor of Lydia. Datames likewise, whom we have mentioned before, was engaged in the rebellion, being at that time governor of Cappadocia. By this, as we may call it, general insurrection, half the revenues of the crown were on a sudden diverted into different channels, and the remainder had not been sufficient to carry on the war against so many revoltors, had they acted in concert. But they did not long keep firm to each other, and those, who had been the first and most zealous in shaking off the yoke, strove who should soonest betray the others, and thereby make their peace with the king. The provinces of Asia Minor on withdrawing their obedience had entered into a confederacy for their mutual defence, and chosen Orontes for their general. They had also resolved to add 20,000 mercenaries to their own troops, and charged Orontes with the care of raising them. But when he had received a sufficient sum both for the raising those forces and maintaining of them for a year, he kept the money for himself, and delivered up to the king, those, who had brought it to him from the revolted provinces. Rheomitres, another of the chiefs of Asia Minor, being sent into Egypt to negotiate succours in that kingdom, was guilty of a like treachery. For having brought from thence 500 talents and 50 ships of war, and assembled the ringleaders of the revolt at Leucas, a city of Asia a Minor, under pretence of giving them an account of his negotiations, he seized them all, and made his peace with the king, by betraying them into his hands. Thus this formidable revolt, which had brought the Persian empire to the very brink of ruin, came to nothing; and Ochus was without striking a blow settled on the throne^a. Only Datames, governor of Cappadocia, having possessed himself also of Paphlagonia, gave him much trouble. By what we read of him in Cornelius Nepos^b, and Polyænus^c, it appears that he maintained himself a long time in both those provinces, and was at last murdered by the treachery of Mitbridates, one of his intimates (S).

Ochus was the most cruel and wicked of all the princes of that race in Persia. For he had not been long on the throne, when he filled the palace and the whole empire with blood and slaughter. That the revolted provinces might have none of the blood royal to set up against him, and to rid himself at once of all the uneasiness, which the princes of the royal family might give him, he put them all to death without any regard to sex, age or proximity of blood. He caused Ocha, his own sister and mother-in-law, for he had married her daughter, to be buried alive; and having shut up one of his uncles with an hundred of his sons and grandsons in a court of the palace, he ordered his archers to dispatch them with their arrows^d. This uncle seems to have been the father of Sisgambis, mother to Darius Codomannus. For Quintus Curtius tells us, that Ochus caused 80 of her brothers, together with their father, to be massacred in one day^e. With the same barbarity he treated all those who gave him any umbrage, sparing none of the nobility who betrayed the least mark of discontent or disaffection to his person.

But all the cruelties he practised could not keep his subjects in awe. Artabazus, governor of one of the Asiatic provinces, rebelled, and engaged Chares the Athenian to join him with a fleet and body of troops, which he commanded in those parts. Ochus sent an army of 70,000 men against the rebels; but they were by Chares and his Athenians all cut in pieces. Artabazus in reward of so great a service gave Chares a sum of money sufficient to pay his fleet, and the forces he had on board. The king highly resented this conduct of the Athenians, and as they were then engaged in a war with the Cibians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, he threatened to join their enemies with a numerous fleet, if they did not recal Chares. The Athenians fearing to provoke so powerful an enemy, ordered Chares to return forthwith into Greece^f.

Artabazus being thus deserted by the Athenians had recourse to the Thebans, who sent to his assistance a body of 5000 men under the command of the brave Pammenes. With this reinforcement Artabazus again took the field, and gained two very considerable victories over the king's forces, which greatly redounded to the honour of the Thebans and their commander^g. However they made their peace soon after with the king, who having given them 300 talents, they returned home. Artabazus thus destitute of all support was at last overcome and forced to take refuge with Philip of Macedon^h.

This rebellion was scarce quelled, when several others broke out in divers parts of the empire. The Sidonians and other Phœnicians being oppressed by those the king had set over them, taking up arms entered into a confederacy with Nectanebus king of Egypt. The Persians were then making vast preparations to reduce Egypt; but as they could not approach the borders of that kingdom any other way than by marching through Phœnicie, the revolt of that country happened very opportunely for the king of Egypt. Therefore, to keep up their courage, he detached a body of 4000 Greek mercenaries under the command of Mentor the Rhodian to join them, in hopes of making Phœnicie a barrier to Egypt, and keeping the war at a distance.

(S) Diodorus Siculus (79) places this revolt in the last year of Artaxerxes; but as he was greatly esteemed and beloved by his subjects, it is not likely that so great an insurrection should have happened under him. We have therefore placed it in the reign of his successor Ochus, whose cruelty, chiefly in the murder of his two brothers, incensed the nobility and governors of the provinces against him, who therefore refused to submit to him. As he took the name of Artaxerxes, this may have led Diodorus into the mistake of placing in the father's reign what happened in the son's.

The Phœnicians encouraged by this supply took the field, and having routed the governors of Syria and Cilicia that were sent to reduce them, they drove the Persians quite out of their territories^a.

Cypriots join in the revolt. THE Cypriots, being likewise ill-used by their Persian governors, and encouraged by this success of the Phœnicians, joined with them and the Egyptians in the same alliance^a. Hereupon Ochus dispatched his orders to Idriens king of Caria, enjoining him to invade the island of Cyprus, and make war upon the inhabitants, putting all to fire and sword. Idriens in compliance with his command having equipped a fleet, sent it with 8000 Greek mercenaries under the command of Phocian an Athenian and Evagoras (T) to make a descent in the island. The troops landed without any considerable opposition, and being reinforced with other bodies from Syria and Cilicia, b besieged Salamine by sea and land^a.

Ochus, finding that his lieutenants made no progress against the Egyptians and Phœnicians, resolved to head his forces in person; and accordingly having drawn together an army of 300,000 foot, and 30,000 horse, marched at the head of them into Phœnicia. Mentor the Rhodian, who was then at Sidon with the Greek mercenaries, being terrified at the approach of so great an army, sent privately one of his intimate friends to Ochus to make peace with him, offering not only to deliver Sidon into his hands, but to join him with the troops under his command. Ochus glad of this proffer spared no promises to draw him over to his party, knowing what signal service he could do him in the Egyptian war, as being thoroughly acquainted with the country. And accordingly Mentor, having received such assurances as he desired, engaged Tennes, king of Sidon, in the same treacherous design, and by his assistance delivered Sidon up to the Persians. The Sidonians seeing themselves thus betrayed, and the enemy within the walls, shut themselves up with their wives and children, in their houses, and setting fire to them, consumed themselves to the number of 40,000 men besides women and children. Tennes met with no better fate than his subjects, for Ochus seeing he could do him no farther service, and detesting in his heart the treachery of the man, caused his throat to be cut, lest he should out-live the ruin which he had brought upon his country, as we have related elsewhere^a. The ruin and total destruction of Sidon terrified the other cities of Phœnicia to such a degree, that they all voluntarily submitted to the conqueror, each of them making peace with the king upon the best terms they could. Neither was Ochus unwilling to compound with them, that he might be no longer retarded from putting in execution the designs he had upon Egypt^a.

BUT before he marched thither, his army received from Greece a reinforcement of 10,000 mercenaries. For the Thebans sent him 1000 men under the command of Lachares, and the Argives 3000 commanded by Nicostratus; the rest joined him from the Greek cities of Asia. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians excused themselves, telling the king's ambassadors, that they should be glad to maintain peace and friendship with their master, but could not at that time spare him any succours^b. The Jews also seem to have been engaged in this revolt of Phœnicia. For Ochus from Sidon marched into Judea, where he besieged and took Jericho, carrying along with him into Egypt a great many captive Jews, and sending others into Hyrcania, where they were planted in the provinces bordering on the Caspian sea^c.

Ochus at the same time put an end to the Cyprian war, and compounded with the nine Cyprian kings, having his mind entirely bent on the reducing of Egypt. He willingly redressed all their grievances, and confirmed them in their respective governments^d.

(T) Another Evagoras had formerly reigned in the city of Salamine, whom we have spoke of above. On his death he was succeeded by Nicoles his son, and this Evagoras seems to have been the son of Nicoles, and to have succeeded him in that kingdom; but being driven out by Protagoras his uncle, was in banishment when this war began. He gladly joined the Persians in hopes of recovering his crown; and the knowledge he had of the country, made him a very proper person to command in this expedition (80). Cyprus had then nine chief cities, and each of them had its king, but subject and tributary to the king of Persia. All these joined together in this confederacy, with a design to shake off the Persian yoke, and make themselves each independent in his own city (81).

- a. Ochus having thus settled the affairs both of Phenice and Egypt set out on his Egyptian expedition. On his march he lost a great many men who were drowned in the lake of Serbonis, which lies between Phenice and Egypt, and extends about 30 Artaxerxes miles. When the south-wind blows, the whole surface of the water is covered with sand from the desert in such manner that no one can distinguish it from the firm land. Several parties of Ochus's army for want of good guides were lost in it, and we are told that entire armies have there met with the same fate*. When he arrived on the frontiers of Egypt, he detached three bodies to invade the country, each body being commanded by a Persian and a Greek general. The first was led by Lachares the Theban, and Rosaces, governor of Lydia and Ionia; the second by Nicostratus the Theban, and Aristazanes; the third by Mentor the Rhodian, and Bagoas one of his eunuchs. The main body of the army he kept with himself, and encamped near Pelusium, with a design to watch there the events of the war. In the mean time Nectanebus drew together an army of 100,000 men, consisting of 20,000 mercenaries from Greece, as many from Lybia, and the rest Egyptians; but they did not all amount to a third of the Persian army. With some of these he garrisoned his frontier-towns, and with the others he guarded the passes, through which the enemy was to enter the country. The first Persian detachment under the command of Lachares sat down before Pelusium, garrisoned by 5000 Greeks. While the siege was carrying on, Nicostratus with his detachment embarked on board a squadron of the Persian fleet, and sailing up the Nile landed his forces in the heart of the country, and there formed a strong encampment. Hereupon all the garrisons of the neighbouring castles, taking the alarm, joined Clinius of the island of Cos in order to dislodge him. This led them to a battle, which was fought with great obstinacy; but at last the Egyptians were put to flight, having lost Clinius with above 5000 of his men; the rest were utterly broken and dispersed, which, we may say, determined the fate of this war. For Nectanebus fearing lest Nicostratus should sail up the Nile with his victorious forces, and take Memphis the metropolis of his kingdom, hastened thither and left open the passes which he ought chiefly to have defended. The Greek mercenaries, who garrisoned Pelusium, hearing of the king's retreat, gave all for lost, and therefore coming to a parley with Lacharis, delivered up the city to him, upon condition that they and their effects should be safely conveyed to Greece. Mentor with the third detachment, finding the passes deserted, entered the country, and giving out that Ochus would graciously receive all that submitted, and utterly destroy such as resisted, treating them as he had treated the Sidonians, both the Egyptians and Greeks strove which should first make their submission. Nectanebus seeing he could no longer hold out, took with him what treasures he could carry, and withdrew into Ethiopia. Ochus having thus reduced all Egypt, dismantled their strong holds, plundered their temples, and returned in triumph to Babylon, loaded with immense treasures†. Henceforward Egypt was a province of Persia till Alexander overturned that monarchy, and delivered the Egyptians from the Persian tyranny.
- c. Ochus having ended with such success the Egyptian war, sent back the Greek mercenaries to their respective countries with ample rewards. But as all his conquests were chiefly owing to Mentor, he distinguished him above all the rest, not only rewarding him with an hundred talents, and other presents to a great value, but appointing him governor of all the coasts of Asia, and committing to his care the whole management of the war, which he was still carrying on against some provinces that had revolted in the beginning of his reign. These, what by cunning and stratagems, what by open force, he reduced, and restored the king's authority in all the parts of that vast empire.
- d. All the revolted provinces being reduced, and peace established throughout the whole empire, Ochus gave himself up to ease, luxury, and pleasure, leaving the administration of publick affairs entirely to his ministers. The chief of these were Bagoas his favourite eunuch, and Mentor the Rhodian, who agreeing to part the power between them, the former governed all the provinces of the upper Asia, and the latter those of the lower‡. Bagoas being by birth an Egyptian, had a great zeal for the religion of his country, and endeavoured, on the conquest of Egypt, to influence the king in favour of the Egyptian ceremonies; but in spite of all his endeavours, the king not only plundered the temples, but carried away the sacred records that were lodged in them; and in contempt of their religion slew the god Apis, that is, the sacred bull, which they worshipped under that name. This irreligious behaviour Bagoas deeply resented, and ever afterwards watched an opportunity of revenging the affront offered to his religion. The records he redeemed with a great sum of money, and sent them back into Egypt. But the injury done to his God he thought could be no otherwise atoned for but by putting the sacrilegious king to death; which he did accordingly by the help of the king's physician, who in his sickness gave him a strong poison instead of physick, in the twenty first year of his reign. Nor did his revenge stop here; for the king's body he kept, causing another to be buried instead of it: and, because the king had caused his attendants to eat the flesh of their god Apis, he cut his flesh in pieces, and gave it so mangled to the cats, making of his bones handles for swords. Having in this barbarous manner dispatched his master and benefactor, and seeing the whole power of the empire in his hands, he placed Arses, the youngest of the dead king's sons, on the throne, and put all the rest to death, that he might the better secure to himself the authority, which he had usurped. For the bare name of king was all that he allowed to Arses, reserving for himself the whole power and authority of the government ^a.

Arses did not long enjoy even this shadow of power, being slain by the same Bagoas, who finding that the king, well apprized of his wickedness and treachery, was taking measures to bring him to condign punishment, was before-hand with him, putting to death him and his whole family in the second year of his reign ^b.

Darius Codomannus. Year of the flood 2663. Before Christ 336.

THE throne becoming again vacant by the death of Arses, Bagoas, who durst not yet usurp it himself, placed it on Darius, the third of that name in Persia. Before his accession to the crown he was called Codomannus, and is said not to have been of the blood royal, because he was not the son of any king that reigned before him. However he was of the royal family, being descended from Darius Notus, whose grandson Arfanes, marrying his own sister Syfigambis, had by her Codomannus. Ossanes, the son of Darius Notus, and father to Arfanes, was put to death by Ochus on his first ascending the throne, and with him above eighty of his sons and grandsons ^c.

How Codomannus came to escape this slaughter is no where said. In the reign of Ochus he made but a very poor figure, being only an Astanda, that is one employed to carry the royal dispatches to the governors of the provinces, a mean employment for one of the royal family ^d. In the war, which Ochus made upon the Cadusians towards the latter end of his reign, one of those Barbarians having challenged the whole Persian army to find a champion that durst encounter him in a single combat, Codomannus accepted the challenge after all the others had declined it, and slew the Cadusian. For this gallant action he was rewarded with the government of Armenia ^e, and thence raised to the throne by Bagoas in the manner we have already related. But he had not long enjoyed the sovereign power, before Bagoas, finding that he would not be entirely governed by him, which was all he aimed at in advancing him to the crown, resolved to remove him in the same manner as he had done his predecessor; and accordingly provided a poisonous potion: but Darius being acquainted with his design, when the potion was brought him, made Bagoas himself drink it, and having thereby got rid of the traitor by his own artifice, he settled himself on the throne without any further difficulty or opposition ^f. Authors represent Darius as a prince of a mild and generous disposition, of great personal valour, and for his stature and shape far preferable to any of the whole Persian empire. But having such a fortunate rival as Alexander the Great to encounter, he was not able with all his good qualities and personal courage to withstand him; and he was scarce warm on the throne when he found this powerful enemy preparing to drive him from it.

Bagoas forced to drink the poison he had prepared for Darius.

FOR Alexander having settled his affairs in Macedon, and used all imaginable precautions to prevent any troubles that might arise there during his absence, set out for Sestus, and thence passed over the Hellepont into Asia, in the second year of Darius's reign. A war against the Persians had been resolved on some time before in a general assembly of the Amphibtyons, to revenge the many injuries, which Greece had received from the Barbarians during the space of 300 years, and Philip king of Macedon had been appointed commander in chief of the forces destined for this expedition. - a summoned a general assembly of all the states and free cities of Greece to meet at Corinth, and having prevailed with them to chuse him in his room, he obliged each city to furnish its quota, both of men and money, for the carrying on of the war. His army, according to the highest account, amounted to no more than 30,000 foot, and 5000 horse. But they were all chosen men, well disciplined, and inured to the toils of war, most of them having served under Philip during his long wars, and all of them been employed in several expeditions. Parmenio commanded the infantry. Philopatus his son had the command of 1800 horse, all Macedonians; Callas, the son of Harpalus, led the same number of Thessalian cavalry: the rest of the horse had their particular commanders, each being set over those of his own nation.
- b With this army he crossed the Hellepont, as we have hinted above, and pursuing his march, arrived at the river Granicus, where he found the Persian governors of the neighbouring provinces encamped with an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse with a design to dispute his passage (U). Memnon the Rhodian, whom Darius had appointed governor over all the coasts of Asia, had advised the generals not to venture a battle, but to lay waste the whole country, and even destroy the cities, that the enemy might be obliged for want of provisions to return back into Europe. But Artabates, governor of Phrygia, opposed the opinion of Memnon, protesting that he would never suffer the Greeks to make such havock in the countries he governed. This rash and impolitic counsel prevailed, and Memnon was even suspected to hold intelligence with the enemy, or at least to be desirous of spinning out the war, and thereby continuing the command to himself.

Memnon's advice rejected.

- The Persian cavalry, which was very numerous, lined the banks of the Granicus, and formed a large front in order to oppose Alexander, where-ever he should attempt a passage; and the foot, consisting chiefly of Greek mercenaries, was posted behind the cavalry on an easy ascent. Parmenio, observing the disposition of the enemies army, advised Alexander to incamp on the opposite banks of the river, that his troops might have time to rest, and not to attempt the crossing over till the next morning, the river being deep, the banks very craggy and steep, his troops tired with their march, and those of the enemies quite fresh, as having been incamped in that place for several days. But all the reasons he could produce made not the least impression on Alexander, who answered, that it would be a disgrace to him and his army, should he, after crossing the Hellepont, suffer his progress to be stoppt by a rivulet; for so, out of contempt, he called the Granicus.

Alexander; crosses the Granicus.

- The two armies being drawn up in battle-array on the opposite banks of the river, continued some time in sight of each other, as though they dreaded the event. The Persians waited till the Macedonians should enter the river, that they might attack them to advantage on their landing; and the Macedonians were looking for a convenient place to cross in, which they no sooner found, than Alexander ordered a strong detachment of horse to advance into the river, he himself following with the right wing, which he commanded in person, the trumpets in the mean time sounding, and loud shouts of joy being heard throughout the whole army. The Persians let fly such showers of arrows against the detachment of the Macedonian horse as caused some confusion, several of their horses being killed or wounded; and as they drew near the bank a most bloody engagement ensued, the Macedonians endeavouring to land, and the Persians pushing them again into the river. As Memnon commanded in this place with his sons, the first ranks of the Macedonians were intirely cut off, and the rest, after having with the utmost difficulty gained the shore, driven anew into the river. Alexander, who followed them close, observing the confusion they were in, headed them himself, and landing in spite of all opposition attacked the enemy's cavalry with great vigour, and obliged them after an obstinate resistance to give way. However, Spithrobates governor of Ionia, and son-in-law to Darius, being surrounded by forty Persian lords, all of them his relations, still maintained his ground, and did all that lay in his power to lead the Persians back to the charge. Alexander seeing in how gallant a manner he signalized himself, advanced full gallop to engage him; neither did he decline the combat, and both were slightly wounded at the first encounter. Spitrobates having thrown his javelin without effect, immediately advanced sword in hand against Alexander, who, being upon his guard, run him through with his pike as he was lifting up his arm to discharge a blow with his scimitar. But Rosaces, brother to Spitrobates, gave Alexander at the same time so furious a blow on the head with his battle-ax, that he beat off his plume, and slightly wounded him through his helmet. As he was ready to repeat the blow, Clitus with one stroke of his scimitar cut off Rosaces's head, and by that means saved the life of his sovereign. The Macedonians, animated by the example of their king, attacked the Persian horse with new vigour, who not being able to stand so violent a shock, first gave ground, and soon after betook themselves to a precipitous flight. Alexander did not pursue them, but immediately charged at the head of the right wing the enemies foot, who seeing themselves attacked at the same time by the cavalry, and the Macedonian phalanx, which had crossed the river, made no great resistance. The Grecian infantry retired in good order to a neighbouring hill, whence they sent deputies to Alexander, demanding leave to march off unmolested; but he instead of coming to a parley with them, rushed sword in hand into the middle of this small body, where he was very near being cut to pieces, his horse being killed under him. The Greeks defended themselves a long time with incredible valour, but being at last over-powered with numbers, were almost all killed on the spot. In this engagement the Persians lost 20,000 foot, and 2500 horse; of the Macedonians 25 men of the king's own troop fell in the first attack, whose statues, made by Lysippus, Alexander some time after caused to be set up in Dia, a city of Macedon, whence they were many years after carried to Rome by Q. Metellus. About 60 others of the horse were killed, and 30 of the foot, who were all buried the next day with great solemnity, the king exempting their parents and children, from all taxes and burdens^a.

defeated.

Sardis and Ephesus surrendered to Alexander.

THIS victory was attended with all the happy consequences that could be expected. For Sardis, which was the key of the Persian empire, immediately surrendered, and was by Alexander declared a free city, the citizens being permitted to live according to their own laws. From Sardis he advanced to Ephesus, where he was received with great joy. Here he offered a great number of sacrifices to Diana, and assigned to the temple of that goddess, all the tributes that were paid to the Persians. Before he left Ephesus the deputies of Trallis and Magnesia waited upon him with the keys of their cities. From Ephesus he advanced to Miletus, which city, flattered with the hopes of being soon relieved, refused him admittance; and indeed the Persian fleet, which was very numerous, made as if they would succour the city; but after various fruitless attempts they failed off. Memnon had shut himself up in this strong hold, with a considerable number of his men, who had escaped from the battle on the Granicus, and was resolved to make a vigorous resistance. Alexander, having surrounded the city with his whole army, planted scaling-ladders on all sides, thinking that the most expeditious manner of becoming master of the place. But his men being every where repulsed, and the city well stored with provisions for a long siege, he began to batter the walls with all his engines night and day without intermission. Several breaches were made, but still he could not master the town, the besieged sustaining all his efforts with incredible bravery. At last the town being almost quite dismantled, and the besieged tired out with the hard service, Memnon demanded to capitulate, and surrendered the city upon honourable terms; the Milesians were allowed to live according to their own laws, and Memnon with his Greeks to march out unmolested; but the Persians were either put to the sword or sold for slaves^c.

nassus.

HAVING thus possessed himself of Miletus, he marched into Caria in order to besiege Halicarnassus the metropolis of that province, which refused to submit. That city was both by nature and art one of the best fortified in all Asia; and besides, Memnon had thrown himself into it with a considerable body of chosen men, resolved to signalize, in the defence of so important a place, his courage and attachment to the interest of Darius, with whom he had left his wife and children as pledges of it. And accordingly he made a most vigorous resistance, being seconded by another general of great prowess, by name Epbialtes. Whatever could be expected from the most intrepid bravery, and the most consummate knowledge in the art of war, a was practised on this occasion both by the besiegers and the besieged. After the Macedonians had with the utmost difficulty filled up the ditches, and brought their engines near the walls, their works were all demolished in an instant, and the engines set on fire by the besieged. No sooner was any part of the wall beat down by the battering rams, but a new one was raised in its stead, the Macedonians finding themselves no farther advanced after an immense labour than they were when they first sat down before the place. The city held out so long, and the besiegers had so many difficulties to struggle with, that any general besides Alexander would have given over the enterprize. But his troops were encouraged to pursue the undertaking by those very difficulties, which would have disheartened others; and their patience at last proved successful, Memnon being obliged to abandon the city, which he could no longer defend. As the sea was open, he placed a strong garrison in the citadel which was stored with all sorts of provision, and going on board the Persian fleet, whereof himself was admiral, he conveyed the inhabitants with all their effects to the island of Cos, not far distant from Halicarnassus. Alexander finding the city empty both of riches and inhabitants, razed it to the ground; but the citadel he did not think proper to besiege, it being of little importance to him after the city was destroyed.

After the reduction of Halicarnassus all the Greek cities in Asia declared for Alexander, he giving out where-ever he came that he had undertaken this war with no other view but of freeing them from the Persian bondage. In the second year of this war he reduced the provinces of Phrygia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Paphlagonia, Galatia and Cappadocia, and appointed such of his friends to govern them as he thought fit. These transactions we shall relate more at length in the life of this great warrior †.

Alexander.

In the mean time Darius was not wanting to prepare for a vigorous defence. Memnon advised him to carry the war into Macedon; and a wiser resolution could not have been taken: for the Lacedamonians, and several other Greek states, that were disaffected to the Macedonians, and jealous of their over-grown power, would have readily joined his enemies; which would have obliged Alexander to leave Asia, and return to the defence of his own country. Darius being well apprised of the reasonableness of this advice, willingly embraced it, and charged Memnon to put it in execution, appointing him admiral of the fleet, and commander in chief of all the forces that were to be employed in this expedition. That prince could not have made a better choice, for Memnon was by far the best general in his service, and had for many years given undoubted proofs not only of his courage and conduct, but of an extraordinary fidelity and attachment to the Persian interest, not abandoning his sovereign, as other mercenaries had done, when his arms were unsuccessful. Having received this new commission, he assembled the scattered remains of the army, and appointed the fleet to rendezvous at the island of Cos, where he took on board the land-forces, and with them reduced the islands of Cbios and Lesbos, except the city of Mitylene. From thence he designed to pass over into Eubœa, and make Greece and Macedon the seat of the war; but died before Mitylene, which city he had been forced to besiege. His death was the greatest misfortune that could befall the Persian empire, having defeated the wise measures which he had proposed; for Darius not having one general capable of carrying on that enterprize, the only one that could have saved his empire, was obliged to drop it, and entirely depend upon his eastern armies. These he appointed to assemble at Babylon, and having set up his standard there, and mustered his forces, he found that they amounted in all to the number of four, five or six hundred thousand men, according to the various accounts of authors †.

THE news of Memnon's death confirmed Alexander in the resolution he had taken of marching immediately into the provinces of Upper Asia. Accordingly he marched with all possible expedition into Cilicia, and arriving at a place called Cyrus's camp (whether from Cyrus the Great, as Curtius tells, or from the younger, as we read in Arrian, is uncertain) about fifty stades distant from the straits of Cilicia, he was informed, that the enemy guarded that important pass with a considerable body of troops. Whereupon, leaving Parmentio there, he marched in person at the first watch to surprize them; but the Persians, having intelligence of his design, betook themselves to flight, and abandoned the pass, which Alexander entered, and after viewing with attention the nature of the place, admired his good fortune, and owned that he might have been stopped with great ease, seeing the road was so narrow, that four men could scarce pass abreast, and so broke in several places, and encumbered by large stones rolling down from the mountains, that a very small number of resolute men might have kept back with no other weapons but stones a more numerous army. From the straits of Cilicia the whole army marched to the city of Tarsus, where they arrived the instant the Persians were setting fire to the place, in order to prevent the Macedonians from enriching themselves with the plunder of so wealthy and flourishing a city. They arrived very seasonably to stop the progress of the fire, and save the city from utter destruction.

Cilicia.*

In the mean time Darius had begun his march at the head of his numerous army, and was advanced as far as the vast plains of Mesopotamia (U). Here the commanders of the Greek mercenaries earnestly pressed him to wait for the enemy, that he might engage them with all the advantage his numbers gave him. But Darius would not hearken to their advice, hastening blindly to the mountainous parts of Cilicia, where his cavalry and the number of his troops would rather be an incumbrance to each other, than of any service in an engagement.

THE order he observed in his march was as follows. Before the army was carried on silver altars, the sacred and eternal fire, as they called it, attended by the Mages, singing hymns after the manner of their country, and three hundred and sixty-five youths in scarlet robes. After these came a chariot consecrated to Jupiter drawn by white horses, and followed by one of an extraordinary size, whom they called the horse of the sun; all the equerries were clothed in white, each having a golden rod in his hand. Next appeared ten sumptuous chariots, enriched with curious sculptures in gold and silver; and then the van-guard of the horse, composed of twelve different nations, and all armed in a different manner; this body of horse was followed by another of foot, called by the Persians immortal, because if any of them died, his place was immediately supplied by another; they were ten thousand in number, and remarkable for the sumptuousness of their apparel; for they all wore collars of pure gold, and were clothed in robes of gold tissue, having large sleeves garnished with precious stones. About 30 paces distance came the king's relations or cousins, to the number of 15,000, appaelled like women, and surpassing even the immortal body in the pomp and richness of their attire; they were honoured with the title of the king's cousins, and possibly several of the king's relations were in this body. After these came Darius himself attended by his guards, and seated on a chariot, as on a throne; the chariot was supported on both sides by the gods of his nation cast in pure gold; from the middle of the beam, which was set with jewels, rose two statues of pure gold, a cubit in height, the one representing war, the other peace, and both shaded with the wings of a spread eagle of the same metal. The king was clothed with a garment of purple striped with silver, wearing over that a long robe enriched with a great number of precious stones; and the scabbard of his scimitar, as our author tells us, was made out of a single precious stone.

On either side of the king walked 200 of his nearest relations, followed by 10,000 horsemen, whose lances were plated with silver, and tipped with gold; after these marched 30,000 foot, the rear of the army, and lastly 400 fed horses belonging to the king. At a small distance followed Syngambis, the king's mother, and his consort, both seated on high chariots, with a numerous train of female attendants on horse-back, and fifteen chariots, in which were the king's children, and those who were charged with the care of their education. Next to these were the royal concubines to the number of 360, all attired like so many queens; they were followed by 600 mules and 300 camels, which carried the king's treasure, and were guarded by a body of bow-men. This pageant march was closed by a great many chariots carrying the wives of the crown-officers and lords of the court, and guarded by some companies of foot lightly armed.

Alexander,

- Alexander, upon advice that Darius was advancing towards the Euphrates in order to enter Cilicia, detached Parmenio to possess himself of another narrow pass (W) leading from Assyria, or rather Syria, into Cilicia. As for himself he marched from Tarsus to Anchialos, and thence to Soli, which city he reduced, obliging the inhabitants, who refused at first to admit him into their city, to pay 20,000 talents for the maintenance of his army. While he was at Castabala, a small city not far from mount Amanus, news was brought him, that Darius with his whole army was advanced as far as the city of Socbus in Syria within two days march of Cilicia. Hereupon Alexander summoned a council of war, wherein it was determined, that the whole army should march the next day, and wait for Darius among the mountains of Cilicia; which they did accordingly, encamping on a spot of ground, which was but just wide enough for two small armies to act in, and so reduced both in some degree to an equality. When intelligence was brought to the Persian camp that Alexander had halted in the midst of the mountains, the Greek commanders, who served in Darius's army, advised him again to wait for the enemy in the plains where he was then encamped, or return to the plains of Mesopotamia, where he might have room enough to draw up his great army, bring them all to engage at the same time and surround the enemy; whereas within those straits there not being room any where to draw up above 30,000 men in battle-array the Macedonians could bring all their men to engage, and the Persians not the twentieth part of theirs. If he did not approve of this council, they then advised him to divide his army into several bodies, and not to put all to the chance of one battle. But his adverse fate did not suffer him to follow so wholesome an advice; nay, the courtiers did here again traduce those, who had suggested it, as traitors, telling Darius that they advised him to divide his troops with no other view, than that they might have, after such a separation, a fair opportunity of delivering up into the enemies hands whatever should be in their power. However, Darius thanked the Greeks for their zeal and good-will, and even condescended to lay before them the motives that induced him to reject their advice. The courtiers had made him believe that Alexander was flying before him, and that therefore he ought to march forward with all possible expedition, and fall upon him while entangled in those straits, lest he should make his escape. Upon this it was agreed in a council of all the Persian generals, that they should engage the enemy in the narrow passes, the Gods, says our historian, blinding that prince, that they might pave a way to the destruction of the Persian empire. Darius having sent his treasures and most valuable moveables to Damascus in Syria under a small convoy, led the main body of the army towards the straits of mount Amanus, through which he entered Cilicia, and advanced as far as the city of Iffus, not knowing that Alexander was behind; for he had been told, that the Macedonians were retired in great disorder into Syria. In the city of Iffus he barbarously put to death the sick and wounded Macedonians that had been left there by Parmenio, sparing only a few, whom he dismissed, after making them view his camp, that they might be eye-witnesses of the immense number of his forces. These brought Alexander word of Darius's approach, which he could scarce believe, though he desired nothing more earnestly. However having offered a sacrifice to the gods of the place, he advanced to meet him, and drew up his army on a spot of ground near the city of Iffus, bounded on one side by the mountains, and by the sea on the other. Here Darius, not being able to extend his front beyond that of the Macedonians by reason of the narrowness of the place, could dispose of his great army no otherwise than by drawing them up in many lines one behind the other. But the Macedonians soon breaking the first line, and that recoiling upon the second, and the second again upon the third, and so on, the whole Persian army was put in disorder; and the Macedonians pursuing the advantage by pressing forward, the confusion was increased to such a degree, that even the bravest among the Persians, who were desirous to signalize themselves, could neither stand their

(W) For the clearer understanding of Alexander's march, and that of Darius, we must distinguish three straits, the first leading from Cappadocia into Cilicia, through which Alexander marched his army; the second leading from Cilicia into Syria, which Parmenio took possession of; and the third called the straits of mount Amanus lying to the north of the pass of Syria; through this Darius's army from Assyria entered Cilicia.

ground, nor manage their arms. As the croud, which was made in the flight of a so numerous an army, was very great, those who fell that day were for the most part trampled to death by their own men as they pressed to escape. Darius, who fought in the first line, with much difficulty got out of the croud, and fled in his chariot to the neighbouring mountains, where he mounted on horse-back, and pursued his flight, leaving behind him his bow, his shield and royal mantle. Alexander was prevented from following him by the Greek mercenaries, who charging the Macedonian phalanx with incredible bravery, killed Ptolemy the son of Seleucus with 120 officers of distinction, besides a great many private men, and though attacked in flank by Alexander in person, maintained their ground till they were from twenty reduced to eight thousand. They retired then in good order over the mountains towards Tripoli in Syria, where finding the transports that had conveyed them from Lesbos, lying on the shore, they fitted out such a number as suited their purpose, and sailed to Cyprus, after having burnt the rest to prevent their being pursued. Alexander no sooner saw them put to flight than he hastened after Darius, but growing weary of the pursuit, and night drawing on, he returned to the enemies camp, which his soldiers had just before plundered. Syngambis, Darius's mother, and his wife, who was also his sister, with his son Ochus not full six years old, and his two daughters both marriageable, and besides some noblemens daughters, who attended them, were found in the camp and taken prisoners. The rest had been sent to Damascus, with part of Darius's treasure, and all the rich furniture, which the Persian monarchs used to carry with them into the field; so that in the camp they found only three thousand talents of silver; but the rest of the treasures fell afterwards into the hands of Parmenio at his taking the city of Damascus. In this engagement the Persians lost, according to Arrian, 10,000 horse, and 90,000 foot, and with him other writers agree as to the number of the horse; but as to the foot, they all vary not only from him, but from each other, some making the number of the dead amount to 80, others to 90, others to 100, and some to 120 thousand, adding that 40,000 were taken prisoners, while Alexander, according to the highest computation, lost in all but 300 men.

The next day Alexander, after visiting the wounded, caused the dead to be buried in great pomp in the presence of the whole army, which was drawn up in battle-array. The same honours he paid to the manes of the Persians of rank, and allowed Darius's mother to bury as many as she pleased according to the customs and ceremonies of her country. But the prudent princess used that permission with great modesty and reserve, burying only a few, who were her near relations. Alexander treated her and the other captive princesses with great humanity; they were, says Plutarch, in Alexander's camp, not as in that of an enemy, but as in a holy temple designed for the asylum of virtue, they all living so retired, that they were not seen by any one, none daring to approach their pavilion, but such as were appointed to attend them. As Darius's consort and her two daughters were princesses of an extraordinary beauty, Alexander after the first visit resolved never to see them any more, that his frailty might not expose him to any danger. This memorable circumstance we find in a letter which he wrote to Parmenio, commanding him to put to death certain Macedonians who had abused the wives of some captives. In short, he used them with such respect, good-nature and humanity, that nothing but their captivity could make them sensible of their misfortune.

Alexander, seeing himself now master of the field, detached Parmenio to Damascus, where Darius's treasures were lodged, with the Thessalian horse. As he was on his march thither, he met with a messenger sent by the governor of that city with a letter to Alexander, wherein he offered to betray the city to the king. The fourth day Parmenio arrived at Damascus, when the governor, pretending that he was not able to defend the city against a victorious army, caused by day-break a vast number of beasts of burden to be loaded with the king's treasure and rich furniture, as if he intended to retire and save them for his master, but in reality to deliver them up to the enemy, as he had agreed with Parmenio, who had opened the letter directed to the king. At the first sight of the forces, which this general headed, the Persians who convoyed the treasures betook themselves to flight, and a left the Macedonians masters of all the gold and silver that was designed to pay so numerous an army. Among the prisoners of distinction taken in the city were three young princesses, daughters of Ochus, who had reigned before Darius, and his widow; the daughter of Oxathres, brother to Darius; the wife of Artabazus or Artabanus, the greatest lord at court, with his son Ilioneus; the wife of Pharnabazus, whom Darius had appointed governor of all the cities on the coast; three daughters of Mentor; the wife and son of Memnon, that illustrious and renowned commander, inasmuch that there was scarce one noble family in all Persia, which did not share in this calamity. Besides, the immense treasures which the Macedonians had already taken, they found in the city 2600 talents in ready money, and 500 in bullion, b which was afterwards coined; they took 30,000 prisoners, and with the plunder of the city loaded 7000 camels. The Thessalian horse had the best share of this booty, having been sent by Alexander on this expedition that they might enrich themselves with the plunder of so wealthy a city, in regard they had distinguished themselves above the rest in the late engagement*. The governor of the place was killed by one of his own men, and his head carried to Darius†.

AFTER this victory Alexander marched into Syria, most of the cities of that country voluntarily submitting to the conqueror, and even Darius's governors and commanders delivering themselves and their treasures up into his hands. Being arrived at Marathon, he received a letter from Darius, in which he stiled himself c king without bestowing that title on Alexander. He rather commanded than entreated him to ask what sum he pleased for the ransom of his mother, wife, and children; and as to their dispute about empire, they might decide it, if he thought proper, in a general engagement, to which both parties should bring an equal number of troops; but if he were still capable of wholesome counsel, he would advise him to be contented with the kingdom of his ancestors, and not invade that of another, to which he had no right; that for the future they should live in friendship and amity, and that he was ready to swear to the observance of these articles, and receive Alexander's oath. This letter, which was wrote with such an unbecomable pride and haughtiness, provoked Alexander to a great degree, who therefore in his answer began thus; Alexander the king to Darius; he then enumerates d the many injuries and calamities which the Greeks and Macedonians had suffered from the Persians, reproaches that nation with the base and treacherous murder of his father Philip, and Darius in particular with setting a price upon his own head; whence he concludes that he is not the aggressor, but has taken up arms in his own defence, and to revenge the death of his father, and the injuries done to his country; and that the gods, who always declare for the just cause, approved of this war, he shews from the success that attended it, since with their protection he had already subdued great part of Asia, and defeated the mighty host of the Persians in a pitched battle with a handful of men. However he engaged his word that he would restore to him his wife, mother and children, provided he repaired to him in the attire of a suppliant, and humbly begged him to give them their liberty, assuring him that he might e do it without the least danger. He concluded by desiring him to remember, when he next wrote, that he not only addressed a king, but his king. Tebisippus was ordered to carry this letter‡.

Alexander marched from thence into Phenice, where the citizens of Biblos opened their gates to him, and their example was followed by other cities in proportion as he advanced into the country; but none received him with greater joy than the Sidonians, whose city Ochus had laid in ashes about eighteen years before, and put most of the inhabitants to the sword. Since that time they bore such a hatred to the Persian name, that they were overjoy'd at this opportunity of shaking off the yoke; f and indeed were the first in Phenice, who submitted to Alexander by their deputies, in opposition to Strabo their king, who was in the Persian interest. Alexander deposed him, and permitted Hephestion to elect in his room whomsoever of the Sidonians he should judge worthy of so exalted a station§, as we have elsewhere related at length¶.

WHILE Alexander was in Phenice, some of the Persian generals, who had escaped from the battle at Iffos, drawing together the remains of the scattered army, attempted with the assistance of the Cappadocians and Paphlagonians to recover Lydia; but were in several engagements routed, and at last intirely dispersed by Antigonus, whom Alexander had appointed governor of that province. At the same time the Macedonian fleet sailing from Greece fell in with that of the enemies commanded by Aristomenes, whom Darius had sent to recover the cities on the Hellepont, and attacked them so briskly that not one single ship escaped^k.

ALL Syria and Phenice were already subdued, except the city of Tyre, which he besieged and took by assault after the inhabitants had held out with incredible bravery for seven whole months, as we have related in the history of Phenice^l.

WHILE Alexander was carrying on the siege of Tyre, he received a second letter from Darius, who at last condescended to give him the title of king; he offered him ten thousand talents by way of ransom for the captive princesses, and his daughter Statira in marriage, with all the country he had conquered as far as the Euphrates; he put him in mind of the inconstancy of fortune, and set out in most pompous terms the vast number of troops he could still bring into the field; he represented the difficulties he might meet with in crossing the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Araxes, and the Hydaspes, which were so many barriers to the Persian empire; that he would not have always the opportunity of shutting himself up among rocks and mountains, but would be obliged some time or other to engage in an open and champain country, where he would be ashamed to appear before him with a handful of men. Upon the receipt of this letter Alexander summoned a council, in which Parmenio was of opinion, that he ought to accept the offers of Darius, declaring that he would agree to them, were he Alexander; and so would I, replied Alexander, were I Parmenio. Without hearkening therefore to his advice, he answered, that he did not want the money Darius offered him; that it did not become him to offer what he no longer possessed, nor pretend to dispose of what he had already lost; that if he was the only person who did not know which of the two was the best commander, a battle would soon determine it; that he should not be frightened with rivers after having crossed the sea, and would not fail to pursue Darius, and come up with him at last to what place soever he should think proper to retire^m. Darius upon the receipt of this letter lost all hopes of an accommodation, and began anew to prepare for war.

The city of Gaza besieged, and taken by Alexander.

Alexander having reduced Tyre, marched from thence to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem to Gaza. On his arrival at that city he found it defended by a strong garrison under the command of Betis, or as some call him *Babemesis*ⁿ, one of Darius's eunuchs, who being a man of great experience in military affairs, and very faithful to his sovereign, resolved to hold out against Alexander till he was reduced to the last extremities. As this place was the only inlet into Egypt, Alexander could not pass thither till he was become master of it, and therefore was forced to besiege it. But notwithstanding his men behaved with the utmost intrepidity, and his commanders exerted the utmost of military skill, yet it cost him and his whole army two entire months to reduce it. The stop which this put to his intended march into Egypt, and two dangerous wounds, which he received in the siege, provoked him to such a degree, that on his taking the place he treated the commander, inhabitants and soldiers in a manner no-ways becoming a conqueror. For having cut 10,000 of them in pieces, he sold the rest with their wives and children for slaves. When Betis, who had been taken prisoner in the last assault, was brought before him, instead of using him kindly, as his valour and fidelity justly deserved, and a generous enemy ought to have done, he ordered his heels to be bored, a cord to be drawn through them, and the unhappy captive, thus tied to a chariot, to be dragged round the city till he expired; bragging that herein he imitated his progenitor Achilles, who, as Homer relates, caused the dead body of Hector to be thus dragged round the walls of Troy, as though a man ought ever to take pride in imitating a bad example. Both acts were barbarous and inhuman, but that of Alexander much more so; for Achilles caused only Hector's dead body to be so abused, whereas Alexander thus treated Betis, while alive, and for no other reason but because he had served his sovereign with fidelity in the post committed to his charge, which even Alexander, though an enemy, would have admired and rewarded, a had he made the true principles of virtue and generosity the rule of his actions; but his sentiments and conduct began now to change with his fortune°. He sent great part of the booty he found in the city to Olympias, to Cleopatra and his friends, and having left a garrison there, he marched directly for Egypt, and in seven days arrived before Pelufium, where he was met by great numbers of Egyptians, who flocked thither to make their submission to him. The hatred they bore to the Persians was such, that they willingly embraced all opportunities of shaking off the yoke they groaned under, and seemed not to care by whom they were governed, provided they could but meet with one who were able to rescue them from that insolence and indignity with which the Persians treated them and their religion. Oebus had slain their god Apis in a manner highly injurious to themselves and their religion; and the Persian governors treated their gods in the same manner; which raised their indignation to such a height, that when Amyntas (X) came thither a little before with a handful of men, he found them ready to join him in driving out the Persians. Alexander therefore no sooner appeared on the frontiers, but the Egyptians flocked to him from all parts, and received him with open arms. His arrival at the head of a powerful and victorious army gave them secure protection, which they could not promise themselves from Amyntas, and on this consideration they openly declared, without reserve, in his favour. Hereupon Mazeus, who commanded in Memphis, seeing he was not in a condition to oppose this general insurrection, opened the gates to the conqueror, and put him in possession of the metropolis of that kingdom, with 800 talents, and all the king's rich furniture[†]. Thus Alexander, without any oppo-

A T Memphis Alexander formed a design of visiting the temple of Jupiter Hammon, and in his way thither built Alexandria, which soon became the metropolis of that kingdom. On his return from the temple he settled the affairs of Egypt, and marched from thence in the beginning of the spring to find out Darius. On his return into Phenicia he staid some time at Tyre, that he might there settle the affairs of the countries, which he was to leave behind him before he set out to make new conquests; and having ordered matters as he thought fit, he began his march, d and with his whole army arrived at Thapsacus, where he crossed the Euphrates, and continued his march towards the Tigris in quest of the enemy. Darius in the mean time, after several overtures for a peace, finding that there was no hopes of an accommodation unless he resigned the whole empire, applied himself to make the necessary preparations for another engagement. For this purpose having assembled at Babylon an army half as numerous again as that with which he fought at Issus, (for it consisted of 110,000 men) he took the field, and marched towards Nineveh. Advice being brought him, that the enemy was not far off, he detached Satropates commander of the cavalry, at the head of a thousand chosen horse, and Mazeus governor of that province, with six thousand, to prevent Alexander from crossing the Tigris, and to lay waste the country through which he was to pass. But they came too late, c Alexander having with the utmost difficulty crossed the river a little before they arrived. He encamped two days on the banks of the river, during which time there happened an eclipse of the moon, which so terrified the Macedonians, that they refused to proceed in their march, crying out, that heaven displayed the marks of its anger, that they were dragged against the will of the gods to the utmost extremities of the earth, and that even the moon refused to lend them her usual light.

(X) This Amyntas having fled from Alexander to Darius was one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries at the battle of Issus, from whence having brought off 4000 of his men, he got safe to Tripoli in Syria, where he embarked, as we have related above, and sailed first to Cyprus, and then to Pelufium in Egypt, which city he seized, making the garrison believe that he had been appointed governor of Egypt in the room of Sabaces who had been killed in the battle of Issus. As soon as he found himself possessed of this important place, he threw off the mask, and declared his design of seizing Egypt for himself, and driving the Persians from thence. Whereupon the Egyptians, out of hatred to the Persians, readily joined him, and he, having formed a considerable army, marched directly for Memphis, where he defeated the Persians in a pitched battle, and shut them up in the city. But after this victory, permitting his soldiers to straggle up and down the country in quest of booty, the Persians sallied out upon them thus dispersed, and cut them all to pieces with Amyntas their leader (81).

Hereupon Alexander, having summoned the officers of the army into his tent, commanded the Egyptian soothsayers to declare what they thought of this phenomenon. These were well acquainted with the natural causes of eclipses, but without entering into such enquiries, they replied that the sun was predominant in Greece, and the moon in Persia, whence as often as the moon suffered an eclipse, some great calamity was thereby portended to the latter. This answer being immediately spread abroad among the soldiers it revived their hopes and courage; and Alexander taking advantage of this ardor, began his march after midnight, having on his right the Tigris, and the Gordyeon mountains on his left^a. At day-break the scouts he had sent out to reconnoitre, brought word, that Darius was on full march to meet him; whereupon he immediately drew up his forces, and put himself at the head of the b army. But as they drew near, he found that it was only a detachment of 1000 horse, which as the Macedonians advanced, retired in great haste to the main army; they were pursued by Aristo, commander of the Pæonian horse, who having defeated that body and killed Satropates their leader, brought back his head, and threw it down at Alexander's feet, telling him that in his country such a present was usually rewarded with a cup of gold. Alexander replied smiling, with an empty one, but I will give you a golden cup, and that full of wine^c. Not long after Alexander received intelligence, that Darius was not above 150 furlongs off; whereupon he halted to refresh his soldiers before the engagement, having in the camp great store of provisions. During this time he intercepted some letters wrote by Darius to the d Greeks, soliciting them with great promises either to kill or to betray Alexander. The king was in doubt with himself whether he should read them in a full assembly, for he relied as much on the fidelity of the Greeks as on that of the Macedonians; but Parmenio dissuaded him from it, telling him that even the raising of such thoughts in the minds of soldiers might be attended with some danger, and that the hopes of a great reward was capable of prompting a man to attempt the most enormous crimes. The king followed this prudent advice, and ordered his army to march forward^e. He was scarce set out, when an eunuch brought him word, that Statira Darius's wife was dead, whereupon he immediately returned, and entering the pavilion, where Syfigambis and the other royal prisoners were kept, comforted them in d so kind and tender a manner as plainly shewed his deep concern. He caused the funeral obsequies of the deceased princess to be performed with the utmost splendor and magnificence, which Darius hearing, and at the same time being informed with what respect Alexander had treated her in her life-time, he is said to have prayed the gods, that if the time ordained by the fates for the transferring of the Persian empire into other hands was come, none might sit on the throne of Cyrus, but so just, so merciful, so generous a conqueror as Alexander^f. And although he had twice sued in vain for peace, yet being overcome by the tenderness and humanity, which Alexander had shewn his wife, mother, and children, dispatched ten of his relations as ambassadors, offering him new conditions of peace more advantageous than the e former, and returning him thanks for the kind treatment he had indulged his family. He had in his former proposals offered him all the provinces of Asia as far as the Halys; but now he added the countries lying between the Hellepont and the Euphrates, that is, whatever Alexander was already master of, and offered 30000 talents by way of ransom for his family. Parmenio again advised Alexander to accept of the conditions, telling him that the provinces between the Euphrates and the Hellepont would be a great addition to the kingdom of Macedon, and that the Persian prisoners were only an incumbrance to the army, whereas the treasure offered for their ransom might be employed for the use of his troops, or serve to reward f the services of his friends. But Alexander, without hearkening to his advice, returned the following answer to the ambassadors; that the clemency he had shewn to the wife and children of Darius proceeded from his own good nature, without any regard to their master; that he did not make war upon women and children, but upon such only as appeared in arms against him; that if Darius had sued for peace in good earnest, he would have hearkened to his proposals; but since he continued to spirit up, with large bribes, his own soldiers to murder or betray him, he could not believe that his offers were sincere, and therefore was determined to pursue him with the utmost vigour, not as a fair enemy, but as a traitor and assassin; that as

- a to the provinces he offered him, they were already his own, and if Darius could force him to retire beyond the Euphrates, which he had already crossed, he might then offer them as his; that he proposed to himself, as a reward for the toils he had already endured, all those kingdoms which Darius still enjoyed; wherein whether he flattered himself with a vain hope or no, the next day's engagement should determine. He concluded by telling the ambassadors, that he was come into Asia to give and not to receive; that the heavens could not hold two suns, and therefore if Darius would submit to him; acknowledging him his lord and sovereign, he would then hearken to proposals. The ambassadors returned back, and told
- b Darius that he must prepare for an engagement; whereupon that prince encamped near a village called Gaugamela; in a large plain at a considerable distance from the city of Arbela, having before-hand levelled the ground that his cavalry and chariots might move and act with more ease. Alexander hearing that Darius was so near, continued four days in his camp to rest the army, and surrounded it with deep trenches and pallisades, being determined to leave there his baggage and such of his men as were indisposed. He set out about the second watch with a design to engage the enemy at break of day, and arriving at a rising ground whence he could discover their whole army, he halted and summoned a council, being in doubt whether he should encamp there or immediately fall upon the enemy. Parmenio
- c advised him to attack their camp in the night-time, alledging, that they might easily be defeated, if taken by surprize, and in the dark; but the king answered, that it did not become Alexander to steal a victory, and therefore he was resolved to fight and conquer in broad day-light. Accordingly he encamped there in the same order in which the army had marched, and after giving the proper orders he retired to repose the remaining part of the night, but being under no small concern he could not sleep till towards the morning, so that when his generals were assembled at day-break before his tent, they were greatly surprized to find that he was not yet awake. Parmenio after waiting some time thought fit to call him, and seeming amazed that he should sleep so sound when he was upon the point of hazarding
- d a battle, on which depended the empire of Asia, Alexander told him that Darius, by bringing all his forces into one place, had freed him from the trouble of thinking how he might pursue them into different countries. He then without delay put on his armour, mounted on horse-back, and having drawn up his men in battle-array, advanced to encounter the enemy, who was at a very small distance.

Both armies were drawn up in the same order, the infantry in the center, and the cavalry on the wings; Darius's front was covered with 200 chariots armed with scythes, and 25 elephants. Besides his guards, which were the flower of his army, he had posted the Grecian infantry near his person, believing this body alone capable of opposing the Macedonian phalanx. As his army took up a far greater space

e of ground than Alexander's, his design was to surround and charge them at the same time in front and flank; which Alexander suspecting, ordered those, who led the wings, to extend them as wide as possible without weakening the center. His baggage and the captives, among whom were Darius's mother and children, were left in the camp under a small guard. Parmenio commanded, as he had always done, the left wing, and Alexander the right. When the two armies were in sight of each other, the Macedonians halted, waiting till the enemies should advance to attack them, which they did accordingly, Darius himself charging in the first line. Arrian and *Curtius describe this battle at length; they tell us that the Persians were often repulsed, but returned again to the charge; that victory inclined sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another; that Parmenio, who commanded the left wing, was in great danger, and his men obliged to give ground; that Alexander's rear was put in disorder, and the baggage taken; that both kings wrought wonders, &c. But after all Curtius tells us, that the Macedonians, notwithstanding the great opposition they met with, lost only 300 men, and Arrian allows not a third of that number slain; whereas of the Persians there fell 40,000, says Curtius, 30,000 according to Arrian, and 90,000, if we believe Diodorus. From these accounts, we can form no other judgment of this great encounter, but that the Persians at the very first onset betook themselves to flight, and the Macedonians pursued them: for had the seven or eight hundred thousand men, which Darius a brought into the field, thrown each one dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the empire of the east at so easy a rate. In the heat of the battle, when the Macedonians were in the greatest danger, Aristander the soothsayer clothed in his white robes, and holding a branch of olive in his hand, is reported to have advanced among the first ranks, and in concert with Alexander to have cryed out that he saw an eagle hovering over the king's head, a sure omen of victory; he pointed with his finger at the pretended bird, and the soldiers believing him, and some even fancying they saw it, renewed the attack with more courage and resolution than ever. We are told that Darius seeing his numerous army put so shamefully to flight, drew his scimeter, and was sometime in suspense whether he should b lay violent hands on himself, rather than fly in so ignominious a manner, but at last resolved to save himself by flight, and arrived at Arbela the same night (Y). After he had passed the Lycus, some, who attended him in his flight, advised him to break down the bridge in order to stop the enemy's pursuit; but he reflecting how many of his own men were hastening to pass over the same bridge, replied, that he had rather leave an open way to a pursuing enemy, than shut it to a flying friend' (Z). He arrived about midnight at Arbela, whither he was followed by a great many of his nobles and commanding officers, whom he called together, and acquainted them that he designed to leave all for the present to Alexander and fly into Media, from whence and from the rest of the northern provinces c he could draw together new forces to try once more his fortune in battle. Alexander pursued him as far as Arbela, but before his arrival there, he was by the quickness of his flight got over the mountains of Armenia, attended by some of his relations, and a small body of guards called Melophori, because each of them bore a golden apple on the point of their spear. In Armenia he was joined by 2000 Greek mercenaries, who under the command of Pharon an Ionian, and Glaucus an Eclian had escaped from the battle. Alexander took the city of Arbela, where he seized on immense sums of money, with all Darius's rich furniture and equipage, and returned to his camp. After having allowed his army some days of rest, he set out on d his march to Babylon. Mazeus was governor of that city and province, and had after the late battle retired thither with the scattered remains of the body he commanded. But on the approach of Alexander's victorious army, he had not courage enough to oppose him; marching therefore out to meet him, he delivered the city and himself with his children into the conqueror's hands. Bagapbanes governor of the castle, where all Darius's treasures were lodged, did the same, and Alexander entred the city at the head of his whole army, as though he had been marching against an enemy. After a stay of 30 days in that city, he continued Mazeus in the government of that province, but giving the command of the castle and garrison to a Macedonian, he took Bagapbanes along with him, and marched towards e Susa, where he arrived twenty days after his departure from Babylon. As he drew near the city, Abulites governor of the place, sent his son to meet him, and acquaint him that he was ready to deliver the city and all the king's treasures into his hands. The king received the young nobleman with great marks of kindness, and using him as a guide, advanced to the river Choaspes, where Abulites himself met him with presents worthy of so great a prince; among other things he presented him with dromedaries, or running camels, of incredible swiftness, and twelve elephants,

(Y) This battle was fought at Gaugamela near the river Beumelus, as Ptolemy Lagi and Aristobulus, who were present, aver; they are followed both by Strabo (83), and Plutarch (84), and nevertheless because Gaugamela was only a small village, and the name not agreeable to the ear, signifying the camels house, the battle is said to have been fought at Arbela, which was a great and famous city in those parts (85). Gaugamela and Arbela were at a considerable distance from each other; for between the river Beumelus on which stood Gaugamela, and the Lycus, on the banks of which Arbela was situated; Curtius reckons 80 furlongs (86). According to Strabo's description of those places Arbela in Ptolemy's fifth map of Asia ought to be placed where we find Gaugamela (87).

(Z) In Justin we read Cydus instead of Lycus, which last river runs through the city of Tarjus in Cilicia; and hence it is, that Orosius, who ever follows Justin, was led into so gross a mistake as to think, that this great battle was fought at Tarjus (88).

a which Darius had sent for out of India. Having entred this city, the governor delivered up to him 50,000 talents in bullion, and 40,000 in ready money, with all the king's furniture to an immense value. Here he found part of the rarities, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, namely the brazen statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which he sent to Athens, where they were still standing in Arrian's time. As for the purple and scarlet robes he sent them all to Syfigambis, together with some others curiously wrought, which had been sent him out of Macedon; adding in his message to her, that if she liked the Macedonian robes, he would send her those who had wrought them that her grand-children might learn the art by way of amusement. At these words she could not help betraying some concern and uneasiness, it being looked upon by the Persian women as mean and unbecoming to employ themselves in works of nature; which when Alexander understood, he thought himself obliged to make an apology for what he had done; and accordingly went immediately to wait upon her, and beg that she would not consider that as an affront, which was entirely owing to his ignorance of the Persian manners; adding, that the robes he then wore were not only a present from his sisters, but wrought with their own hands^a.

Alexander having thus comforted Syfigambis, took his leave of her, and leaving a strong garrison in the city of Susa, advanced towards the province of Perfis. He arrived in four days march on the banks of the Pasitigris, which river he crossed with 9000 foot and 4000 horse, and entred the country of the Uxians. This province extends from Susiana to the frontiers of Perfis, and was governed by one Madates, who had married the niece of Syfigambis. Madates, who was not, like the other Persian governors, a time-server, but faithful to his sovereign, resolved to hold out to the last extremity, and with this design retired into a strong hold in the midst of craggy mountains, and surrounded on all sides by steep precipices. Here he held out for some time with great bravery, and, when the city was taken by assault, withdrew into the citadel, whence, seeing there were no hopes of being relieved, he sent 30 deputies to Alexander to treat of a surrender. The king, who was greatly provoked against Madates, would not at first hearken to any proposals; but in the mean time receiving letters from Syfigambis, wherein she intreated him to pardon her relations, he not only complied with her request, but set all the prisoners at liberty, restored Madates to his former dignity, left the city untouched, and the citizens in the full enjoyment of their antient liberty and privileges^b.

HAVING reduced the Uxians, he ordered Parmenio with part of his army to march through the plain, while he himself at the head of the light-armed foot advanced by the way of the mountains, which extend to the frontiers of Persia. The fifth day he arrived at the straits of Persia. These Ariobarzanes held with 4000 foot and 700 horse, which he had posted on the tops of the hills out of the enemies reach. As soon as Alexander advanced to attack him, the Persians from the tops of the mountains rolled down stones of such a prodigious size, that they crushed at once whole ranks. The king being greatly frightened at this sight, commanded a retreat to be sounded, and withdrew about 30 furlongs from the pass, where he lay encamped some time, not knowing how to advance, and being ashamed to return; but in the mean time a Greek deserter coming to his camp offered himself readily to conduct him through by-paths to the very top of the mountain, whence he might easily so annoy the Persians as to oblige them to abandon the straits, and leave an open passage to the whole army. He was as good as his word; for Alexander at the head of some chosen troops having followed his guide all that night through rocks and precipices, arrived a little before day-break at the top of a mountain, which commanded all the hills where the enemies were posted; which they observing, betook themselves to flight; and at the same time Craterus, who had been left in the camp, advancing with the troops under his command, possessed himself of the straits. Ariobarzanes with part of the cavalry breaking through the Macedonians with great slaughter both of them and of his own men, made his escape over the mountains, with a design to throw himself into Persepolis; but finding all the passes leading to that city guarded by the enemy, he returned back upon those that pursued him, and was killed with all those that followed him, after having cut in pieces great numbers of the Macedonians^c.

BEING now possessed of the straits, Alexander pursued his march into Perfis or Perfia, a properly so called. When he was some distance from Persepolis the metropolis of that province, he received letters from the governor of the place, acquainting him that the citizens upon the news of his approach were ready to plunder Darius's treasures, with which he had been intrusted, and desiring him to march with all possible expedition that he might seize them himself. Alexander, upon the receipt of this letter, leaving his infantry behind, marched the whole night at the head of the cavalry, and having passed the Araxes on a bridge, which by his order had been built some days before, arrived by day-break within two furlongs of Persepolis. The next day having assembled the generals of his army, he represented to them, that no city had ever been more fatal to Greece than Persepolis, the ancient residence of the Persian monarchs, and the capital of their empire; that from thence those mighty armies had been sent, which had over-run and laid waste great part of Europe, and that it was therefore incumbent upon them to revenge on that proud metropolis the many injuries and calamities which their ancestors had suffered. The commanders being encouraged by this speech, allowed their soldiers to practise all manner of cruelties against the miserable inhabitants, who were massacred in most barbarous manner. After this cruel execution, leaving Craterus and Parmenio in the place, the king with a small body went to reduce the neighbouring cities and strong holds, which all submitted at the approach of his troops; he then returned to Persepolis, and there took up his winter quarters. In this city he is said to have found 120,000 talents lodged in the treasury to defray the expences of the war^c.

DURING his stay at Persepolis, he gave himself up to feasting and drinking, making daily great entertainments for his officers to refresh them after the great fatigues they had endured. In one of these entertainments both the king and his guests having drunk to excess, Tbais, a famous Athenian courtezan, and at that time mistress to Ptolemy, who was afterwards king of Egypt, proposed the burning of Darius's palace, telling Alexander, with a gay air, that it would be matter of inexpressible joy to her, were she permitted to burn the stately palace of Xerxes, who had burnt Athens, and set it on fire with her own hands, that it might be said in all the parts of the world, that the woman, who had followed Alexander in his expedition to Asia, had revenged more severely the many calamities Greece had suffered from the Barbarians, than all the generals that had been employed against them. As the whole company was drunk, the proposal was received with general applause, and the king himself rising from table, and taking a torch in his hand followed Tbais. The rest of the Macedonians, crouding at this noise to the palace, armed themselves, after the king's example, with lighted tapers, and surrounding the palace, burnt it with the city, for the flames could not be stopt, down to the ground^d. Thus the most stately edifice in the world was, at the motion of a drunken strumpet, reduced to ashes.

FROM Persepolis Alexander marched early in the spring to Pasargada, resolved to pursue Darius who was fled to Ecbatan in Media. That unhappy prince had still an army of 30,000 foot, among whom were 4000 Greeks, who continued faithful to the last. Besides these he had 4000 slingers, and 3000 horse, most of them Bactrians, and commanded by Bessus governor of Bactria. When he heard that Alexander was in full march towards Ecbatan, he left that city with a design to retire into Bactria, and there raise another army. But he was not far advanced when he altered his resolution, and determined to venture a third battle with the forces then about him. While he was making the necessary preparations for the engagement, Bessus governor of Bactria and Nabarzanes a Persian lord of great distinction, formed a conspiracy against him, proposing to seize his person, and if Alexander pursued them, to gain his friendship and protection by betraying their master into his hands; but if they escaped, their design was to murder him, usurp the crown, and renew the war. They easily won over the troops by representing to them, that Darius was dragging them to destruction, that they were no ways in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, that they would inevitably perish, if they followed Darius, crushed under the ruins of an empire which was

- a ready to fall. Though these practices were carried on with great secrecy, yet they came to Darius's ear, but he could not believe them. Patron, who commanded the Greeks, earnestly entreated him to encamp among them, and trust the guard of his person to men on whose fidelity he might depend. Darius replied, that he had rather suffer any misfortune among those of his own nation, than seek for shelter among strangers, how faithful and affectionate soever he might believe them, and that he could not die too soon, if his own Persians thought him unworthy to live. Not long after Darius had occasion to repent his not following Patron's advice; for Bessus and Nabarzanes seizing his Person, bound him, out of respect to the royal dignity, in chains of gold, and shutting him up in a covered cart, fled with him towards Bactria. The cart was covered with skins, and strangers appointed to drive it, without knowing who the prisoner was they had in their custody^a. Bessus was proclaimed commander in chief in Darius's room, by the Bactrian horle; but Artabazus and his sons, with the forces they commanded, and the Greeks under the command of Patron retired from the body of the army under Bessus, and marched over the mountains towards Partbene^b. In the mean time Alexander arriving at Ecbatan, was informed that Darius had left that city five days before. Here the Thessalians shewing a great reluctance to accompany him any further, he gave them leave to return to their own country, and at their parting divided 2000 talents among them over and above their full pay; to such as were willing to continue in his service he gave three talents apiece^c. He then commanded Parmenio to lay up in the castle of Ecbatan the remaining part of the treasures, which, according to Strabo^d, amounted to 180,000 talents, and afterwards to march with the Thracians and great part of the cavalry into the country of the Cadusians. He dispatched orders to Clitus, who had fallen sick at Susa, to repair, as soon as he recovered, to Ecbatan, and from thence to follow him into Partbia with the cavalry and 6000 Macedonians, that were left in Ecbatan. Alexander with the rest of his army pursued Darius, and the eleventh day arrived at Rages, having marched in that space of time 3300 furlongs. Most part of those who accompanied him died through the fatigues of so long and expeditious a march; insomuch that on his arrival at Rages, he could muster but 60 horse-men^e. Finding that he could not come up with Darius, who had already passed the Caspian straits, he staid five days at Rages in order to refresh his army, and settle the affairs of Media. From thence he marched into Partbia, and encamped the first day at a small distance from the Caspian straits, which he passed the next without any opposition. He had scarce entered Partbia when he was informed by Bagisthenes a Persian nobleman, that Bessus and Nabarzanes had conspired against Darius, and designed to seize him. Hereupon leaving the main body of the army behind under the command of Craterus, he advanced with a small troop of horse lightly armed, and having marched night and day without ever halting except a few hours, came the third day to a village where Bessus with his Bactrians had encamped the day before. Here he understood that Darius had been seized by the traitors; that Bessus had caused him to be shut up in a close cart, which he had sent before that he might be the surer of his person, and that the whole army, except Artabazus and the Greeks, who had taken another rout, obeyed Bessus, and acknowledged him for their general. This was a fresh motive for Alexander to hasten his march; taking therefore along with him a small body of light-armed horse, for the others could not possibly proceed any further, he set out again the same night, and early next morning was acquainted by Orcillus and Misbracenes two Persian Officers, who in detestation of the treachery of Bessus had fled over to him, that the Bactrians were not above 500 furlongs off, and that they could lead him to them by a nearer way. Taking them therefore for his guides he set out again the same night, and after marching 300 furlongs was met by the son of Mazeus formerly governor of Syria, who informed him that Bessus was not above 200 furlongs off, and that his army, as not apprehending any danger, was marching in disorder, and might easily be surprized and cut in pieces. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and at last came in sight of the enemy. His unexpected arrival struck the Barbarians, though far superior in number, with such terror, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight, and because Darius refused to follow them, Bessus and those that were about him discharging their darts at the unfortunate prince, left him wallowing in his blood to the mercy of the Macedonians. This done they separated and took different routs, Bessus flying towards Hyrkania, and Nabarzanes into Bactria, that by this means they might elude the pursuit of the enemy, or at least oblige him to divide his forces. They were attended only by a few horse, the rest now destitute of leaders, dispersing themselves up and down the country as fear or hope directed their steps. Alexander seeing in what confusion the enemies were, sent Nicanor with a troop of light-armed horse to stop their flight, and himself followed at the head of 3000 Macedonians. Nicanor put near 3000 of the stragglers to the sword, but could not come up either with Bessus or Nabarzanes, which Alexander observing sent him orders to give quarters to all those that should throw down their arms and submit. In the mean time the horses that drew the cart in which was Darius halted of their own accord, for the drivers had been killed by Bessus, near a certain village about four furlongs from the highway; whither Polystratus, a Macedonian, being pressed with thirst in the pursuit of the enemy, was soon after conducted by the inhabitants to refresh himself at a fountain not far from the place where they stopt. As he was filling his helmet with water he heard the groans of a dying man, and looking round him discovered a cart with a team of horses, not able to move for the many wounds they had received. As he drew near he saw Darius lying in the cart and very near his end, having several darts still sticking in his body. However he had strength enough to call for some water, which Polystratus, being by a Persian captive informed of this barbarous tragedy, readily brought him. Darius after drinking turned to the Macedonian, and told him with a faint voice, that in the deplorable state, to which he was reduced, it was no small comfort to him that his last words would not be lost; he then charged him to return his hearty thanks to Alexander for the kindness he had shewn to his wife, mother and children, and acquaint him that with his last breath he besought the gods to prosper him in all his undertakings, and make him sole monarch of the universe. He added, that it did not so much concern him as Alexander to pursue and bring to condign punishment those traitors, who had treated with such cruelty their lawful sovereign, that being the common cause of all crowned heads; then taking Polystratus by the hand, "Give Alexander, said he, your hand, as I give you mine, and carry him, in my name, the only pledge I am able to give in this condition of my gratitude and affection." Having uttered these words he expired in the arms of Polystratus. Alexander coming up a few minutes after, and beholding Darius's body, burst out in tears, bewailing the cruel lot of a prince, who, said he, deserved a better fate. He immediately pulled off his own military cloak and covered it, causing it to be embalmed, and sent in a rich and magnificent coffin to Sysigambis, that it might be interred with the other Persian monarchs. Thus died Darius in the fiftieth year of his age, and sixth of his reign. He was a mild and pacifick prince, his reign having been unsullied with injustice, cruelty or any of those vices which most of his predecessors had been greatly addicted to. In him the Persian empire ended, after it had lasted from the first of Cyrus 209 years under thirteen kings, viz. Cyrus, Cambyses, Smerdis, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes I. Artaxerxes Longimanus, Xerxes II. Sogdianus, Darius Notus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Artaxerxes Ochus, Arses, Darius Codomannus. Upon the death of Darius all his commanders submitted to the conqueror, by whom they were restored to their former honours and employments; but above all others he distinguished Artabazus, in regard of his constant and unshaken fidelity to his master, and Oxathres, Darius's brother, whom he ever treated in a manner becoming his high station and noble birth. He was even, to his great dishonour, prevailed upon to receive and pardon Nabarzanes, who together with Bessus had murdered Darius. But Bessus having fled into Bactria, and there assumed the title of king, Alexander in the beginning of the next spring marched against him; but his march out of Persia into these northern countries is by authors described with great confusion; for after they had told us that he was resolved to find out Bessus in Bactria, they make him take the way of Hyrkania, from thence wandering northwards into the country of the Mardi, bordering on the Caspian sea, and after subduing the Mardi cross mount Coronus into Aria and Drangiana. Be that as it will, he arrived at last after a long

- a and tedious march in Bactriana, and having rested his army some time at Drapaca, he advanced against and reduced Sornas and Bactra, the two strongest cities of that province. Alexander had no sooner reached the confines of Bactria, but 8000 Bactrians who till that time had followed Bessus, abandoning him, withdrew to their respective homes. Hereupon Bessus at the head of the few troops, that continued faithful to him, crossing the river Oxus, retired into the province of Sogdiana, with a design to raise there a new army. In order to prevent Alexander from pursuing him, he burnt all the boats he had made use of in passing over his troops, hoping that as the river was no where fordable, and the country affording no timber, he would thereby be obliged to return and give over the pursuit. But no difficulties were
- b unformountable to that conqueror, who, finding no timber wherewithal to make boats or floats, caused the hides, which covered the soldiers tents and carriages, to be filled with straw, and tied together. By this means he supplied the want of timber, and passed his whole army over that large and deep river in the space of five days; which Bessus might have easily prevented, had he but dared to look the Macedonians in the face. When the Bactrians, who were encamped at a place called Nautaca, heard that Alexander had crossed the river, and was on full march to fall upon them, Spitamenes, whom Bessus most confided in, together with Catanes and Dasapbernes; formed a conspiracy to seize Bessus, and purchase their own safety by delivering him up to Alexander; which they did accordingly, tearing in pieces his diadem and royal robes, of which he had stript his lawful sovereign Darius, and carrying him loaded with chains to the Macedonian camp. Spitamenes himself presented the traitor to Alexander, not only bound, but stark naked, holding him by a chain round his neck; a sight no less agreeable to the Perfians than the Macedonians. Alexander, having amply rewarded Spitamenes and his companions, and caused the traitor's nose and ears to be cut off, delivered him into the hands of Oonistres, Darius's brother, to suffer whatever punishment he should think proper to inflict for so base and treacherous a murder¹. *Plutarch*² has left us an account of this execution; he tells us, that several trees being by main force bent down to the ground, and to each one of the traitor's limbs fastened, the trees as they were let return to their natural position, flew back with such violence, that each carried with it the limb that was tied to it. Thus Bessus suffered
- d the punishment that was due to his treachery, and at his death Alexander saw himself in quiet possession of the whole Perfian empire. This is what we have gathered from the Greek and Latin Historians of the best account concerning the affairs of the ancient Perfians: In the following section we shall hear the orientals on the same subject.

In stating the times of the Perfian empire we have followed all along Ptolemy's canon, and the records of the Greek and Latin authors. For the Jews own such kings only as they find mentioned in the books of the Old Testament; whence, according to their computation in the greater chronicle Seder Olam Rabbah, the Medo-Perfian empire, from the building of the temple in the second year of Darius Hystaspis, flourished only 34 years. Josephus acknowledges only the following kings of Perfia, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, and Darius; this Darius, who was Darius Nothus, he confounds with Darius Codomannus, who was conquered by Alexander, and refers to the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, whatever happened in the reigns of Artaxerxes Mucanus, and Artaxerxes Ochus.

The history of PERSIA according to the Oriental writers.

What degree of certainty may be expected in the following history.

WE have been so long used to hear every thing transcribed from eastern authors censured as vain and fabulous; that how unwilling soever we may be to trouble the reader with preparatory discourses, yet in this case, there seems to be a necessity of saying somewhat in support of the narratives we are going to recite, b that they may not be taken for mere figments, or romances void of all foundation. It is far from being our opinion, that every thing recorded by the Persian writers is strictly fact, that would be to place them not on a level with the best historians of other nations, but in a class high above them. For what people, what kingdom, what republick, can boast of such a faultless series of history? or why should we expect a greater degree of clearness in the history of Persia, as written by Oriental authors, than we find in the history of Greece, though written by Greeks, who were so proud of their own abilities, that they stiled all the rest of the world Barbarians? It is sufficient for our purpose (which is no more than to gain the reader's proper attention for what we have collected of the Persian history from eastern writers) e that we shew there is as just reason to suppose they have delivered us a great many truths in their accounts of these early times, as can be produced in favour of any other history as ancient. In order to this we shall neither multiply arguments nor words. In the first place, we are told by Moses a, that there were kings in Persia in the age immediately following that, in which the Persian writers placed the beginning of their monarchy. It is therefore evident that these writers are not wrong in making their kingdom so ancient as they do. But secondly, there is no just cause to doubt, that either as soon or within a small time after the settling of regal government amongst them, histories, or at least historical poems were also introduced. This was the custom in all places at least as far as we are able to trace things back. First, a d people lived miserably and without order, then some great genius reformed and reduced them into society, successive kings cherished and increased that society, and men having leisure and ease considered these benefits, and gratefully sung the praises of their benefactors. Moses has preserved two fragments of an Ammoritish poem, as old in all probability as the times we are speaking of; and if the bards of that country sung so early the praises of Sibon b, why might not the Persians have persons among them as capable of transmitting to posterity the memorable deeds of their princes? Thirdly, it is universally allowed, that the present Persians have not only quick wits, but are wonderfully studious, and in a particular manner addicted e to the conversation of the antiquities of their country. It may indeed be objected to this, that the modern and the ancient Persians are not one and the same people; but hereto it may be replied, that the Persees, the unadulterated remnant of the old inhabitants of this wide empire, are still more studious and more thoughtful than the present Persians c. We may therefore conclude, that there were formerly many authentick histories of the reigns of the most ancient kings of this realm; I say, we may conclude this from the reasons already given if we had no other proof, but as we have, it would be unfair not to mention it, especially since it may be drawn into very little room. The authorities which may be adduced in support of this asser- f tion, that the ancient Persians kept authentick records of their affairs, may be reduced under these two heads, viz. sacred and profane. The authors of the books of a Ezra and c Nebemiah speak frequently not only of the immutability of the Persian laws, which implies that they were recorded, but also of publick acts and registers. In the book of f Esther, we have not only frequent mention of these, but also of the chronicles of the kingdom, or rather of the kings of Persia, wherein every thing of moment was set down. As to prophane writers, g Herodotus and h Xenophon are sufficient to satisfy any impartial Person as to the wisdom and virtue of the ancient Persians, and their care of all things which had regard to the honour or welfare of their country.

- a SUPPOSING it therefore as clear as the nature of the thing will admit, that the Persians had amongst them of old the histories of their kings and heroes, we are next to shew how these can be reasonably believed to be yet in being, and to have reached these distant times. Of this however we are not positive ourselves; all that we can say is this, that the Persians having lived under their own laws down to the time of Tendegberd, there seems to be no difficulty in allowing that till then their histories were frequent amongst them: for though the Macedonians might burn and destroy their records, yet it is incredible that they should destroy all the books in the empire; besides we know that the modern Persees have the Zend or original Code of Zerdusht amongst them, with many other ancient books; now it being generally agreed that Zerdusht flourished in the days of Darius Hystaspes, it will be hard to assign a reason why some of their ancient histories might not be preserved as well as these books of their law. But farther still, Mohammed Ben Emir Khoandscab commonly called Mirkbond or Mirkbound, with other modern Persian authors, constantly and uniformly assert that they write from such authorities, and therefore we have no just reason to doubt them, unless we could shew the contrary (A).

How the ancient histories have been preserved.

It is from the author before-mentioned, that we take for the most part what is delivered in the following pages concerning the Oriental history of Persia. He is allowed to have been a person of great learning and judgment by such as are well versed in oriental history, and his works are esteemed as oracles throughout the east. On what authorities this history is founded.

- c We may justly hope therefore, that what we transcribe from him, with the addition of such circumstances as we can meet with elsewhere, will render this section as useful and as agreeable as could be expected on so abstruse a subject. Without farther introduction therefore, let us proceed to the catalogue of kings afforded us in his writings.

(A) This famous historian is quoted by various names, and those names have received some alteration from the different orthographies used in oriental appellations; sometimes he is called Mirkbond, sometimes Mirkbound, and sometimes Chondemir; he wrote a general history from the beginning of the world to the year of the Hegira 900, under the title of Rasmdat al Safa; he was a person of great natural parts, and of much learning, perfectly well skilled in the Persian antiquities, and wrote from the best histories extant in his time (1); for this reason we find him often quoted by the very learned Dr. Hugh (2), and indeed by all the writers of note on Persian affairs. His fame became known in Europe by an abridgment of his work, published in Spanish by Teixera, which is however far from being correct, there is a better extract extant in a book cited as the bottom of the page (3); we shall have occasion to speak hereafter of this author and his works when we come to the history of the age in which he lived, and shall therefore put an end to this note here.

The nature thereof in point of style, &c.

It is evident enough from the years set down in the two tables above, that there is a great mixture of fable and uncertainty in the accounts we have of these princes' reigns, but there may notwithstanding this be a great deal of truth in these relations, and by comparing them with what the Greek, and other writers of the Persian affairs have given us of the same times, it may be very possible to extract a better idea of the ancient Persian empire, than could have been had without consulting the oriental writers at all. Reason will be everlastingly the supreme judge of facts, and if a history be attended with continual improbabilities or absurdities, men of sense will either doubt or reject its authority, whether its author lived in the east, or in the west. On the other hand, where a history is composed of a series of mixt facts, some probable, and some romantick, the candid reader will receive those, though he throw away these, and will not destroy the wheat, because there are tares amongst it. As to the style of the following history, we have not pretended to follow the rhetorical pomp of the Persian authors; on the contrary, we have delivered our selves with the utmost plainness and perspicuity, and have endeavoured, as far as in our power lay, to rescue truth out of those metaphoric clouds, a clouds, which often obscure the writings of the eastern historians. Farther remarks of the same nature we leave to the discernment of our readers.

Keyomaras, or Cajumarath, is allowed by all the oriental authors to have been Keyomaras. the first king of the first race, surnamed the Pischedadians from Pischedad, which signifies a just judge, and was the surname given to Hushangh the second king of this race afterwards, however attributed to them all. The manner wherein Keyomaras ascended the throne was this. In the province of Aderbayagjan, the inhabitants feeling the sad effects of anarchy, and finding that liberty could not be enjoyed, where every one was free to do what he pleased, they unanimously resolved to elect one who should be obeyed by all, and to whose judgment they would submit as to an
b irrefragable law. His conspicuous virtues determined them on this occasion to Keyomaras, whom therefore they immediately owned for their monarch, invested him with royal robes, and put a bonnet called Tagi on his head, kissing his feet in token of submission, which customs last mentioned were preserved in use by his successors¹. His elevation had a proper effect on the mind of this new king; he applied himself to every branch of his duty; he erected courts of justice; he taught men to build houses, and to live in villages; he invented various manufactures, such as the making woollen cloth, and spinning, and weaving silk; in a word, he civilized his people, and merited by his wisdom, justice, and goodness, that dignity, which out of modesty and a foresight of the cares it would be attended with, he for a long time refused². The happiness enjoyed by such as lived under c so excellent a prince invited the neighbouring people to put themselves under his protection. Thus his empire was extended by the same means that it began, viz. thro' an opinion of his worth, and he upon their submission treated his new subjects with the same care and kindness as he had always shewn to his old. He sent his brother to take a view of these new-acquired dominions, and went afterwards to look upon them himself. In the province of Chorasán he met with his brother, and embracing him tenderly, he to perpetuate the memory of that interview erected the city of Balch, where it happened; that word being derived from a verb, which signifies to embrace. He was also the founder of abundance of other cities of Persia, particularly Kabulstan, Sigistan, Gom, &c.³. This prince had two sons, the name d of the elder was Nazek, a young man of wonderful prudence, who addicted himself intirely to study, for which reason he withdrew himself from his father's court, and lived with his wife in a little hermitage, where he gave himself over to contemplation; his father, who was himself a very learned man, went frequently to visit and converse with his son in his cell. Once going thither on the same errand, he found his son dead with several wounds upon his body: on a strict enquiry he was informed, that this cruel fact was committed by certain robbers of Tabrestán. These Keyomaras pursued into their own country, defeated them, and after putting many to the sword made slaves of the rest, and employed them in his buildings⁴. The other son of Keyomaras or rather his grandson was Siameck, with whom the wife of Nazek
e was big when he was murdered. This child as soon as he was born, Keyomaras adopted, bred him up with the utmost care, and having instructed him in all the arts of reigning, he with the consent of the people transferred the sovereignty to him, and made him king in his life-time. An event singular enough, if we consider that Keyomaras was the first to whom a crown in this country was offered, and the first also, who, disgusted with the weight of regal authority, desired to lay it down.

Siameck proved a gracious and a warlike prince. Within a short time after his acceffion, some of his neighbours entered his dominions in a hostile manner, whereupon he immediately raised an army, marched against them, and gave them battle, where fighting valiantly he received a mortal wound; he was carried out of the battle and f died in the arms of his wife, whom he left, as his father left his, big with child, conjuring her with his last words, if she brought forth a son to put him continually in mind of his unfortunate death, and to exhort him to revenge it on the people, who in so short a time had deprived him both of his life and empire. Keyomaras by this unlucky accident was forced to ascend the throne again. The first thing he did was to celebrate the obsequies of his deceased son with great magnificence, the next to take vengeance of those who had slain Siameck; after which he reigned for many years with great applause.

THERE is nothing more uncertain than the lineage of this king, and the time ^a in which he flourished. Some oriental writers have fancied him Adam, and because he was the first king would needs have him to be the first man also; but men of better judgments and cooler imaginations have conceived that this notion was owing to a mistake, and that the ancient Persians called him Adam by way of honorary surname, signifying that he was as much the father of their nation as Adam of mankind. The most judicious among the Persian writers believe him to have been the son of Aram, the son of Sbem, the son of Noah, and that he chose to erect the seat of his empire not far from mount Ararat, and the countries first planted after the flood. His religion is another disputable point, some holding him an idolater, and believing that the magnificent pile he reared for the burning of the body of his son Siamek, gave birth to the fire-worship ascribed to the Magians. But if we may credit graver authorities, Keyomaras, like most ancient kings, was at once both prince and prophet, taught his people the true religion of the patriarchs, particularly the existence of one infinite almighty being, and of a created evil being, the indefatigable enemy of mankind. The romance writers allow him a thousand years of life, and say that of these he reigned five hundred and sixty. How long he reigned before he resigned his throne to Siamek is uncertain, but from his resuming the sceptre to his death it is generally allowed there intervened thirty years ^b.

Hushang.

Hushang, or Houschenk, sur-named Pischedad, was a person of great parts, as well as great courage, and is equally famous throughout the east, for the extent of his knowledge, and his mighty feats of valour. He is said to have given a regular body of laws to his subjects, whence he was called Pischedad. He also divided his country, and established governours throughout, encouraged the working of mines, and invented most of the instruments of agriculture, as also the art of conveying water through subterraneous passages, for the moistening their grounds; to him likewise they ascribe the taming leopards, and other beasts of chase, and the introducing furs, for keeping the body warm in winter. As he made his kingdom flourish through his wisdom, so he extended it by his courage, and after a reign of fifty years was killed by the fall of a piece of rock thrown from the mountains of Damavend, by an army of Barbarians who came to invade his territories. Some ^c are of opinion that he made the province of Chusistan the seat of this empire, by erecting there the famous city of Susa or Sushan ^d.

THERE is hardly an ancient prince in the world whose name is more famous in romance than that of Hushang; there is a Persian book which bears the title of Hushang Nameh, i. e. Hushang's history, which for the many wonderful things it contains has been translated into the Turkish tongue. In this famous piece it is recorded, that our hero bestrid a monstrous animal, called Rakhsh, which he found in the dry island, or new world, being the issue of a male Crocodile, and a female Hippopotamus; this steed fed upon nothing but the flesh of Serpents and Dragons: after once Hushang had made this animal submit to the saddle, there was no giant so terrible, no monster so frightful, but he attacked and subdued. Amongst the rest of his conquests he reduced the people of Mabiser, so famous in the eastern romances for their having fishes heads, and thence esteemed a race of formidable monsters. The truth seems to be, that this prince subdued that people on the Persic gulph, called by the Greeks Ichthyophagi, from their living upon fish, whence the fruitful imagination of eastern poets deduced a people with fishes heads. The same fabulous writers ascribe to this monarch a certain book bearing the title of Giavidan Kbird, i. e. the wisdom of all times; this is a very famous piece, and is certainly ^e very ancient, and has been translated into various languages, particularly into Arabic, by the son of the vizier of the Caliph Almanon, and into Turkish under the title of Anvar Sobaili; it has also been in part rendered into French, and is in itself a very excellent treatise, whence in all probability it came to be attributed to this monarch, so famous for giving laws, and teaching wisdom and civility to his people; the reader will find a fuller account of the treatise before-mentioned at the bottom of the page ^f (B).

(B) This piece is penned with all the enthusiasm some very fine sentences, amongst others these natural to eastern writers; there are in it however which follow:

"Great

- a Tahmurasb, surnamed Diubend, i. e. the humbler of the devil, supposed by some Tahmurasb to be the son, by others the grandson of Hushang, and by a third party his cousin, succeeded that famous monarch, and governed with great reputation. For finding that the wars of his predecessor had introduced both poverty and confusion in his dominions, he to remedy the first remitted all taxes for three years, and to reduce things into order, made new laws, and took care that the magistrates should every where put them in execution. He is the first Persian prince recorded to have had a vizier or prime minister; it is very possible that the disorder in which he found the affairs of his empire, engaged him to make use of such an officer. This king fortified the frontiers of Persia to prevent sudden invasions, and shewed so happy a mixture of wisdom and valour in his disposition, that several of the neighbouring nations struck with the felicity of his subjects, voluntarily submitted themselves to him, and acknowledged him for their sovereign. At last, after a glorious reign of thirty years, a pestilence which raged throughout his dominions, and destroyed with equal rapidity both man and beast, cut the thread of his life at Balch to the great grief of his subjects.
- b Gjemschid, or Giamschid, or rather Gjem Schid, his name being Gjem, to which Schid as a surname was added, because of his wonderful beauty, Schid in the Persic Gjemschid language signifying the Sun, his eyes having such a lustre that none could look him steadily in the face, tho' some authors are of opinion that he received this addition to his name, not from the beauty of his person, but from the glory which resulted from his actions. It is not very certain whether this prince was the son of his predecessor, his nephew, or his grandson, but all agree that he was of the family of Keymaras, and had a just right to the throne. The reputation of his ancestors inspired him with a laudable ambition of equalling at least, if not excelling them. With this view he encouraged all learned and wise men to come to his court, where he highly preferred them; amongst the rest were two persons of singular abilities, on whom he chiefly relied, the one, a Jew, says our author Mirkhond, whose name was Fael Iffus Rabban, and the other a Greek, called Fithagores, i. e. Pythagoras: but this must be a mistake; for though we have no certainty as to the chronology of these times, yet it is easy to discern from the circumstances of things that Gjemschid flourished at a considerable distance from Pythagoras. But such errors as these are not infrequent among Oriental writers, through their want of understanding thoroughly the history of Greece, of which however they have most of them a general idea. By the advice in all probability of these wise counsellors, Gjemschid divided his subjects into three classes; the first consisting of soldiers; the second of husbandmen; and the third of artizans. In his time musick vocal and instrumental, and astronomy were first introduced in Persia. He was also the first who built granaries in Persia, into which he caused every year a certain quantity of corn to be carried, that in case of any deficiency in their harvests famine might not be felt.
- c In his time likewise wine came to be esteemed, or rather brought into general use throughout his territories from the following accident. A woman who was much in

Gjemscbid's good graces was afflicted with an inveterate head-ach, which all the physicians in the court of Gjemscbid were not able to alleviate or remove; this woman went into the place where the king's wine was kept, and drank of it very freely; and finding that it in some measure relieved her, she returned thither again after resting herself for some hours, and drank yet a greater quantity which completed her cure: this she told to the king, and it being divulged through the court, every body began to regard wine as a universal medicine capable of removing the most stubborn diseases. Among the most illustrious events of this great monarch's reign, we may justly place the rectification of the kalendar which he undertook and perfected, instituting two years, a civil or ordinary year, and an ecclesiastick year, in which there was in the space of one hundred and thirty years a month intercalated (C). He likewise instituted the Nauruz, i. e. the solemn observation of the new year, concerning which we are told that it had its rise thus; king Gjemscbid going in progress through his provinces arrived in Aderbayagjan, and shewing himself on a royal throne to his people, the sun shone with such lustre on his crown adorned with precious stones and feathers, that the people shouted aloud, and said, This is Nauruz, i. e. the new day, whence the king took the opportunity of instituting a festival, wherein besides the presents made to the prince, 'twas usual for him to receive and grant the petitions of all sorts of people, to release prisoners, and to do all other acts of clemency and benevolence which could be expected from him. As to the particular ceremonies attending this festival, the reader may probably be pleased to know that it lasted six days. On the first of these the king gratified his people, or if the phrase may be allowed, his commons. The second day he paid the same regard to the learned men attending his court. On the third his priests and privy counsellors presented their petitions. On the fourth he heard the suits of his nobility and kindred. On the fifth those of his children. The sixth belonged to himself. In the evening of the fifth day a young man handsome in his person was picked out, and appointed to wait at the king's door all night. At day-break he entered the chamber without ceremony, upon which the king with an air of familiarity asked him whence he came, whither he went, what his purpose, and his name, wherefore he came, and what he carried; to which the youth answered, I am Al Mansur, i. e. August; my name is Al-Mobarek, i. e. the Blessed, I came hither from God, bearing the new year. Then he sat down, and immediately entered the nobility, bearing each a silver vessel, in which were wheat, barley, pease, vetches, pulse, a sugar-cane, and two pieces of gold fresh from the mint. Out of this basin first the Wasir or Vizier, then the treasurer, afterwards the nobility according to their rank, each offered his silver vessel to the king. At the conclusion of the ceremony a very great loaf made of several kinds of corn was brought in and placed before the king, who after eating some of it himself, intreated such as were present to eat the rest in these words, This is a new day of a new month, the beginning of a new year; it is fit therefore that we renew our ties to each other. Then rising up in his royal robes he solemnly blessed his nobility, bestowing on them rich gifts. The evening of this day the Persians called Pbristaph, on which they did every thing that might testify joy and strong hopes of seeing a pleasant year. A great part of his reign Gjemscbid remained in Sigjiban, thinking it the properest province of his empire for his court till affairs in the east were thoroughly settled; then he changed it for the proper Perfa, where he erected the noble city of Esfachar, which most take to be the Persepolis of the Greeks, though some believe it the city of Schiras. If what the ancient Persian writers deliver of the extent of this city of Esfachar be true, viz. that it contained a square of twenty four leagues, then it is possible that both opinions may be true; but if we measure the probability of this account by the other things related of this prince, such as that he made the tour of the whole earth, was skilled in the occult

- a sciences, and possessed a magic cup of incomparable virtues; we may safely restrain the bounds of this city, and though we allow it to have been very great, especially for those times, yet we may conceive it not to have taken up more than a third part of the space they have assigned it. It is universally allowed that Gjemscbid gave himself up entirely to the study of the arts of reigning, and some say that he was much helped in his political contemplations, by considering the transactions among the bees, and that he drew many customs from the hive into the court of Persia. Among other inventions the signet ring is ascribed to him, and that mode which still prevails throughout the east, of preferring the left hand to the right as the more honourable; he likewise directed that the different degrees of people should be distinguishable from their garb; in a word, he made it the whole business of his life to render his kingdom flourishing, and his people happy, in which he succeeded to his utmost wish. But this great felicity proved the source of the deepest misfortunes; for having reigned long and gloriously, he unaccountably took it in his head that he was immortal; sent pictures of himself throughout his empire, and ordered them to be worshipped with divine honours. This madness soon lost him the hearts of the people, so that the province of Sigjistan, by the persuasion of a certain great captain who was related to the king, and whose name was Abad, took arms, and when they had formed themselves into a regular army, marched under the command of Zoak or Dabac towards Schiras, where Gjemscbid met him with a powerful army
- c which he had raised; the engagement was fierce and bloody, but in the end Gjemscbid was defeated and taken prisoner; upon which the tyrant ordered him to be immediately sawn asunder, which was performed in Zoak's sight. This is the account given by Mircband, and the best Arabian histories; others say that he escaped from the battle, and wandered through his dominions. He left behind him a son whose name was Pbridun or Apbridun of three years old, whom his mother Pbramak found means to conceal from his enemies, and to breed up privately till providence enabled him to ascend the throne of Persia.

- Dehoc*, Dabac, Zabak, Zoak; some authors affirm that the name of this prince is only an alteration of a nickname bestowed on him by the Persians, viz. Deb-ak,
- d signifying that he had ten ill qualities, which made him hateful and abominable, and that his real name was Piurash. It is very uncertain of what family this prince was; some report that he was lineally descended from Siamak, the son of Keyomaras; others that he was an Arabian, the son of Ulud, descended in a direct line from Abad, the chief of the Adites. The truth seems to be, that he was an Arab by the father's side, but descended of the house of Keyomaras by the mother. There is indeed another fabulous genealogy or two, which scarce deserve to be mentioned, because they are glaringly false; the one supposes but two generations between him and Adam, the other that he was descended from Ham, the son of Noah, and is to be looked on as the Nimrod of the scriptures. It is very likely that all these
- e stories were invented to disgrace a prince whose cruelty rendered him odious, or that they happened through some mistakes in reading or transcribing the works of ancient poets. As this monarch gained the crown by his sword, so he governed fiercely, and with little regard to his subjects. He was however a person of great genius, and deeply skilled in the occult sciences; in one word, he is represented to us as a compleatly wicked man: One whose abilities answered the evil intentions of his soul, and whose person struck beholders with horror, for he had a meagre pallid visage, eyes wild and sparkling, an air fierce and haughty; at the same time that his body was deformed, and his whole appearance terrible. The natural sourness of his temper was irritated by a sharp and incurable disease, consisting in two
- f painful ulcers, one on each shoulder, the anguish of which resembled the pain following the bite of a serpent; whence the story inserted in a famous oriental romance, that the devil having for many years obeyed him, demanded at last as a full reward, that he might have leave to kiss his shoulders, which being granted, an ugly serpent immediately took post in each, and gnawed itself a den in his flesh. Either some forcerer, or the devil in a dream, suggested to Zoak an inhuman remedy for this evil, viz. that of washing these ulcers frequently with the warm blood of men; or, as others say, applying to them the brains of men newly slain. At first the tyrant put to death criminals of all sorts; but when there were no more of these, he fell without mercy upon the innocent, that he might have wherewith to alleviate his pain. The priests and other persons in authority had recourse to all the arguments they could use to engage him to have recourse rather to the blood or brain of sheep, but to no purpose; those however who were intrusted with the care of these unhappy wretches destined to slaughter, for the tyrant's ease, often out of mere pity let them slip through their fingers, so that flying to the mountains in order to preserve themselves and their benefactors from danger, they there formed themselves into a particular nation, called since the Curdes^a. All his reign long Zoak caused Pbridun, the son of his predecessor to be searched for, but to no purpose, his mother took care to hide him out of the reach of Zoak's enemies. However, the tyrant discharged his wrath upon her father, whom he put to death, as he did many others whom he suspected inclined to the interest of the young Pbridun. The chief cause of these proceedings was a dream, wherein the tyrant beheld three men who came to attack him; these he thought threw him down, and bound him. Afterwards, one of them gave him a mortal wound on the head, then the other two loosened his girdle, tied his feet therewith, and carried him into the territory of Damavend. Having applied to the most skilful interpreters of dreams in his dominions to know what this signified, they unanimously agreed that it portended the loss of his kingdom, and of his life, because amongst the Persians the girdle is a mark of dignity, now this Zoak conceived could never be done but by Pbridun and his party. Among the numbers put to death, on various accounts, by Zoak, were the sons of a certain smith, whose name was Gao, or as others write it Kaob. This man driven to madness at the sight of his children's blood, ran up and down the streets, crying out for justice and help against the tyrant, holding up a leathern apron in his hand, as if it had been a standard. In a short time the army he got together, became very formidable, so that he made himself master of various strong forts, and great cities, particularly of the city Heri, or Herat, the capital of Cborasan, where he staid for some time to put his affairs in order; and when he found that he was in a condition to bid Zoak battle, he made a long oration to encourage his people, assuring them amongst other things, that he had not taken arms with any view to his private advantage, but that as soon as he had restored them to their liberty, he would leave them to elect whom they would for a king. The people with one accord offered the sovereignty to him, which he as positively refused, telling them that as the sense he had of his own injuries had put him upon first taking arms, so he would never consent to injure others; that Pbridun the son of Giamschid was their lawful prince; that they ought to bring him immediately from his retreat, and put him at their head. Popular humours are easily turned; the army on this speech grew as loyal to Pbridun as they had been grateful to the smith. Pbridun observing the spirit of his people, and being informed that Zoak's army were by no means hearty in his interest, he marched with the utmost expedition to meet him, and the armies engaging after a brisk action, Zoak's troops abandoned him, and he was taken prisoner, whereupon Pbridun ordered him to be conducted to the mountains of Damavend, and gave directions for his being imprisoned in a cave there. This victory being gained about the time of the autumnal equinox, the Persians instituted a feast in memory thereof, which they called Mibirgian, or rather Mibragjân^b (D).

(D) The history of Zoak makes a prodigious figure in the Persian romances; what is related in them of him being to us absurd as well as fabulous, it would be to no purpose to swell out a note with such stories. It is very likely that the poets immediately after the time of this cruel prince drew the most invidious characters of him they could devise, and heightened all the mischievous things he did with the utmost force of their inventions. If we conceive to ourselves poets writing with this view, and at the same time advert to the genius of oriental writers in general, and to poets in particular, we need not be at a loss for all the strange things that we now read of Zoak, and yet allow the first authors of them to have been men of good sense too. Metaphors well understood, allusions readily apprehended, and allegories easily explained, in one age appear all as matters, or at least as circumstances of fact in ages which succeed; and hence it comes to pass that a stroke of poetic satyr, or the rhetorical flourish of an author is misapprehended for a strict assertion, and so deliver'd by historians, who come after, and transcribe all they find without weighing or considering how or in what manner it was wrote. The first historians in all countries were poets, the second race prose-writers who copied from them; and hence it is that ancient histories are full of grave fables, which through length of time are hard to be understood:

- a Pberidun, Apbridun, or Feridoun, this prince proved one of the greatest, wisest, and most successful monarchs that ever ruled in the east; his first act, after being quietly seated on the throne, was to make Kaob the smith general of his armies; after which he sent him towards the western parts of his dominions in order to reduce such provinces as during the troubles of the kingdom had shook off the Persian yoke. Kaob spent twenty years in this enterprize, in which space he added many fine countries to the Persian empire; at length the king recalled him and made him governor of Aderbayagjan, which he ruled ten years with equal satisfaction to the people and his prince, and then died much regretted by Pberidun, who to do honour to his memory gave all his estates among his relations, and then taking
- b his sons into his own court, bred them there in a most honourable manner; and when they grew up gave each of them greater possessions than their father had acquired*. To shew his gratitude yet more, he made the leathern apron which Kaob had hung upon a stick at the begining of the insurrection, the royal standard of Persia, calling it Dirfesch Kaviani, i. e. the standard of Kaob, that he might perpetuate his name and services to all posterity. This standard he adorned with precious stones, to which his successors continually adding, it became at last of such inestimable value, that being taken by the Arabians in the battle of Cadesia, it enriched the whole army*. As Pberidun was desirous of restoring peace and good order throughout all his dominions, he sent persons not only of great parts but eminent for their integrity, to govern all the provinces under his dominion. He married also with a view of interest only the daughter of his predecessor Zoak, by whom he had two sons Salm and Tur, but these proving like their grandfather, haughty, obstinate, and cruel, he took a Persian lady to his bed, by whom he had a son named Irege, equally wise and courteous, so that he became at once the darling of his father, and the delight of the people. Thus things passed on till Pberidun feeling himself beginning to decline under the weight of age and illness, summoned his grandees together, and having informed them of his design to quit the regal dignity, desired to know which of his sons they wished he should make his successor; these lords unanimously answered, that if he would no longer govern himself, they desired to have
- d Irege for their prince, to which Pberidun assented; but to prevent his brothers from taking this ill, he gave to Tur all the eastern provinces of his empire, to Salm the provinces on the other side, and restrained Irege within the compass of Persia, Alyria, and Mesopotamia. From this division came the names of Turon and Iran, the one signifying that great extent of country which lies to the east of Persia, and the other Persia itself, and the provinces dependant thereon^b. As for Tur he built a noble city which he made the capital of his territories, calling it after his own name Turon, and the country Turquestan; this city was seated in the province of Mauaralnabar in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea, and hence the nation inhabiting that tract of country acquired the name of Turks^c. However large those shares might be which
- e Salm and Tur had received from their father, they still hated him and their brother Irege, whose ruin they concerted together. Things being at last ripe for the execution of their projects, Salm and Tur marched each with great forces into Aderbayagjan, and having joined their armies, they sent a sort of manifesto to their father, wherein they set forth, that with just reason they were displeased with the kindness which he had shewn Irege, whom they stiled a bastard, and declared at the same time that they would never lay down their arms till he was deposed flood: this has been the fate of Greece, and of Rome, of Britain, of Ireland, and why not of Persia? But fiction, though it may oblige, yet it does not absolutely destroy truth. Zoak was in all probability an Arabian invader, who, after making himself master of Persia, used his new subjects ill, till the weight of the loads he laid upon them grew too heavy to be born, and then they did, what a people may always do, threw them off their shoulders, and would bear no more. As to what we are told of his being confined in the caverns of Damavand, or rather of Danavand, we think it may be understood to mean no more than that he was kept there in some strong castle. These mountains are in the province of Aderbayagjan, which, as we have more than once remarked, is part of the ancient Media; they are rocky, full of caverns, and consequently have a gloomy appearance. The poets therefore, taking the same licence here allowed them elsewhere, have feigned that Tabmurab after overcoming the Divs or vil Genii, imprisoned them in these grotto's; and by degrees these expressions grew so frequent, that a wizard or a tyrant was as readily sent to the mountains of Damavand as among our common people ghosts are chained, or, to preserve the true phrase, laid in the bottom of the Red-Sea.

From the sovereignty, and the countries divided between them, which hitherto had been in his possession. Pbridun justly displeased at this undutiful behaviour, sent immediately his orders to Irege to draw together all the forces he was able, and to march against his brethren. Irege however desired the king to have recourse to milder measures in hopes of preserving the peace of the empire. Pbridun was of a contrary opinion, and determined to reduce the rebels by arms. Irege however, unwilling to do his brothers any wrong, took with him some of his wisest counsellors, and went with them to his brother's camp, in order if possible amicably to adjust the differences between them. They, who wished for nothing more, immediately seized him and struck off his head, which having stuck on a pole, they insolently sent to their father. Pbridun was excessively grieved at his son's misfortune; he resolved however to carry on the war against Salm and Tur; in order to which he gave the dominions of Irege to his son Manugeber, who immediately marched with an army against his uncles. They despising his youth quickly came to an engagement, in which the two brothers were routed and lost their lives by the hand of Manugeber, who after this glorious victory returned in triumph to his grandfather Pbridun who was now grown blind; when he heard the acclamations of the people at the entrance of Manugeber, he asked who it was that presumed to enter his presence in such a manner. The young victor cried out, It is your grandson Manugeber, the avenger of the blood of Irege, who hath slain Salm and Tur with his own hand. Pbridun then received him with open arms, and with all the demonstrations of paternal fondness. Afterwards he took the Yagi or Tiara from his head and put it on that of Manugeber or Manugjar, declaring him thereby sovereign of Persia, appointing at the same time one Soam or Sobam, a person of great wisdom and valour, to be his vizier. Within a short space after this, Pbridun died full of years and glory (E).

As to the personal qualifications of this prince, he is celebrated by oriental writers as the Solomon of Persia, one who made it his whole study to govern his people in such a manner as that they might enjoy greater felicity than if they had lived in a state of freedom. He extended his dominions with a view of extending happiness to those whom he reduced under his obedience. He was a zealous worshipper of the true God, and took such care to repress Zabism, that some Mohammedan authors have not scrupled to assert that he was a mussulman. It is also recorded of him that he left this advice with his successor:

Believe, my son, that the days of your reign are so many leaves of a book; be careful therefore to write nothing in any page thereof, that you would not have seen by posterity. Many other wise sayings of this great prince are scattered in various authors, which we have neither time nor opportunity to insert here. Some Persian writers think that Pbridun was co-temporary with Abraham. On the other hand, the learned Dr. Hyde has entertained a notion that this Pbridun is the Phraortis of Herodotus^f, it

(E) The oriental writers are universally agreed that the terms Touran and Iran expressive of the two great empires on the other and on this side the Oxus, called by them the Gjibun, took rise at this time. It may seem strange that such large tracts of country should receive appellations from persons who lived and governed them so short a time; for it appears that Irege, Tur, and Salm, all died in the life-time of Pbridun, and within a small space after the partition of his dominions amongst them. But when this is more thoroughly considered, the wonder will cease. The monarchs of these extensive kingdoms were through a long course of ages, at war with each other; and this enmity proceeding originally from the quarrel of their ancestors, it was natural enough for them to call their dominions after those in whose right they held them. The whole empire belonged to Pbridun; the descendants of Tur or Tour kept up the claim of their ancestor to the whole; the kings of Persia succeeding Manugjar asserted the right of Pbridun to divide his dominions as he pleased; and therefore it is likely that Iran and Touran were words first used in Persia, and by degrees spread themselves throughout the east. Whether Tur was the undoubted father of the Turks will admit of some question, since almost all the oriental writers affirm, that Japhet had a son called Turk, and yet many of them admit that Turquesian had its name from the prince we speak of. It would be needless and at the same time improper for us to enter into a prolix discussion of that point here, since it must be examined when we come to write the history of the Turks; however, we think it not amiss to remark, that there is nothing stranger or more perplexed in this double derivation of the name of the Turks, than there is in that of the Hebrews, whom some affirm to have been so called from Heber the son of Salah, and others from the surname of Abraham, who was styled the Hebrew from his coming from the other side the river, i. e. the Euphrates. Such difficulties amuse weak minds, but men of solid understandings easily pass by these doubts, knowing that there is little more of certainty to be found in searching for the rise of denominations of far later date.

a would take up too much time to discuss this controversy here, and besides we shall have occasion to resume this subject hereafter, and to consider the opinions of the critics on oriental history all at once; in the mean time let us pursue the thread of our narration, and proceed to the reign of Pbridus's grandson (F).

Manujabr or Manugeber, according to some authors, was not the son of Irege, but Manujahr, his grandson by a daughter; it is not very material to us which of these opinions is true^a, certain it is that he was a prince wise and of a mild disposition, and had a minister, viz. the vizier Sobam before-mentioned, whose fame is still great throughout all the east. Manugeber, probably by his advice, made several just regulations in the government of Persia; he ascertained more exactly than any of his predecessors had done the boundaries of the provinces, into each of which he sent a president or governor, independant of whom he established in every great town or borough a mayor or provost, so that the governors had no opportunity of setting up for themselves, and the provosts were obliged to behave themselves prudently for fear the governor should write against them to court. Observing the infertility of Persia to be chiefly owing to the want of water, Manugeber considered every way of supplying this defect; he caused fine canals to be cut from the mighty rivers Tigris and Euphrates to refresh the barren countries in their neighbourhood; he took care to collect all the streams issuing from the little springs on the tops of mountains, that their waters might be made as useful as possible. To encourage his subjects to cultivate their lands with care, he employed much time in gardening, and took great pains to discover the virtues of herbs and flowers, causing such as were most valuable to be transplanted from mountains and uncouth places into his own gardens, or those of his courtiers. But while he was thus cultivating the arts of peace, Apberasiab, the descendant of Tur or Tour, invaded his dominions with a great army of Turks, in order, as he gave out, to avenge the death of his ancestor. Manugeber finding himself too weak to resist so formidable an enemy, retired towards the country of Tabressian; some authors say, that there happened a battle between him and Apberasiab, and that Manugeber was routed. However that matter was, all are agreed that the king of Persia withdrew into a fortress, and prepared to defend himself there against the attempts of his enemy. Apberasiab besieged him with all his army, but to no purpose; and the winter drawing on, the Turk being afraid lest his own men should desert him, began to think of peace. Upon this commissioners were dispatched on both sides, and a treaty concluded on these terms; that Apberasiab should possess all the country east of the river Gibon, and that he should leave Manugeber without molestation in possession of Persia, and the provinces dependant on it. Such was the event of this cruel war which threatened no less than the subversion of the monarchy of Persia^b. As soon as Apberasiab was retired into his own country, Manugeber began to provide against such invasions for the future. He ordered all his governors to provide their quota's of troops; but these measures alarming Apberasiab, he gave orders to his forces to make inroads into Persia; but the Turk had not the same success in this as in the former war. The precautions of Manugeber perfectly answered his end, so that the enemy were not only repulsed where-ever they made their courses, but also lost a great number of their soldiers who were taken prisoners.

(F) The reader will easily perceive from the characters he has already seen drawn in this history, that among the oriental nations wisdom as well as valour is thought necessary in a hero. Pbridus is as famous amongst them as any of the heroes of Greece or Rome amongst us; and for the same reason, because he was a man great in all things, in war and in peace, at the head of armies, and on the throne. On this account oriental writers preserve with as great care the wise sayings of their princes, as the accounts of their conquests. We have excused ourselves above from the repetition of all that has been recorded of this sort in relation to Pbridus; but the reader will in all probability be pleased with the following specimens of his sapience, because they contain rules easily applied, and which concern mankind in general.

Man should weigh well the nature of himself,
The varying frailness of this flatt'ring world,
And the true excellence of heaven's high lord;
Then would he this despise, and trust in him.
The world deceives us all.—In God is truth.
Let not thy riches or thy power prevail
To swell thy bosom with conceits of pride;
Look back, remember those thou hast seen high,
And mark, if thou hast never seen them sink;
Let this teach thee. One end awaits us all!
And when inevitable death commands,
That we should follow to his dreary realm,
Matters it much, if from a royal couch,
Or from a mattress thrown upon the ground,
We rise to take our journey (5)?

Apherastab therefore very willingly renewed the peace, and left Manugeber to act a as he thought fit in his own dominions. That wise and good prince made the city of Sigjistan for a time his royal seat, and when by his presence he had put all things on that side in good order, he sent thither his vizier Sobam to preserve all things in quiet, and went himself to reside in the centre of his empire, where he applied himself, as he had done before, to the cultivation of arts and sciences, and to every thing which might render his people powerful and happy. Sobam managed all things in the province of Sigjistan so as to gain the good-will of the people as well as to maintain the favour of the court; but in the midst of his happiness an accident fell out which surprized him not a little: his wife was brought to-bed of a son with long yellow hair, Sobam therefore gave him the name of Zal-zer, i. e. golden hair; b this young man when he grew up to years of discretion gave manifest tokens of an exalted genius, insomuch that Manugeber sent for him and his father to appear at court. Thither they went, and the sight of the young nobleman augmented the esteem and gratitude Manugeber had for his father and family. Loaded with new honours and dignities, Sobam and his son returned into their own country, and lived there with the same splendor and reputation that they had done before. One day it so happened that Zal-zer went to hunt in the province of Kabloustan, dependant on the kingdom of Touran, but bordering northwards on the Persian dominions. Meberab, who was at this time governor of that province, being informed of this, went out to meet him, that he might shew his respect to the father by the honours c paid to his son. The conversation he had with Zal-zer charmed him so much, and made so strong an impression on his mind, that he could not help talking of him to his family upon his return home, which had such an effect on the mind of Roudabab his daughter that she fell violently in love with Zal-zer on his report; and, as women's passions are ever sudden and ungovernable, she sent immediately one of her maids into the place where Zal-zer was incamped, that she might find an opportunity of speaking with him. Her project succeeded perfectly well, the young nobleman perceiving the maiden gathering flowers, entered into discourse with her, enquiring her condition, and with whom she lived. The girl properly instructed, answered him that she was the servant of Roudabab, the daughter of Meberab, and d then fell a talking of the family, expatiating on the wit, beauty, and sweet dispositions of her lady. Zal-zer immediately conceived a great esteem for this amiable person, which by degrees ripened into so warm a passion that he could neither eat nor sleep till he had concerted the means of speaking to her. An interview, as our author observes, between two persons who equally desire it, is very quickly obtained; the lovers made the best use of their time, that is they exchanged the most solemn vows of fidelity, and engaged to marry each other as soon as the consent of their parents could be obtained. To cover his amour, Zal-zer made a visit at the same time to the father of his mistress, by whom he was very kindly received, and after staying with him all night, set out on his return to his father in the province of Sigjistan. e Almost as soon as he came home he acquainted Sobam with all that had happened, and that it was impossible for him to live, at least in any degree of happiness, without the possession of the daughter of Meberab. Some difficulty there was in procuring the king's consent to this marriage, for it was hitherto a thing without precedent for a Persian to espouse a Turk. However the many services of Sobam, and the great merit of Zal-zer prevailed so far over Manugeber, that he at last yielded to all they desired. The nuptials were celebrated with prodigious magnificence; the inhabitants of Sigjistan and Kabloustan vying with each other in their expressions of joy on this occasion; nor were the consequences of this match less happy than its conclusion was splendid, for at the end of nine months the lovely Roudabab was f brought to bed of a son who was named Rustan, the mighty hero of all the oriental romances¹. The reader will hereafter perceive how the loves of this illustrious pair came to find a place in the Persian history. Let us now return to Manugeber, who spent all his time in putting the affairs of his kingdom in the best order imaginable with respect both to peace and war; that is, he took care to banish luxury, to encourage virtue, and to render every man's condition so happy as to engage him to fight for that government on the continuance of which it depended. The personal qualifications of this monarch have been already in some measure displayed; it remains a however that we do him justice in one particular of greater importance than all the rest; he was a most zealous worshipper of the true God, of which we have the most shining instances in the history of his life and reign, written by Tabari^a an ancient Persian author. By him we are informed, that as soon as this prince heard of the Turks passing the river Gjeibon in order to drive him out of his dominions, he assembled a great council of his nobility, wherein he delivered himself in these words; "The most holy and high God delivered to me this kingdom, that I might render him praise and glory by my actions as a prince, preserving my people in plenty and ease, and impartially distributing justice, that thereby the glorious gift of God might in my hand be strengthened and increased. If contrary to this my duty I had acted ungratefully towards my creator, then I should justly have deserved b " to lose my kingdom here, and to suffer everlasting punishment for my wickedness hereafter. The most holy and high God having caused me to be born of royal blood, and in right thereof bestowed a kingdom upon me, let us not my friends basely throw it away, or tamely suffer it to be taken from us; consider well of the state we are in, and to-morrow I will more largely inform you as to my sentiments of the matter." The next day accordingly the nobles of Persia assembled again, and the king being seated in his throne of state with his royal crown upon his head, and the Mubad Mubadan, or high priest seated near him in his golden chair, he rose up and spoke as he had done the day before, ascribing all dominion to the Almighty, and acknowledging that the crown of Persia was his gift; he then c observed that all things depended alike on the will of the supreme being, and that nothing could take effect but by his command, or with his permission. He said farther that God had long indulged the Persian nation in the full enjoyment of many blessings, in consequence of which they were bound to live in exact obedience to his laws, that is, making a proper use of the good things bestowed on them. He added, that as to the point at present before them, viz. the invasion of the Turks, it came not but by the permission of God, wherefore to him they ought first to apply themselves for its being taken away. He exhorted them to reform their lives, to be constant in prayer, to exert their courage and their understandings in the defence of their country, and to rest stedfastly in the hope that the Almighty would

d not forsake them; but restore them again to peace and quiet, either by giving them a victory over their enemies, or inclining the hearts of their enemies to peace. The piety of this prince was rewarded with a very long life and reign; as to the extent of the former we have no certainty, but as to the latter authors agree in fixing it at 120 years. They say likewise that the death of Manujabr was like his life majestic and serene; that he called to him his son and successor, gave him in few words his advice as to the government of his dominions, and recommended his subjects most affectionately to his care^b.

Nudar or Naudar succeeded his father; but his reign was far from being as happy. Nudar.
He was scarce seated on his throne before his grandees began to form parties, and e to create seditions in his empire; which weakened it so much that the Turks immediately conceived hopes of conquering it, a thing they had long set their hearts on. With this view Pasbogh at that time king of Touran, the direct descendant of Tour; the son of Phridan, called his sons together; and having expatiated first on the right which their family had to the kingdom of Persia; and secondly of the low state the Persian affairs were then in; he told them that the intent of his drawing them together was to know which of them had courage enough to assert the pretensions derived to him from his ancestors; and to undertake the reduction of the provinces on the other side the Gjeibon. Apberasfab his eldest son stung with ambition; and desirous of excelling his brethren, immediately offered himself to raise an army in order to conquer Iran. Accordingly he drew together 400,000 horse and foot;
f and with this prodigious army entered Sigjistan. Nudar as soon as he was informed of this caused his best troops to file off that way; and gave the command of them to Sobam the father of Zalzer; but he being old and decrepid was forced to march slowly towards the enemy, and even that fatigued him so much that he died before he had reached the place of rendezvous, an event highly pleasing to Apberasfab, who very much dreaded the valour and conduct of this great man. Nudar not doubting that Sobam and his troops were already arrived at the place he appointed them, marched with his army towards Maxanderan, where on a sudden; and before a he expected it, they came within sight of the enemy. The camps being opposite to each other, a Turkish champion, whose name was Bafmon, challenged any of the Persian warriors to a single combat, which challenge was readily accepted by Kobad the grandson of Koab, of whom we have said so much in the life of Pbridun. The combat terminated in favour of the Persian, who having slain his antagonist spoiled him of his arms, and carried them as the trophy of his victory to his tent. The Turks were prodigiously incensed at this accident, and resolved with themselves to revenge it speedily on Nudar and his army. Accordingly having possessed themselves of all the posts about it, they attacked the Persians in their camp, where a most obstinate battle was fought, till at length there happened such a prodigious shower of rain, attended with such an extraordinary darkness, that Nudar laid hold of this opportunity to retire, and to order his sons Thus and Gustam who were at the head of separate bodies to march speedily to his relief, which they did accompanied by Karen the brother of Kobad, who had found means to withdraw the royal treasures out of Sigjistan, and to send them to a place of safety. Apherafiab observing the measures taken by Nudar, and conceiving that his intent was to spin out the war, he, to prevent its running into a length, which in the end would have been destructive to his troops, sent an officer of his whose name was Karabon with positive orders to attack Karen, and the body of Persians under his command, which accordingly he did, killed their commander, and effectually dispersed the rest. Not long after Apherafiab attacked Nudar in his camp, and after obtaining a signal victory, took that monarch prisoner in his flight with many Persian nobles. As soon as they came into his presence Apherafiab ordered them to be cut in pieces, but his brother a prince of great humanity and wisdom hindered him, and prevailed on him to content himself with putting them in prison, to which with much ado he yielded. The next step after this victory was to possess himself of the court and treasures of Nudar, in order to which Apherafiab instantly detached a body of 30,000 men; they entering the province of Sigjistan made themselves masters of the capital and of the royal palace, the Persians being every-where so intimidated that they durst not stir, but submitted tamely to the yoke, which conquest had imposed upon them. Meherab it seems after the marriage of his daughter to Zal-zer had retired into Persia, and lived in great honour and affluence there, till this sudden overthrow of the empire threatened him as well as the rest of its inhabitants. Meherab, being a man of great policy, bethought himself of a means to divert immediate danger by sending a messenger to Apherafiab with very rich presents, and a letter to this purpose, "That though he lived in Persia, he was by nation a Turk, and not only so but in some measure allied to him in blood, being lineally descended from Zoak, wherefore he hoped his family and this early testimony of obedience would be sufficient to recommend him to his special protection." Having thus amused the victor, he gave notice to his son-in-law Zal-zer, who assembling, as privately as he could, several small bodies of men, appointed them a place of rendezvous, where he himself joined them, and finding them numerous enough to attempt somewhat against the common enemy, he began to act offensively, and in a short time drove the Turks out of the province of Sigjistan. Of which when Apherafiab received intelligence, it provoked him so much that he ordered the unfortunate Nudar to have his head struck off in prison, which was accordingly put in execution without the least regard to his dignity. As to the length of his reign authors are divided, some making it seven, others enlarging it to nine. Mirkbond, whom we generally follow, adheres to the former number. Some oriental writers make this prince co-temporary with Josbua, others place him much higher; we shall not determine here who are in the right.

Apherafiab.

Apherafiab or Afrasiab, notwithstanding this rebellion, or rather insurrection, looking upon himself as a monarch of Persia, sent an account to his father Pasbangh of the happy success with which his expedition had been crowned. But it was not long before he had news of another nature to send him; for the Persians, universally detesting his haughty and insolent temper, began to raise seditions in every part of the kingdom; nay, their aversion engaged them in steps which carried their intrigues farther, and made them endeavour to stir up the brother of Apherafiab, who had at first a saved Nudar's life, to put in his claim to the throne, promising him at first assistance and then obedience. He, burning with the ambition natural to his family, listened readily to the proposal, and advised them to engage Zal-zer to invade the provinces in the neighbourhood of Sigjistan in the spring, assuring them that the war once begun he would appear in their favour. These negotiations could not be carried on so secretly, but that Afherafab gained intelligence of them; and immediately set all his wits to work to prevent their taking effect; with this view he caused his brother to be assassinated, and then applied himself indefatigably to the raising troops, resolving to reduce all his opponents. Zal-zer being informed of these proceedings, b and vehemently regretting the loss of the young Turkish prince, openly excited the Persians to take arms, deriding their cowardice, and giving them to understand that more than half their enemy's strength lay in their fears. His discourses by degrees had such an effect, that the inhabitants of Persia assembling together in small bodies marched by night through secret and by-ways to his camp; where when they were all arrived, Zal-zer found himself at the head of a very formidable army*. Afherafab, who had his spies every where, receiving an exact account of Zal-zer's situation, immediately resolved to change his manner of making war, and to act altogether on the defensive. This gave the Persian captain a great deal of trouble; but at last he found an opportunity of bringing Afherafab to a battle; it was c very bloody, and so obstinate that it lasted till it was dark, and then each army, retiring to its camp, found that neither side had any reason to boast of victory; the war continued for a long time after this without any decisive action, whereby all industry being destroyed, there followed first a scarcity, then a famine, and on the heels of this a grievous pestilence; which falling at once into both camps, filled Afherafab and Zal-zer with thoughts of peace. Negotiations were not long on foot before a treaty was concluded; whereby it was stipulated that Afherafab should withdraw his troops and effects without molestation and retire into Touran, while Iran and all its dependencies should remain under the protection of Zal-zer: this peace d concluded and ratified, it would have been easy for that nobleman to have raised himself to the throne of Persia; but he scorning to barter immortal fame for a short-lived royalty, sought out Zab or Zoub the lawful heir of the House of Keyomaras, and put the crown upon his head*.

Zab, Zoub, or Bazab, at the time of his accession to the royal dignity was far advanced in years, but had notwithstanding a tolerable share of health and spirits; he applied himself to the restoring as well as he could the shattered affairs of Persia; the more effectually to do this he associated with him in the empire, Gberschasp his nephew, who some have called Kischasp, and have made him not the nephew and associate, but the son and successor of Zab or Zoub; but this seems to be a mistake, and the ground of it pretty obvious, the father of this Gberschasp being called e Kischasp. But to return to Zab he sacrificed much of the prerogative of the crown to make the people easy, and to enable them to recover their losses after the wretched depredations committed by Afherafab and his troops; he did more than all this, he threw open the royal treasury, and as often as any sums were paid in there, he first paid his soldiers, and then distributed the rest among the poor. These were certainly high virtues, but this prince is branded for a vice particularly infamous on a throne, viz. that of gluttony, or rather luxury in eating, and is recorded to have been the author of various sorts of sauces and broths unknown before in these regions. It is not very clear how long he reigned, or who was his successor. Mirkbond makes him expressly the last of the first race of kings, who from the surname of Hushangh were called in general Pischdadians, though to us it seems more f probable that they received this appellation, because during the several reigns of these princes the laws and constitution of Persia were thoroughly settled*. According to other authors Gberschasp or Kischasp succeeded in the empire by the voluntary cession of Zab or Zoub; his mother is said to have been a Jewess of the tribe of Benjamin, he proved a prince of great merit, and deserving of a better fate than he met; for he did all in his power to restore the Persian diadem to its ancient lustre. Afherafab, little regarding his treaties took advantage of the disorder the kingdom was in, to re-enter it with a formidable army, and to possess himself of various a provinces. The new king fought under great disadvantages, but in spite of these he frequently defeated the Turks, and recovered various places out of their hands, at last however he fell into the error of many of his predecessors, that is he put all his affairs to hazard in one battle, which he lost and with it his life, being killed fighting bravely for the liberty of his country after a reign some say of six, others of thirty years; but whether the former may not include the reigns of Zab and of this prince too, or whether the latter ought to be accounted the time that this monarch reigned alone, we pretend not to determine. In this all are agreed that here the empire of the Pischedadians ended, and that Afrasiab the descendant of Tour became b a third time absolute lord of Persia; how he afterwards lost the possession of this empire will be shewn in its proper place*. In the mean time it may not be amiss to insert here some remarks on the foregoing period, in order to justify the observation we have so often made, that oriental history, though mixed with fables, is not altogether useless.

In the course of this work our method has been to speak first of the chronology, and afterwards of the history of each country; in the present case it was impracticable, unless we had tormented the reader with needless repetitions, and nauseous tautologies. We have therefore chosen to give the series of the Persian history relating to the kings of the first race, as it lies in Mirkbond and other authors; and after c laying down these facts as foundations of our arguments, to lead the reader by degrees to what we esteem the true state of the ancient Persian empire. In the first place it is remarkable, that the oriental writers make this race of kings Medians by descent. The province of Aderbayagjan, of which they make Keyomaras to have been at first sovereign, is a part of Media, taking in also a part of Armenia; so that in all probability it was one of the first peopled provinces of the dominion of Shem, if we suppose that territories were ascertained and set out immediately after the flood. Within this province stands the little town, that is, considering it in its present condition, Nacksbivan, which the inhabitants affirm to have been the first town built after the flood; and indeed in the Armenian language the very d name implies as much, it being equivalent to the first place, or, first habitation†. Thus the early erecting of a monarchy hereabouts is rendered every where probable, and consistent with the most ancient accounts sacred and prophane. As the power of Keyomaras increased, he extended his territories towards the east, and towards the south; for it is agreed that he made himself master of Irak-agami, afterwards Parthia, and in process of time joined thereto the province of Pbars or proper Persia, where some historians affirm he founded the city of Istacbr, afterwards called Persepolis, though others deny it, and say it was built later. The successors of this prince conquered Kbirman and Sigjistan, and afterwards many other countries on the east of the present Persian empire. It was Pbridun or Feridoun who settled the dominions of Persia in pretty near the same order we find them at this day; it e is evident therefore that the kings of the first race were not petty princes or tributaries, but lords of a very extensive empire. As to the capital of their dominions in the time of Keyomaras, some think it was at Balch in Cborasan, others at Istacbr. Perhaps he might first fix his residence at Balch, and afterwards remove it into the heart of his kingdom. Hushang resided again at Balch, Gjemscbid settled himself at Istacbr, and is by most of the Persian authors esteemed its founder. In the reigns of succeeding kings, though their royal residence might sometimes be changed, yet Istacbr remained the capital, and received from time to time great improvements from the Persian monarchs. Kischtasf the last of them had a peculiar liking to this place, and no doubt took pains to re-edify whatever injuries it might have sustained through the course of a long war. Thus the glory of this city, which was afterwards so famous among the Greeks under the name of Persepolis, began, as we observed in our description of Persia, under the first race of kings*. How it was afterwards adorned with a royal palace, of which the ruins are still remaining, we shall shew in the history of the princes of the second race; in the mean time let it be remembered, that several princes of the dynasty of Pischedadians were great lovers of arts, and great encouragers of ingenuity and learning; if therefore there were in their time, especially in the days of Manugeber, who is particularly famous in the

- a. oriental history for delighting in architecture, and every thing dependant thereon ; if in his days we say there were any artists capable of carving in stone, they might have employed their time in cutting some of those wonderful histories in Bas-relief, which are yet visible in the living rock, behind the ruins of Gibilmar, or of the other works of a like kind remaining in other parts of Persia. This we say is possible, and not improbable, but we affirm nothing; the piety however of Manngeber is a circumstance nothing unfavourable to this conjecture, that the king praying before the fire, and in sight of the sun, represented in the mountain before-mentioned, might be intended for him. This leads us to the religion of these ancient kings, which we have already shewn to be very near the true religion, that is the religion of the patriarchs. As to the worship of fire, it was indisputably a very ancient doctrine; and there seems to be no reason for doubting the truth of what some authors have affirmed, that it took its rise in, if not before the time of Keyomaras. Certain it is that the province where he began to reign was the first in which magism prevailed, and was always held sacred by the professors of that religion on that account; this the very name implies, for Aderbayjan is no more than the place of fire, Ader or Azer signifying fire, and Bayajan a place, whence it comes to pass that we frequently find this word thus written Azerbayajan. The high mountain of Albors was the principal place of worship in these early times, and the people were persuaded that celestial fire was preserved there; on this account when the treasures of Nudar king of Persia were removed out of Sigistan, as we have before related, they were for security placed here. Nay, what is far more extraordinary, this superstition is not yet worn out of the heads of the Ghaurs, if we may believe Sir John Chardin; on the contrary they yet speak confidently of celestial or elemental fire, which they say is still to be seen in this mountain¹. On the whole therefore, the religion of the Persians under the first race of kings differed very little from that which still subsists among the Ghaurs. Some indeed have been of opinion that there were no Pyræ or fire-temples at all before the time of Zoroaster or Zerdusht; others on the authority of some Arabian writers assert the contrary, so as it seems probable that the former is the opinion nearest truth. Our reasons for saying this are these, first the ancientest historians extant say nothing of temples till after the time of the Exodus of the children of Israel. Secondly, because Herodotus says expressly that the ancient Persians had no temples, but sacrificed on the tops of high mountains sub dio; and thirdly, because of Pyræ being at that time in use, is not consistent with the history of Zerdusht, as we shall shortly have occasion to shew. From the power and the religion of the first race of Persian kings, we come at length to the intricate question, When they flourished? or rather how their reigns are to be reconciled to sacred and profane history? Before we pretend to give the solution of this problem, let us consider a little what sacred and profane historians say of the ancient kings of Media and Persia. The scripture informs us that Elam was a very ancient kingdom, for Cbedorlaomer came with a great army to reduce the region of Pentapolis in Canaan, and the circumjacent countries to his obedience in the days of Abraham; from thence we hear nothing of this nation, till the kingdoms of Israel and Judab were on their decline. In respect to these ancient times the Greek writers are very insufficient guides, if we may believe the most judicious writer of history that nation ever produced, viz. Thucydides, who very frankly declares they knew very little of their own affairs beyond the memory of man², that is, they were able to give no account of them with order and certainty. They were indeed a bold and pretending people in history, as well as in other sciences, but they seldom told their stories in a manner capable of gaining them belief.
- f. Herodotus pretends not to say any thing of the history of the Medes, above one hundred and fifty years before the time of Cyrus, where he places Dioeces, whom he makes the first king of Media, and speaks of his advancement in that dignity, in terms³ exactly correspondent to those made use of by Mirkbond in his history of the election of Keyomaras. Diodorus Siculus, who really deserves the highest credit, because he took the utmost pains to be well informed, and spent a long series of years in collecting the materials for his history; gives us a list of ten Median kings reigning in all 282 years⁴, but the critics are not pleased with these, because Diodorus took them from Ctesias, and Ctesias had his materials from the Median and Persian records, an odd reason for disbelieving all he says. But it seems, Ctesias's account did not consist well with those that the Greeks had given before him, and therefore he lost his credit, and his history was rejected as fabulous. By the same rule of argument our oriental history must be condemned too, for it is as inconsistent with the Greek history, as the memoirs of Ctesias, and for the very same reason; because it is taken as his history was from what the Medes and Persians say of themselves. Not to keep the reader long in suspense, there is evidently a great gap of time between the erection of the old Medo-Persic monarchy, and its being destroyed by the Assyrian emperors. The question is, whether we will suppose that these people lived all that time without doing any thing; because none of the Greek historians except Diodorus from Ctesias have vouchsafed or indeed have been able to tell us what they did, or whether we shall admit Ctesias's exploded method, and fill up this chasm with what the Persians say of themselves? If this latter course be to be steered, here is room for all the Pischedadians at once. But then as to the synchronism of their reigns we desire to be excused from settling it, because at present we see no likelihood of our doing it with any degree of exactness. However when the Persian history according to oriental writers shall be deduced as low as the reign of Yezdegerd, the last native of that country who swayed its sceptre, we shall reconsider this point, and set the whole chronology of the Persic empire in the best light we may. In the mean time we shall conclude these observations with remarking that Ctesias and all others who have at any time thought of enquiring as to the Persian history from the Persian records, have found in the most early times great and potent princes reigning here, marching vast armies into the field, erecting great cities, laying up immense treasures, and ruling with an equal mixture of wisdom and magnificence. Now this is exactly what we say from Mohammedan writers, who own they have taken all which they deliver from the old Persian writers; if therefore all this be fable, 'tis at least very ancient and uniform fable, or to speak seriously, it has as much the appearance of truth as any history as ancient that we know of. But it is time to leave reasoning and conjectures to return to the thread of our history, and to shew the steps by which Apberasiab was expelled, and the Persian dominions once more restored to a prince of that country.

The history of the Persian kings of the second race, or of the dynasty of the Kainites.

Keykobod.

Keykobod, or Caicobad, whom some writers make the son of Zab, the son of Tabamasp, the son of Manugeber, king of Persia, and others call simply the nephew of Nudar, was seated on the throne of Persia by the famous Zal-zer, who was so loyal to the family that raised him, that he twice refused the Persian diadem, because he would not injure them. At this time he and his son Rustan put themselves at the head of such a body of troops as enabled them to give Apberasiab abundance of trouble, and by degrees to put into the possession of Keykobod the greatest part of the provinces of Persia. This monarch proved at once a good prince to his subjects in general, and extremely grateful to the persons particularly concerned in raising him to the empire. He intrusted the command of all his forces with Rustan, and did nothing in civil affairs without the advice of his father; by degrees his troops under the command of the famous hero before mentioned gained such advantages that Apberasiab retired before them, and was at last driven to such distress that he desired to treat of a peace; but his commissioners, and those of the king of Persia, differing about the terms, Apberasiab hazarded a second battle, wherein notwithstanding his troops fought with great resolution, he was totally defeated. In the heat of this engagement, Rustan desired some of the officers about him to shew him Apberasiab, which when they had done, Rustan spurred towards him with such an impetuous force that he beat him from his horse, and afterwards dismounting from his own he tied his hands and feet together with a cord, and having laid him before himself upon his own steed rode out of the battle, and threw him in a particular place. Apberasiab finding himself left alone, struggled with such force, that he at last got loose; then taking the cord, he tied the hands and feet of a dead man as Rustan had tied his, and retired to a troop of his own horse, with whom he made his escape. After victory had declared itself in favour of the army

- a army of Keykôbad, Rûstân rode up to salute him. Amongst other compliments of congratulation, he informed him that the war was now at an end, himself having made Apberasfab prisoner, whom he also promised immediately to produce. Riding to that end, to the place where he had thrown the Turkish monarch, he found with surprise a dead man tied in his place; for this oversight of his he asked pardon of Keykôbad, and solemnly promised, that if he met Apberasfab in battle again, he would not make the same mistake. But that prince finding his affairs desperate in Persia, retired into Turquesân, and sent from thence an ambassador to treat with Keykôbad, who was easily prevailed on not to carry his arms into Touran; when the right of him and his family to Iran was acknowledged by Apberasfab; and all the
- b scattered remnants of his army withdrawn. The peace once settled, Keykôbad applied himself to the restoring the affairs of his kingdom, and in the first place fixed his court at Spabawm, which had been built by the famous king Houhangb, adorned by Pbridun, and afterwards given by him to Kaob the smith and his family. The reason in all probability which determined Keykôbad to reside here, was its convenient situation in the heart of his dominions. His court once fixed, the king next bestowed his favours on such as had been instrumental in the expulsion of the Turks; to Rûstân he gave the province of Zablustân, on the borders of Indâh, watered with many pleasant streams, and adorned with the finest prospects that can be wished. This province afforded a surname to Rûstân, and received
- c itself a new name from him. That hero being stiled in most of the romances Zabêli, because he was governor of Zablustân; and that province, or at least a great part of it, was thenceforward called Rûstândar, because it had been the government of Rûstân. Mabarab, surnamed Kabuli, because he had been governor of Kabul; was another of Keykôbad's generals, and highly esteemed by him. Kavun one of the descendants of the famous Kaob the smith; was also a person highly esteemed by this king of Persia; but what particular rewards he received, authors do not mention. It seems he was a sort of knight-errant, and acquired from thence the surname of Rezm-Khuab, or the searcher of adventures. A fourth captain of Keykôbad's was Kesrbvad, surnamed Zerîn-Kulab, from a golden tiara which he was
- d allowed to wear, in reward to the mighty things he had done for the good of the empire. Keykôbad divided all the spoil that had been brought into his treasury among his soldiers, regulated their pay very exactly, and afterwards employed them in making great roads throughout the empire, setting up publick marks at the end of every four thousand paces, which space by the Persians is called Pberfengb, and from thence by the Greeks Parasang. As this monarch was renowned for his wisdom and prowess, so he was no less famous on account of his piety; the Mohammedan writers insist very much upon this, they assert that he had many prophets who resorted to his court, that he received, honoured and obeyed them, and in time was a true believer, by which we are to understand that he was not a fire-worshipper;
- e but in this they are certainly mistaken. They make him also cotemporary with Shmul, the judge of Israel, and assert that he had some intercourse with him. In the last years of his life he grew blind, and continued so till the day of his death, which happened as some historians say after a reign of one hundred years; according to others, when he had reigned one hundred and twenty years.

Keykaus or Caikaus, the son, or as some say the grandson of Keykôbad, succeeded Keykaus him in the throne of Persia, on which he was scarce seated before a war broke out in Mazandran, a province bordering on the Caspian sea; which required his presence; a rebel prince taking occasion from the demise of Keykôbad, made himself

f sovereign there; and fortified the capital in such a manner that he made it the strongest place in the east. Keykaus marched immediately against him, and coming with too great an army to be opposed, the rebel shut himself up in the city of Mazandran, and prepared for a siege. Keykaus having viewed the place, and having received intelligence that it was extremely well provided with all sorts of ammunitions and victuals, gave over all hopes of reducing it by force. But as in such cases 'tis usual for experienced generals to have recourse to stratagems, Keykaus devised one which answered his end effectually; he gave out in his camp, and he corrupted people to give it out in the city, that he was extremely distressed for provisions, and should be on that account obliged shortly to raise the siege. His emissaries in the place immediately insinuated to the keepers of the stores, that by supplying the king of Persia with small quantities of victuals, immense sums might be got; this trade once on foot, Keykaus paid so well, that in a short time there was not a loaf left; he then summoned the city peremptorily to surrender, and on a discovery of their circumstances the inhabitants were forced to submit^b. He had not the like success in another war, undertaken in this province against Apberasiab; for the Persian army being defeated, king Keykaus was taken and thrown into a prison, from whence he was released by the timely care of his general Rustan, who entering Touran with a numerous army, he wasted all before him with fire and sword, declaring that he would destroy the whole country if they did not set his master at liberty; which so terrified the people, that their clamour prevailed on Apberasiab to dismiss Keykaus on his promise to recal Rustan. As soon as the Persian monarch had regained his liberty, he made use of the hero we have so often mentioned to curb his enemies on every side; and he is recorded to have carried his arms into Mezz, i. e. Egypt; Sbamab, i. e. Syria; and Rum, i. e. Asia Minor. After these wars were over, and all things in a quiet situation, Keykaus, to shew the high esteem he had of Rustan's services, gave him his sister in marriage; the name of this princess was Gehernaz, i. e. endowed with all virtues, and with her by way of portion he gave him the office of generalissimo of all his armies, and made him vicar-general of his kingdom, with the title of Pebelevan, Giban, i. e. supporter of the Persian empire. We are not told who it was Keykaus himself married, but whoever she was he had by her two sons, named Siavek and Pbrailorz; the eldest of these, viz. Siavek was sent to live with, and to be bred up under his uncle Rustan. How long things continued in this tranquil state does not appear; but the next war we hear of was against Zulzogar king of Arabia. What provocation he gave Keykaus is uncertain; but the king of Persia carried his resentment so far, that he had well nigh reduced the whole kingdom of Yemen, over which Zulzogar reigned under his dominion; at length it came to the ears of Keykaus that this Arabian prince had a daughter the most lovely woman in the world, upon which the Persian king sent to demand her in marriage; the king of Yemen, desirous to be rid at any rate of such an enemy, sent immediately his daughter to the king of Persia's Haram. As soon as Keykaus beheld Saudabab, he was so struck with her beauty, that he conceived himself the happiest man in the world, by having her in his possession. Overcome therefore with the violence of his passion, he abandoned himself to all sorts of excesses, giving great entertainments, and encouraging all sorts of diversions in his camp, without so much as remembering that he was in an enemy's country. Zulzogar, who foresaw all this, drew together privately a considerable body of horse, and falling unexpectedly on the Persian army absolutely defeated it, and made the king and all his court prisoners. The news of this no sooner reached Persia, than Rustan put himself at the head of the forces left under his command, and marched with them immediately into Yemen. Zulzogar knew very well that he had no troops capable of contending with the veterans under the command of Rustan, and for this reason he treated the king of Persia, while in his power, with the utmost civility and respect, so that he had no great difficulty in prevailing on him to send his general orders to forbear hostilities, and to think of peace. A treaty was quickly concluded between the father and son-in-law, whereby the former quitted all pretensions to the kingdom of Yemen, and promised to invade it no more, while the latter engaged to be the friend and ally of the Persian nation, and to assist it to the utmost of his power; in consequence of which Keykaus was immediately set at liberty, with all those who had been taken prisoners with him, and returned triumphantly into Persia with his new spouse Saudabab^c. Not long after this Siavek came to court, and was received with the utmost affection by his father. Saudabab, either charmed with the beauty of his person, or affecting so to be, solicited him to an incestuous amour, which he being a prince of great virtue rejected with abhorrence; upon which, waiting a proper opportunity, when the king was one day alone in his parlour, Saudabab rushed in with her hair dishevelled, her night-gown torn, and her breast bloody, crying out for justice against Siavek, who had made an attempt

- a upon her honour; the king immediately caused his son to be imprisoned, and obliged him to stand a trial; some say he underwent the ordeal by fire, however it was, the young prince was acquitted, and the wickedness of Saudabab clearly appeared. Upon which the king would have put her to death if his son had not interceded for her on his knees. These proceedings having created some divisions and heart-burnings in the court of Persia, Apberasiab who waited all opportunities of distressing that nation failed not to take this, and to pass the river Gjibon with a great body of troops, in order to besiege Balc. Keykaus, roused by the impending danger, ordered his son to march into Sigjistan with twelve thousand horse, there to join the
- b forces under the command of Rustan, in order to make head against the enemy. Syavek readily obeyed, and after joining his uncle Rustan, marched with such expedition, that they were soon in the neighbourhood of Apberasiab, and his army; but not thinking fit to hazard an engagement immediately, they took care to pitch on a very strong camp. Apberasiab knowing that his affairs would not permit him to carry on a long and lingering war, attacked them therein, which Rustan foresaw, and provided so well for his reception, that he was not only repulsed, but his troops suffered so much in the attack, that he began sincerely to think of peace, in order to prevent the coming of this army of Persians into his dominions. With this view he sent commissioners to the camp of Syavek and Rustan, in order to
- c settle the terms of a perpetual alliance; they were very kindly received, and the young prince his uncle, and two Persians of great quality, who were of his council, settled with them the heads of a treaty very advantageous to Persia, which being ratified by Apberasiab, the young prince dispatched an express to carry the peace to his father. It seems the intrigues of Saudabab had created this deserving young prince many enemies in his father's court, who took this opportunity of persuading the king that Syavek had exceeded his commission, and injured the majesty of the Persian empire by the treaty which he had made. Keykobad influenced by these suggestions, dispatched his uncle Thus to the army with letters full of sharpness, with respect to the young prince, and with directions to deliver up the command to Thus, and to signify to
- d Rustan that the king thought him now old enough to take his rest, and therefore desired him to retire to his government of Sigjistan. Rustan obeyed, and the prince continued in the army, which now marched to the frontiers of Turquestan, in order to act offensively against Apberasiab. When they were arrived in the neighbourhood of the river Gjibon, the prince taking with him Piran Vissch, an officer of distinction in the Turkish army, who had remained with him as an hostage, went directly to the court of Apberasiab, to shew him how contrary to his humour it was to be guilty of a breach of faith. Apberasiab received him with open arms, placed him on a throne by his own, and gave him his daughter Frangbiz in marriage*. The nobility of Turquestan were so much charmed with this young prince, and gave him
- e continually such strong marks of their esteem, that Garfiavesch, brother to Apberasiab, took umbrage at it, and resolved to have him taken off. Syavek who was a prince of great penetration, discovered his intention, and foreseeing that in a strange country it was impossible for him to guard against such attempts, he spoke of it to his wife, who was then great with child, and conjured her in case he should be murdered, to send his son, if she should be brought to bed of one, into Persia. A small time after, what he feared came to pass; he was killed by some assassins hired by Garfiavesch, who would also have dispatched his wife if Piran Vissch had not luckily entered the room and prevented it. Frangbiz was afterwards brought to bed of a son, called Key-chosrau, who in time succeeded his grandfather. The
- f people of Turquestan were so much grieved for the death of Syavek, that to shew their concern, they mourned in Persian habits, a custom which has ever since remained amongst them. The news of the prince of Persia's death reaching Rustan in his government, he, without expecting orders, entered Turquestan with a considerable army, burning and destroying all the country before him. Garfiavesch raised a body of troops as soon as he was able, and marched to oppose him; but coming to an engagement, they were soon defeated, and Garfiavesch himself had his head struck off by the sword of *Rustan. The desire this hero had to do all the good he could to the family of his pupil and nephew Syavek, put him upon enquiring for his son;

but his mother kept him so effectually concealed, that neither his friends nor his foes a could find him out, which gave Rustan inexpressible concern; some years after however Keykaus sent Guin the son of Gudarz, a young Persian nobleman of great capacity, into Turquestan, in order to discover his grandson. Some say that Guin having sought the young prince a long time in vain, met him by chance one day as he was hunting, and knowing him by the resemblance he bore of his father, addressed himself frankly to him, told him his name, and his commission. Key-chosrau listened greedily to the proposal made him of retiring into Persia, but desired that he might carry his mother and Piran Vissab, the old and faithful friend of his father, with him, b that they might be safe from the attempts of their enemies. This being agreed to, all things were concerted so well, that they quitted Turquestan and got safe into Persia, little to the satisfaction of Apherasiab, who was mighty well pleased with having in his hands the heir of the Persian diadem. He ordered them immediately to be pursued by several roads, but all to no purpose, though they passed the river Gjichon in sight of their pursuers. On the arrival of Key-chosrau at the court of his grandfather, the face of affairs suddenly changed; those who had been avowed enemies of the prince Syavek his father were immediately removed, and Keykobad, to shew his affection for the young prince, made him generalissimo of his armies, and raised Guin, who had brought him back, to the highest honours. Thus, who had been no friend to Syavek, began to be apprehensive of the power of Key-chosrau, and c therefore took all opportunities of influencing Fraiborz, the son of Keykaus, by suggesting to him that this new-come prince would rob him of the crown of Persia, which ought by no means to be placed on the head of one descended by the mother's side from Tour, the implacable enemy of their name and nation; these seeds of dissension sown, the Persian court was quickly in disorder, all the nobility taking one side or other, to the no small detriment of the affairs of the nation. Keykaus in the mean time was unwilling to declare either against his son or his grandson. At last to prevent, as far as in him lay, the inconveniences that might attend a disputed succession, he resolved to give the competitors for the crown a fair opportunity of displaying their abilities, and to declare him who had the greatest desert his heir. d One Babaman who had been intrusted with the city of Ardebil or Ardevil in the province of Aderbayagjan, had made himself prince of that place, and thrown off his allegiance to the king of Persia. Keykaus sent a body of troops under the command of his son Fraiborz, to invest the town on one side, and an equal number under Key-chosrau to sit down before it on the other, informing both the princes, when they set out for their respective commands, that whoever reduced the place, he would declare successor to the throne. Thus according to his repeated professions of friendship to Fraiborz, set out with him for the army, and did all that in his power lay to make him master of Ardevil, but to no purpose; Babaman, apprized of the siege, had provided all things necessary for a long defence, and was himself so e consummate an officer, that he triumphed over all the attempts of the Persian army under Fraiborz. Key-chosrau had better success; the troops commanded by this young prince, behaved better than those under his uncle, insomuch that Babaman finding it impossible to hold out, surrendered Ardevil into his hands. According to agreement therefore, when he returned to court, Keykaus declared him heir apparent of the crown, and thereby put an end to the contention which had so long subsisted. Some small time after this, the good old monarch, wearied with the fatigues of royalty, retired from the world and left his grandson in the possession of the kingdom, after a reign of one hundred and fifty years f.

ACCORDING to the method we have hitherto pursued, we should here take leave f of Keykaus's reign. But as it is our design to inform the reader, as far as we are able, of every thing relating to the history of those kings we speak of, we find ourselves obliged to take notice here of some variations in circumstances, into which the Persian historians have fallen, as to the most material facts reported in the history of Keykaus. Thus, as to Saudabab, some make her to have been the daughter of Gber-schiavesch, brother to Apherasiab; they say likewise that she was the mother of Syavek, and that taking some disgust in his father's court, the young prince fled to that of his uncle in Turquestan, where marrying the daughter of the king, he made himself so considerable, that his grand-father by the mother's side caused him to

- a be destroyed *. Mirkbond, speaking of the invasion made by Rustan on Apherafiab's dominions, in revenge for the death of Syavek, mentions one Keydab, the son of Apherafiab, who commanded the armies of his father, and who was slain in single combat by Rustan. If there be any fact in this, then it is probable that this duel is represented in the figures cut on the rocky mountain of Tacks-Rustan, which we took notice of in our description of Persia *. A Persian writer hath taken upon him to assert that Keykaus ought to be regarded as the Nimrod of the Hebrews, and he will have it that both these names signify the long liver, or the immortal; adding that Keykaus was so called, because of his extraordinary long reign, viz. of one hundred and fifty years. Mirkbond, like a good historian, reports this fact, and observes that some have stigmatized Keykaus with building the tower of Babel, and attempting to scale heaven thereby, but he says expressly that this story is fabulous, and ought not to be regarded; the king of Persia being a wise and pious prince, who knew well that to ascend to heaven there was no need of towers. But to proceed in our history ¹ (G).

Key-chofrau or Key-khofru succeeded peaceably to the throne of his grand-father, Key-chofrau, and shewed himself worthy of that preference which had been given him; for in the first place, he took care to rectify all abuses in courts of justice throughout his whole dominions, displacing all such officers as had made themselves odious to the people, and taking every method he could devise to put the poor into a condition of earning bread, issuing for this purpose great sums out of his treasury, and giving audience with the greatest ease to all degrees of people. When he found his kingdom in tolerable order, he summoned a grand council of his nobility, wherein having represented the miserable death of his father and the mighty mischiefs which had been done them by the inhabitants of Turquestan, he desired them to speak their minds freely, whether it would not be for their interest, as well as for his honour, if an army were immediately raised for the reduction of Turquestan. They came unanimously into this proposal, whereupon Piran-Visseh returned into his own

(G) To prevent the reader's falling into any confusion with respect to the wars recorded in this history, it may be necessary to observe, that the Persians had for their neighbours under the monarchs of the first and second race, on the north-east the inhabitants of the extended country of Touran. We have already spoken so copiously of the sense and derivation of this name, that there is no necessity for our adding any thing farther on that subject; here it is sufficient that we observe, the boundaries thereof were never well fixed, and that it was always designed by an indefinite term, as well by the Romans as by the orientals; the former stiled all the provinces on the other side that river which they call Oxus, the ancient Persians Gjeibon, and the modern Amu, Transoxana; and the orientals called the same provinces Mauaralnabar, i. e. on the other side the river (*). This country was inhabited by the Turks, properly so called, whom some conceive to be the same nation with the Tartars, and that those we generally call Turks have very little right to that appellation (†). On the east of Persia lay the empire of the Indies, then governed by princes who were natives of that country. To the south of Persia lay the peninsula of Arabia, governed by its own kings; and on the west the territories of Sham or Schamab, for so the Persians stiled Syria, and the other dominions of the kings of Nineveh and Babylon. Nothing can be darker or more confused than the accounts we have from the Persian historians of the state of their neighbours in those times of which we are now speaking. To us, there seems some reason to doubt whether the word Khakan, made use of to signify the supreme monarch of grand Tartary by Mirkbond was really heard of in those early times; it seems more likely that our Persian historians bestowed that title, which is now frequent, on the monarch mentioned by the ancient historians to have reigned then in these parts, in order to familiarize the stile of his history to his cotemporaries. As the country of Touran bordered as well as Iran on the Caspian sea, and as the last battle fought by Apherafiab happened in the plains of Kbuerem, it was natural enough for him to fly into the mountains nearest at hand, in hopes of returning that way into Touran; and when he found the enemy possessed of the passes near the mouth of the river Gjeibon, he had no other way left than to endeavour to get through the mountains of Aderbayagjan, and so round the Caspian sea, till he entered Touran on the north; in which however we need not wonder that he proved unsuccessful, since from those times to ours, no conqueror whatever has had the honour to make that tour with his troops, excepting only the Tartar hero Zinjis Khan. From the observations in this note it will be very plain to the reader, that Iran under the reign of this monarch Key-khofru contained very nearly the same extent of country, and the same provinces which are still comprehended under the empire of Persia; and that whatever difference there might be, must have lain on the provinces on the west side of the empire; the bounds of which are not exactly laid down by the Persian historians. As to the new kingdom on the Persian gulph erected in favour of Fraiborn, we shall have occasion to mention it hereafter; in the mean time let us remark, that the situation of this kingdom proves the extent of Key-khofru's empire towards the south-east to have been pretty near the same with the present Shah's.

country, from whence as we have heard, he fled with Key-chosrau and his mother. The king of Persia knowing that without unanimity, no war could be carried on with any reasonable hopes of success, took pains to reconcile himself to Thus, and to his uncle Fraiborz; and to shew that his reconciliation was sincere, he intrusted them with the command of thirty thousand horse, and sent them to open the war by invading the dominion of Turquesan^a. At their setting out he spoke to them thus; "You must know that before my father married the princess Frangbiz my mother, he had by the daughter of his friend Piran-Visseb, a son called Ferud. This young man I am informed has at present a command in the army of Apherasiab; but where-ever he is, remember that he is my brother, and that where-ever you find him, you do him no injury, but render him all honours due to so near a relation of mine." It happened unluckily that the Persian army no sooner entered the country of Turquesan, than Ferud came to reconnoitre them at the head of a body of horse. His scouts informed him that the Persians were by far more numerous than the troops under his command; but he, to shew his valour, instead of retiring, attacked very briskly the army under the command of Thus, who as soon as he understood that Ferud was at the head of the Turks, ordered his forces to retire, and presenting himself before the young prince, informed him of the order he had received from his brother the king of Persia. Ferud, full of imprudent bravery, would not be persuaded to retire, but causing the Turkish horse to make a fresh attack, the Persians repulsed them with great slaughter, and Ferud, to the mighty regret of the whole army, was found dead upon the place^c. Key-chosrau received this news with great concern, and apprehending that Thus had been in some measure instrumental in his brother's death, he sent orders to his uncle Fraiborz to take upon him the command of the army, and to send back Thus a prisoner to answer in Persia for his conduct. Fraiborz executed the king's commands exactly with respect to Thus, and then marched farther into Turquesan. Apherasiab gave the command of the great army he had raised to Piran-Visseb, the most experienced of his generals, and who was perfectly acquainted with the Persian discipline. This excellent officer did all that could be expected from him, he gave Fraiborz and Gudar so much trouble, and knew so well how to encamp his troops out of danger of an attack, that at length the Persians were constrained to retreat, not without very considerable loss; Gudar, who commanded in the rear, having no less than seventy gentlemen of his own family slain^d. The news of this defeat obliged the king to take other measures; he therefore removed his uncle from the command of the army, and gave it to Gudar, to whose valour and conduct it was owing, that any part thereof escaped. He also sent Thus, who had fully justified himself as to the death of Ferud, with a reinforcement of troops, in order to enable him to carry on the war. Apherasiab perceiving that the Persians were resolved to destroy his empire, called to his assistance the Kba-khan or king of great Tartary, and Schangal king of the Indies, and by the help of his confederates pushed the Persian troops so closely, that they being far inferior in number were forced to retire into the mountains of Chorassan, where they threw up intrenchments, and fortified their camp in the best manner they could. Key-chosrau, informed of their distress, sent orders to Rustan to march with the utmost diligence to their assistance. That experienced general readily obeyed his master, and the Persian army that was besieged in the mountains, when they heard of his approach, made no question of carrying the victory. Rustan, as an earnest thereof, deceived the vigilance of the Turkish officers, and passing their advanced guards in the night entered the Persian camp, before the enemy was aware. The next day the most bloody battle was fought, that hitherto had been seen in Persia. Rustan did wonders, he took prisoner the Kba-khan and Kaimus, one of the principal generals in the service of Apherasiab. In the end victory declared itself for the Persians, and Apherasiab, having lost half his army, was obliged to retire with the rest into his own dominions. Notwithstanding this mighty loss, the king of Turquesan meditated new invasions, exhausting his whole country to draw together an army sufficient for his purpose. Key-chosrau on the other hand set four great armies on foot, the chief of which lay in the neighbourhood of Balch, under the command of Gudar. Against him Apherasiab sent a detachment of his choicest troops under the command of Piran-Visseb,

- the best officer in his dominions. The two armies had not long been in the neighbourhood of each other, before an action ensued; wherein Piran-Visseb was killed, and his army beaten. When Gudar saw the body of Piran-Visseb on the ground, he alighted from his horse, and remembering the courtesies that nobleman had formerly done to Syavet, and to Key-chofrau, when a young man, he bedewed it with his tears, and took care afterwards, to see it interred with all the honours due to so great and worthy a man. Of which, when the king of Persia was informed, he highly commended his general, and spoke with very great regret of the death of his old friend ^a. Apberasiab, when informed of this new disaster, sent his son Schidab to command the remains of the army, which he caused to be reinforced as soon as possible. By this time Key-chofrau was come in person to his army, and marched at the head thereof, through the plains in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea. Schidab thinking this a proper place to give battle, advanced with his army, and attacked the Persians with great resolution; but his success was not answerable to his valour, for he was killed in the beginning of the engagement, and all his army cut to pieces. The king of Persia surveying the field of battle, and the vast number of dead bodies which lay thereon, cried out aloud, Kbuaresmi-bud, i. e. I have seen my desire; whence the plains in which this battle was fought, and the province wherein they lie, received the appellation of Kbuareszm, which they still retain. Key-chofrau pushed on the war now with the greatest vigour, marching directly towards the capital of Turquestan, whither Apberasiab had retired; but this prince not thinking himself safe there, because the people murmured loudly at the evils they felt, he first sent away his Haram, and then retired himself. His wives and children fell a short time afterwards into the hands of Key-chofrau, who treated them with all imaginable kindness and respect; Apberasiab wandered from province to province with a small body of troops, till being shut up in the mountains of Aderbayagjan he was at last taken prisoner, and by the orders of Key-chofrau put to death ^a. Thus ended this long and bloody war which had well nigh exhausted both empires. After it was finished Key-chofrau fixed his court at Balc, for the conveniency of governing Touran as well as Iran; there it was that seeing himself in full possession of two great empires, this monarch did what none of his predecessors had thought of, he computed all the levies which had been made on Persia for the carrying on the war against the Turks, and out of the mighty treasures which were fallen into his hands, he restored to every family the amount of the taxes they had paid. He sent for his uncle Fraiborz, and after having commended him for his fidelity, he erected several provinces on the shore of the Persian gulph into a kingdom, and made him sovereign thereof. He assembled the nobility of Touran, and having shewn them the folly of hating the inhabitants of Iran, as they had hitherto done, he advised them to consider of ways and means for re-establishing the peace of their country, and assured them he would contribute to it as far as lay in his power. He then marked out the quarters, and settled the yearly pay of his army, took an exact account of the state of all the provinces, reformed several abuses in religion; and when he had done all this, he said he had reigned long enough for his own glory, and that it was now time for him to quit the world, and dedicate the rest of his days to God. With this view he introduced his successor Loborasp into a grand assembly of the nobility, he put the Tagi on his head, and retired himself to a cell in the desert, having attained to the age of ninety years, sixty of which he had passed upon the throne ^a.

- WHAT has been above related of the reign of Key-chofrau is taken from the best and most credible historians, and connected with all the accuracy in our power; let us now see what other remarkable facts have been related of this monarch, which could not so well be reduced into the order we have followed. With respect to the decisive battle fought against the king of Turquestan, some writers tell us that it was not a general engagement, but that twelve Turks, and as many Persians, fought in the fight of both armies, which providence decided in favour of the latter; and this combat is very famous in oriental romances, where it is generally stiled Genk duazde Rokb, i. e. the combat of the twelve heroes. The terms on which this combat was fought were these; that if the Turks were victorious the Persians should own Apberafiab for their lord; but in case the Persians were successful, then the Turks were to retire into their own country, and so quit all pretensions to Iran. Apberafiab complied with the agreement, and marched directly back into his own country; but, say the same writers, he soon after broke the peace by sending his son with a numerous body of horse to make inroads into Persia. In consequence of which followed the battle of Khuarezsm, in which they make Apberafiab and his brother to have been present. They add, that after the loss of the battle, Apberafiab with the remains of his army fled into the mountainous countries on the banks of the Caspian sea, intending to pass if possible behind it, and so thro' the extended territories of the Kipjaks into his own dominions; but his efforts were vain, the forces of Key-chofrau surrounding the handful of troops Apberafiab had with him in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, so that he was at last taken prisoner, and put to death. Mirkbond, and the writers we have followed, do not say much as to the personal bravery of Key-chofrau; but there are writers who inform us of a very extraordinary act of chivalry, performed by this monarch. They tell us that in his reign there appeared in the mountains, which separate Irak Ajemi from Pbars, or as we call them, Parthia, from proper Persia, a monstrous serpent, which struck the people with such terror, that they abandoned their habitations, and left all the adjacent country desolate; this formidable dragon they stiled Gavschid. The king being informed of this, resolved like a good prince to go immediately and destroy this monster. Key-chofrau hunted it for some time before he came up with it, but at last he found it in its den in the mountains of Aderbayagjan, and his guards flying at the sight of the dragon he attacked it alone, and killed it with his own hand. On the spot where this remarkable deed was done, a Pyræum or fire-temple was erected, called in succeeding times Deir Gavschid, i. e. the habitation of Gavschid, renowned to this day amongst the Perses, and held by some to be the first fire-temple erected in Persia, which however we doubt, if they mean, as certainly they do, that it was erected in the reign of Key-chofrau. Though some writers are silent as to the valour of this prince, yet all who treat of his reign expatiate loudly on his wisdom and piety. Some believe him a prophet, most acknowledge that he conversed with the prophets, and was in a peculiar manner favoured by the Almighty for the great regard he always shewed towards religion, and religious persons. During his reign flourished Lokman the famous philosopher of the east, called by way of surname Lokman Al-Hakim, i. e. Lokman the wise. It would lead us far out of our way should we enter here too deeply into the history of this extraordinary person; we shall therefore content ourselves with observing that it is generally agreed he was by birth an Ethiopian or Nubian, the oriental word Habascbi including both; his parents mean, and himself sold for a slave, and carried from one place to another, till at last he was brought into the land of Israel, where he lived under the reigns of David and Solomon. The Arabian writers tell us, that sleeping in this condition during the heat of the day, the angels entered his room and awaked him, with this salutation, Lokman we are the messengers of God, thy creator and ours, who hath sent us to thee to inform thee that he will make thee a monarch and his lieutenant over the whole earth. Lokman, after remaining silent for a small space, returned this answer: If by the absolute command of God I am to become what you say, his will must be fulfilled in all things, and I hope if it comes to pass, that he will afford me the necessary assistance of his grace, that I may exactly execute his orders; but if he would give me leave to chuse, I wish rather to continue in the state I am in, and that he would prevent me from offending him, without which grace all the pomp and grandeur of the world would be to me no more than a cumbrous and insupportable load. This, say these authors, appeared so just in the sight of God, that he bestowed on Lokman such an excellent understanding, that he composed, say they, ten thousand apologies, moral maxims, and wise sayings, each of them more valuable than the whole world. A phrase, implying no more than that they are highly useful as well as wonderfully sublime. They tell us also, that Lokman standing one day in the midst of a great number of people, who all listened greedily to his wise and pleasant discourses, a Hebrew of great quality asked him, if he was not the black slave whom he had seen formerly tending the sheep? Lokman readily an-

- answered, I am. And how then, said the nobleman, have you attained so high a degree of virtue? Why, answered Lokman, by these three easy steps: I have always spoke the truth, I have constantly kept my word, and I have never meddled in any thing which did not concern me. A Persian poet hath recorded another extraordinary instance of Lokman's presence of mind; his master sent him with some other slaves to gather fruit in his garden, the rest eat the best, and when his master missed them, they roundly swore that Lokman eat them whether they would or not. The matter, Sir, said Lokman, is easily decided; let us all drink heartily of warm water, and then let us join hands and run round; his lord commanded the experiment to be immediately made, upon which they all fell a vomiting, with this difference, that they brought up the fruits which they had eaten, and Lokman nothing but the warm water. The comment of the Persian poet on this story is so remarkable, that the reader will doubtless be pleased to see it; "When we shall all drink of this hot water at our trials, in the day of the last judgment, then whatever has been concealed in the heart, and hidden far from the sight of men, shall be thrown up in the view of all the world; and the hypocrite, who acquired the reputation of a saint by his dissembling, shall then be covered with shame and confusion of face." What we have reported is sufficient to shew that there is a strong resemblance between the history of Lokman, as reported by the eastern writers; and that of Æsop, as we find it written by the Greeks. Both were mean in their original; both slaves through the severity of fortune; both famous for their wisdom; and both delivered their maxims in the same manner, that is by way of apologue. But there is a wide difference between the times in which the oriental authors say Lokman lived, and those wherein the Greeks place Æsop. As to the first it is generally allowed that Lokman lived in the reign of Solomon, whereas Æsop is said to have been cotemporary with Crassus king of Lydia, and Solon the Athenian legislator. From the history of their lives, and from the comparison of their fables, there is all the reason in the world to believe that Lokman and Æsop were the same person; the difficulty seems to lie here, whether the Greeks stole him from the orientals, or whether the orientals took him from the Greeks. It seems most natural to believe the former, since in such cases the Greeks are known to have been notorious thieves, and to have altered every point of ancient history they were able, to their own advantage. Besides, the apologue was certainly the favourite mode of teaching in the east, long before that or any other kind of learning was known to the Greeks; after all, this is but conjecture, which we offer to the reader's consideration, rather than his belief. The chief reason why Lokman is so much considered in the east, is, because Mohammed has mentioned him in terms of respect in the Koran, and has affirmed that God bestowed on him the gift of extraordinary wisdom*. His fables, which are far from being numerous, have been printed in Arabick and Latin at Leyden, so that Europe is now no stranger to the wisdom of that famous person*. But to return to Key-chofran, he is reported to have been himself a very wise and very learned prince, as well as remarkably pious. He was very fortunate throughout his reign, and yet he was so little exalted by an uninterrupted series of good fortune, that he not only resigned the crown, and retired into the deserts on the skirts of the province of Aderbayagjan, but left also this remarkable memento to all his successors, by causing it to be engraved in one of the rooms of his palace" (H).

(H) It is very fit that we should give an account in this note what our reasons were for inserting the life of Lokman in the Persian history. Not to trouble the reader with too long a detail, we shall acquaint him with no more than two. First, Lokman wrote in the Persian language, as is generally agreed, and as the learned editor of his fables in Holland positively affirms (8). 2dly, It is from Persian writers that we have the best and fullest accounts of Lokman's life and manners; and as they constantly speak of him as cotemporary with Key-chofran, the third king of their second dynasty, it was but just that we should insert his memoirs under that reign. Having thus justify'd our speaking of Lokman here, let us be indulged a few thoughts on fable, and on the high reputation which this author has obtained from his writings in that way. It is universally agreed that the Apologue was one of the most ancient methods of instructing, and of consequence that it was invented in the east, where indeed all kind of science took birth. That this mode of teaching was far elder than Lokman's days, admitting that he lived where

(8) Præfat. Erpam Locm. Fabul.

We ought not to value ourselves too much on our exaltation above the ordinary rank of men, since we are no more secure of our crowns, than they of their estates; that which descended from several monarchs to me, will descend, when I am gone, to several others; who then would be proud of what is uncertain in itself, and cannot at best last long?

Lohrasp.

Lohrasp, or Loborasb, was the successor of Key-chofraw, and his near relation; that prince having no heirs male. The authors who have recorded the principal events, which happened under the reigns of the several princes of the first and second race, differ in no part of their account so much as where they speak of the actions of this prince. For the reader's ease as well as our own, we will first give as succinctly as we can the story of this monarch's reign, according to Mirkbond, and we

where the oriental writers have placed him, we know from the sacred writings. And that this method was long if it be not still cultivated in the east, is a point so notorious that we need not undertake its proof. Bishop Patrick has advanced a very ingenious, though it may be no very solid opinion in relation to the rise and decay of fable. He says that it was invented in early times, when mankind were as yet rude, and histories unwritten; that as these came into vogue fable declined, because truth being always preferable to falsehood, men chose rather to appeal to facts which had happened, than to suppose things which might never come to pass (9). But, with the bishop's good leave, the other side of the argument may be taken, and supported with greater force; for points of history are very seldom exactly agreed on in all their circumstances, and consequently can hardly ever be similar one to another; whereas fables, which are indeed representations of facts without names, may be adjusted to the utmost nicety, and consequently are able to strike with far greater vigour than any history applied. We will give an instance which will effectually support what we say. Might not Nathan the prophet, when he reproved David for taking the wife of Uriah, have easily bethought him of some history, which would very nearly have represented the case of that prince; but will any man say that a lecture from history would have penetrated the soul of David with so lively a sorrow as Nathan's noble application of his parable Thou art the man (10)? Fables shew us truth in an easy natural light, and the mind having thus contented to a doctrine proposed, the understanding afterwards applies; and we learn with the greater ease, because we do not discern the teacher. Not to return to Lokman, his fame is so great and so universal throughout the east, that to express an high idea of any man's wisdom, they are wont to say, as the learned Erpenius expresses it, Non necesse est docere Lokmanum. There is no need of teaching Lokman (11). His fables were doubtless almost without number, but the collection we have of them is not large; Sir John Chardin has printed a French translation of them, which agrees exactly with the Arabic and Latin version above referred to. We call them versions, because as we observed before Lokman wrote originally in Persian; and at this day, Sir John Chardin tells us, this nation is so fond of them, that they are the first things they teach their children, and spare no pains to make them enter into and comprehend their meaning. An instance or two may not be unacceptable (12).

The Boy in the River.

"A little boy went one day into a river, and not having learned to swim, had like to have been drowned; seeing a man at a distance he called out to him for help: the man, as soon as he saw the lad's distress, began to expostulate with him on "the folly of going into a river before he had learned to swim: the boy, instead of answering him, cried out, Save me, save me, and thou shalt be as long as you will."

The Smith and his Dog.

"An honest smith had a dog that slept all the while his matter was at work; but as soon as he left off and sat down with his companions to dinner, the dog waked, and solicited him for meat; Worthless animal, saith the smith, how canst thou sleep amidst the noise of hammers which shake the very earth, and yet wake at the wagging of one's jaws which scarce make any noise at all?"

The Goose and the Swallow.

"The goose and the swallow entered into a league of friendship, and resolved to live together. They came unluckily to a place where the fowls were watching; the swallow, as soon as she saw them, flew away, but the poor goose, not being able to make use of her wings was taken and killed."

The passage in the Alcoran referred to in the text, is the whole xxxix chapter, which therefore bears the title of Lokman. Mohammed speaks in his own person at the beginning thereof, vehemently declaiming against irreligious persons and idolaters, such especially as despised the Koran, and lived in the errors of their fathers; he then makes God speak thus: "We inspired knowledge into Lokman, and taught him to give God thanks; he that returneth thanks to God for his graces doth good to his soul, for God hateth the ungrateful, and praise is in all places due to him. Remember thou, that Lokman said to his son, O! my son, believe not that God hath equals; it is an exceeding great sin; we have commanded man to honour his father and his mother, his mother bringeth him forth with sorrow, and weaneth him at two years old; be not thou forgetful of God's benefits; honour thy father and thy mother, for thou shalt one day be judged before God." The rest of the chapter contains a great many excellent admonitions, all of which are put into the mouth of Lokman, and consequently shew how high this philosopher stood in the opinion of Mohammed. To say the truth, he was a very artful person, and took care never to run counter to popular opinions where it might be avoided. The character of Lokman was too well established to be overturned by him, and therefore he very wisely represented him as one who had long ago taught the same doctrines which he now sought to recommend. Hence however it has come to pass, that some commentators on the Koran have taught that Lokman was a prophet, tho' others understand what Mohammed says of that Sage's having only the gift of Teaching (13).

a shall afterwards set down such variations as seem of greatest importance, affixing the authors names from whom they are taken. Lobrasp was the nephew to king Key-kau's brother, and was the next heir-male of the royal line. He was elected king, and not without considerable opposition; his temper was known to be severe and haughty, the grandees therefore were many of them for putting the scepter into a milder hand; and at the head of this faction was Zal-zer, the father of Rustan; but their cabals were vain, Lobrasp carried it in spite of them all, and was declared king. As soon as he was seated on the throne he determined with himself to raise his reputation, and to extend his empire by making war on both sides thereof; in b consequence of this resolution he fixed his court at Balch, and took all possible methods for putting every thing in the best order in the eastern provinces of Iran. He sent in the mean time his general Gudarz with a puissant army into Shamab or Syria, with orders to reduce the whole of that large country under his power. Gudarz effectually answered his master's expectation; he conquered all Syria as far as Damascus, and also Palestine, with the famous city of Jerusalem, called by the Persians the Habitation of the saints. The reigning king of the Jews submitted, and promised to pay tribute, for which he put as hostages into the hands of the Persian general several persons of quality, whom Gudarz quickly afterwards caused to be slain; this provoked the Jews to a rebellion, and gave Gudarz the opportunity he wanted of sacking Jerusalem, where he treated the inhabitants with inexpressible cruelty; and having loaded his soldiers with riches he retired, and carried into c Persia with him a vast number of captives. King Lobrasp had two sons, the eldest called Gushtasp, the younger named Zaris; the former was of a fierce, haughty disposition, but was at the same time warlike, and of great abilities: this young prince drew in many who were desirous of novelty, to join with him in a rebellion against his father, in which he had at first success, and gained over to him a very considerable party; but Lobrasp having drawn together all his friends, and having also done every thing in his power to engage the people to his service, marched so briskly against his son, that Gushtasp's adherents, fearing the fortune of the day in case of a d battle, abandoned him by degrees; which he observing, began immediately to provide for his own safety, by retiring into Turquestan in so distressed a condition, that he lived even at that court unknown and unsuspected. Here by a very odd accident, he married the daughter of the reigning prince. It was it seems a custom in that country, that whenever the king had a mind to dispose of a daughter in marriage, publick notice was given, and the people assembled in great numbers in an open court, where being disposed into the best order the place would allow, the king entered with his daughter, one of whose hands was held in his, and in the other she had a golden apple, enriched with precious stones; when they were advanced into the middle of the place, the king let go his daughter's hand, and she e after walking round, and observing every body diligently, bestowed her apple and herself on the man she liked best. It happened not long after Gushtasp's arrival in Turquestan, that the king determined to marry his eldest daughter, and having brought her out into the court after the manner before described, she, after looking a little about her, gave her apple and her person to this unknown. The grandees of Touran were inexpressibly vexed at seeing themselves despised by the prince's for a stranger, whom they supposed of no birth. They therefore engaged the king to make a law, that for the future the princesses of Touran should have their choice only out of people of high quality, that the royal line might not be drawn into contempt. The king had still two daughters as remarkable for their beauty as their birth; these were
f demanded in marriage by the two sons of a neighbouring and potent prince, to whom the king of Touran made no scruple of promising them on this condition, that they reduced under his obedience two lords who had revolted, and who committed great devastations throughout all Touran. The young princes, considering the difficulty of this task had recourse to Gushtasp, of whose prowess they had seen frequent proofs, and engaged him to be assistant therein. Gushtasp, as soon as he had undertaken to serve them, appointed a hunting-match, and invited the two brothers to be of the party; he also brought to the chace a small body of resolute friends. When they were assembled he let them into his project, which was to go immediately to a certain castle, where he was informed the two rebel lords had an interview, and to storm it before they could have any intelligence of their expedition; this was immediately agreed to, and instantly carried into execution. Gushtasp entered the place first himself, and having seized the rebels, put them into the hands of the two princes, who conducted them to court, and presented them to the king. The Turkish monarch was prodigiously pleased with this feat of arms, and very readily made good his promise to the princes, by giving them his daughters in marriage. A few days after he caused great feasts to be celebrated; and appointed publick tournaments, wherein Gushtasp behaved himself in such a manner that he carried the glory of the day from all who were present. The king who had hitherto shewed him but little countenance, spoke to him on this occasion very kindly, and gave him the highest praises. Gushtasp took this opportunity of saying, that if he had excelled in combats that were not in earnest, he had likewise been of some use in quelling the disturbers of the publick peace. This struck the king's mind, who easily comprehended the meaning, and having diligently sought out the truth, made Gushtasp henceforward his favourite. It is to be observed that after the conquest of Touran by Key-kofrau, though the people were left to live under their own laws, and their own princes, yet they were obliged to own the superiority of the monarchs of Iran, and to pay them a considerable tribute. Gushtasp persuaded his father-in-law that this was at once dishonourable and needless, and therefore advised him to throw off the yoke by refusing tribute, and by making preparations for and declaring war against Lobrasp in case he should dispute his independency. This Gushtasp did to be revenged of his father, and from an apprehension that if he was ever discovered the nobility of Touran in a time of peace would certainly deliver him up. Lobrasp was exceedingly surprized at the arrival of the Turkish ambassador in his court; he treated him however with great civility, and endeavoured to get out of him the true source of these extraordinary proceedings. The ambassador at first thought to put him off with trivial answers, but on the king's pressing him, he acknowledged at last that a certain stranger who had married his master's daughter, was the true author of all this mischief. Lobrasp no sooner heard this, than he guessed it was his son, and immediately dispatched a messenger to enquire privately whether it was so or not; as soon as he was certain that this new and dangerous enemy of his was his son Gushtasp, he took at the same time a most strange and most generous resolution, which was to spare his people at the expence of his crown. He found he was grown old, he saw the ambition of his son was to be satisfied with nothing less than the diadem; and as he knew he was brave and wise, though undutiful to him, he determined to resign to him his dominions; and in order to this he sent his younger son Zaris with the Tagi or ensign of the royal dignity in Persia to his brother in Turquestan. Zaris took care to give his brother private notice of his arrival. Gushtasp went immediately to pay him a visit, and being informed of his father's resolution, accepted the Tagi or Tiari, and caused himself to be solemnly proclaimed king of Persia. His father-in-law was at first prodigiously disturbed, conceiving that there was some treason against him in these proceedings, but when he found things were really as they had been represented, he was overjoyed to the highest degree; and the nobility of Touran came in crowds to pay their compliments to the new king of Persia. These ceremonies over, Gushtasp took leave of his father-in-law, and with his wife Karatbun set out for his own dominions, carrying with him a grand retinue, and a considerable number of camels loaded with riches. Lobrasp received his son with all the marks of tenderness and joy; Gushtasp retained him at court for many years, and did nothing without his advice; at last the good old man withdrew to lead a solitary life, to meditate on the vanities of this world, and to contemplate the wisdom and goodness of God. A short time after he died, having first sent for his son, and giving him in his last moments the most salutary counsels in respect to his own glory, and the good of his people. This Lobrasp was surnamed Balki, i. e. the Balchian, because he resided most at Balk or Balch, one of the most ancient cities in his dominions^a.

It must be owned that the foregoing account taken from Mirkbond is by no means agreeable to what other Persian authors have written on the same subject. In two of the most celebrated histories of this people, we find it recorded that Lobrasp was the grandson of Keykobod, and that he was opposed by the Persian nobility, not for his cruelty or pride, as Mirkbond suggests, but because his father and himself had led their lives in privacy, whence it was believed he had not the capacity of reign-

- a ing; it is also said that he was the first Persian monarch who enacted martial laws, and obliged his troops to live like the rest of his subjects, according to the rules of equity and justice, and not as they had hitherto done at free quarter, and in contempt of both. He allowed his general officers and governors of provinces to give audience on a tribunal, raised one story from the ground, and railed round about, reserving to himself only this distinction, that he had a carpet or cloth of state thrown before his footstool. We are likewise told that the name of the general sent by this prince to invade Syria and Palestine was Rabam, and that he was surnamed by the Persians Bakht-nassar, from whence the Hebrews framed the name of Nebuchadnezzar, and the Greeks Nabuchadonofar. We have also on the same authority the history of Gushtasp's flight, marriage, and succession to the throne of Persia; but we are likewise told what little agrees with Mirkbond's history, that Lobrasp, within a short time after he resigned the throne, was besieged in the city of Balch by Arjasp, nephew of Apberasab the famous Turkish monarch, who after the town fell into his hands, caused the old king of Persia to be put to death after he had reigned 120 years^a (1). Kbondimir the famous Persian historian differs not only from Mirkbond, but the writers last cited; he says that Lobrasp was the son of Keykaus's brother, and that he was elected on account of his extraordinary virtues; according to him it was Gudarz who conquered Palestine, and was surnamed by the Persians Bakht-Nassar: which surname has occasioned such confusion among the Hebrew and Greek writers. As to the flight of Gushtasp, this writer says that he retired to the court of a certain Greek prince, where he married the king's eldest daughter, called by him Kenajoum, and who, as he tells the story, presented him publicly with an orange, which is plainly substituted for the golden apple. Instead of the two rebellious lords he speaks of two terrible monsters, that this Grecian prince, whoever he was, insisted should be killed by those who pretended to the young princesses who were still unmarried.

- THE first of these was a furious serpent, which had its den in a wood so very thick that it was thought almost impossible to penetrate it, in order to combat this destructive animal: the other was a lion prodigiously fierce, which traversed the plain country, and tore to pieces all he met with, whether of human kind, or cattle. Two of the chief princes of Greece, who were pretenders to the daughters of the king in whose court Gushtasp lived, were quite abashed at these proposals, despairing of the conquest of these monsters, and consequently of the princesses. However they informed Gushtasp of the answer the king had given them. Gushtasp readily offered them his assistance, and accordingly attacked the monsters, killed them both, and gave all the honour of these extraordinary feats of chivalry to the two Greek princes, which procured for them the wives they desired. Some time after this, Gushtasp growing a little into the king's favour, that prince asked him one day how he passed his time; Gushtasp answered, that sometimes he went a hunting, and that lately as he was taking that diversion, he killed two extraordinary creatures. The king immediately understood what he meant, and having caused the matter to be thoroughly enquired into, found that Gushtasp had slain the monsters, upon which he immediately made him his chief minister as well as favourite; and at his persuasion, refused to pay the king of Persia that tribute which he was wont to

(1) We have already spoken of Mirkbond, from whom the greatest part of our history is taken; here therefore let us give the reader a short account of the two histories mentioned in the text, and their authors, that he may be able to judge in some measure of the credit due to each. Tarikh Montekbeb, is the Turkish name of a translation of a Persian history, filed in that language Tarikh Khorideb, i. e. the chosen chronicle, written originally in Persian verse, and afterwards reduced into prose by its author Hamdallah Ben Abibekr Ben Ahmed Ben Nasser Al Maslousi Al Casruini, i. e. native of the city of Casbin. It contains a general history from the creation to send him yearly, and also to declare war against him. Lobrasp being informed of this, immediately conceived it was his son who had influenced this king to such bold proceedings, and therefore, instead of providing for the war, he sent his younger son with the tiara or royal diadem of Persia to Gushtasp as a pledge of his friendship, and a certain sign that he intended him for his successor. On his return to his father's court, continues our author, the venerable old man went out to meet him, kissed his feet according to the Persian custom in submitting to a sovereign, and after tenderly embracing him, placed the crown upon his head with his own hands; after which he retired from the world to lead a recluse life at Balch, where he was killed. The prophets Jeremab, Daniel, and Esdras were his cotemporaries*. If we may believe the eloquent author of the Shah Nemeb, or Royal Chronicle, Balch at the time Lobrasp resigned the kingdom to his son Gushtasp, was esteemed by the Persians as the Holy City, the fountain of their religion, and the place worthiest of their esteem, as Mecca is now by the Mohammedans; on this account therefore, Lobrasp made it the place of his abode, where laying aside his royal robes he put on the habit of a priest, applying himself wholly to devotion, in imitation of his predecessor Gjemscbid for the space of thirty years till he was slain, as will be hereafter related, in a cloyster of his own building which he called Nau-babar, i. e. the new spring†.

A. H. 730 (14). The book commonly cited under the title of Lebtarik, is properly called Lobb Al Taavarikh, i. e. the marrow of histories; it was written in the Persian language, by Jabia Ben Abdallah Al Casruini; it is divided into four books; the first, containing the life of Mohammed, and the twelve Imams; the second, the lives and reigns of the kings who governed before the introduction of Mohammedism; the third, the history of the reigning family in Persia; the fourth, an universal history of the dynasties prior to Mohammed, it comes down to A. H. 948. the author dying in 960, or in the year 1552, according to our account (15).

Gushtasp or Kischtasp, the son of Lobrasp, succeeded his father with general applause; he was a prince of great strength and activity of body, of great wisdom and extraordinary abilities of mind. He leaving Balch to his father, went to reside at the ancient metropolis of the kingdom Isfahbr, i. e. cut out of the rock, which he adorned with many fine structures, and reigned there in peace and glory about thirty years; at the end of that space, there appeared in his dominions, a very extraordinary person, who took upon himself the character of a prophet, and declared that he was sent by God to teach such as would listen to him the right way; this person was the Zoroastres of the Greeks, and the Zerdusht of the Persians. But as the history of this famous person is of very great consequence, we have found it necessary, to prevent confusion, to detach it from the reign of Gushtasp, and to deliver what hath been collected of this wonderful man, by authors of all nations, in a regular narration, with all the candor and impartiality we are masters of.

The Life of Zoroastres, Zoroaster, or Zerdusht; extracted as well from Greek and Latin, as Oriental historians.

IF to be famous after death, can afford any joyful sensation to the immortal spirit, that of this man, whether prophet, impostor, or philosopher, must needs receive high satisfaction from the wide extension of his fame, which has been diffused throughout the whole learned world, and subsisted even to latest ages. The Greeks who were very inquisitive after the inventers of science, amongst the nations whom they stile Barbarians, and from whom, notwithstanding they drew all the learning they had themselves, have written so confusedly, and so obscurely, concerning Zoroasters, that it is hard to know how many famous men bore this name, when they lived, or for what they were eminent. Arnobius is thought to have reduced them to four, but such is the misfortune of all who have written about Zoroaster, that the sense of this very passage is disputed, some affirming that Arnobius speaks but of three Zoroasters, others, that he mentions only two (K). However, four was certainly not too large

(K) In the text we have mentioned a passage from Arnobius, which has been very differently understood. This Arnobius was a rhetorician, and the master of the famous LaTantius; being converted to the christian faith, he wrote a large work in a declamatory style against the Gentiles, wherein there are many things contained of high use in respect to the history of learning among the ancients; for tho' as a christian, he wrote but indifferently, these books being composed soon after his conversion, and before he was well instructed in the faith; yet as to heathen learning, he was a great proficient therein, and his authority in such a case as this, must have consequently considerable weight. The passage which has been so differently interpreted, runs thus; Age nunc veniet quis super igneam nonam magus interiore ab orbe Zoroastres, Hermippo ut assentiamur auctori. Baſtrianus & ille conveniet cujus Crifias res gestas historiæ exponit in primo; Armenius Hosianus nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri (10). Patricius, the famous collector a a number, since authors undoubtedly mention many more. Of these we shall speak as succinctly as we can; the first is thought to have been a Chaldean, Suidas calls him an Assyrian, and says also that he was struck dead by fire from heaven^c. It is very probable that this is the same Zoroaster spoken of by Dion Chrysostom, and said to have appeared in fire^d. The second was a Babylonian, and a king, whom Justin and the authors who follow him make cotemporary with Ninus the Assyrian, by whom he was vanquished in battle, and slain^e. He is reputed to have been the inventor of magic, and is said by Arnobius to have contested with Ninus, not only with steel and strength, but by magical force, and the occult sciences of the Chaldeans^f. The third was a Persian, as Laertius informs us^g, Clemens Alexandrinus b stiles him a Mede^h, Suidas a *Perse-mede*ⁱ; but they all speak darkly and ambiguously. The fourth was a Pamphiliian, commonly called Er, or Erus Armenius. Concerning this Zoroaster, Clemens Alexandrinus quotes Plato, affirming that he began a book thus: "This wrote I Zoroaster Armenius, by descent a Pamphiliian, dying "in war, and being in Hades, I learned of the gods." He is reported by the same author to have risen again after being ten days dead, and to have told strange things which he had seen in that space^j. The fifth was a native of Proconnesus, mentioned by Pliny^k. Some have imagined, not without reason, that he is the same with collector of the Zoroastrian oracles (17), Gabriel Naude, a man of distinguished learning (18), and Kircher, who well understood these things (19), believe that Arnobius mentions here four Zoroasters; the first a Chaldean; the second a Babylonian; the third a Pamphiliian; the fourth an Armenian. Salmasius will needs have the text read thus (20): Age nunc veniat quæso per ignem nonam magus interiore ab orbe Zoroastres, Hermippo & assentiamur auctori. Babylonius, & ille conviciat, cujus Ctesias res gestas historiarum exponit in primo, Armenius, Hostanis nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri. It is evident by these alterations, that Salmasius has got rid of one Zoroaster, though one would think he has introduced another; since of the three Zoroasters, which he admits to be spoken of in this passage; the first is said to be an Ethiopian, or one coming from a country near the torrid Zona, for so Salmasius expounds per ignem nonam & ab interiore orbe; which Ethiopian, or Lydian Zoroaster, Hermippus makes a Babylonian; the second Armenius, nephew of Hostanis, of whose actions Ctesias gives us an account in the first book of his history; the third named Pamphilus, friend to Cyrus. Urfinus from the same words, is positive that Arnobius mentions but two, exploding the Babylonian Zoroaster of Hermippus, and shewing from Ctesias that Zoroaster was not so ancient as Eudæmus fancied, but that he lived in the time of Cyrus (21). We are afraid our readers are already fatigued enough with these dry researches as to the Zoroaster of the Greeks; we hope, however, they will have patience enough to hear what we have to offer by way of apology for this profusion of quotations, of which in the other parts of this Persian history we have been as sparing as possible. Our reasons are these; first, in order to gain any credit for the history of Zerdust, as written by oriental authors, there was a necessity of destroying the credit which has been so long given to the Greeks; and to do this, the best and shortest method was to shew what the Greeks had said, and what from their writings, the most able of their disciples had been able to collect, which we presume to say is very little or nothing. 2dly, We thought it necessary to shew the reader, that in order to make some sense of the varying stories of the ancients in relation to Zoroaster, who by the way is called by a greater variety of Greek names, than he is in the oriental languages, though in them, as we have shewn, the orthography of this name, is far from being settled; I say, we thought it convenient to shew that several Zoroasters have been supposed in order to the distribution of the several stories about him. After all, the candidates for the honours bestowed on the true Zoroaster, may be reduced to two, the Chaldean and the Persian; and the very ingenious Mr. Stanley has with great impartiality, divided these honours between them. But, thirdly, our history of Zerdust will set this matter in its true light, by shewing that there is in reality but one Zoroaster. If it be enquired how the Chaldean magi came to derive themselves and their doctrines from this Persian; and how this is to be reconciled to that chronology, which hitherto has been approved by all the learned, and sets the Chaldean Zoroaster far higher: We shall answer, that in the first place we are not accountable for the mistakes of others, the Greek writers knew not what to call him, or where to place him; for, as Mr. Stanley justly observes, "The same name it is, which some call Zabratias, "others Nazaratas, others Zares, others Zaran, "others Zaradas; all which are but several corruptions from the Chaldee or Persian word, which "the Greeks most generally render Zoroaster (22)." What certainty can be expected from such writers? But then, secondly, lest this should seem an evasive answer, we alledge, that Zoroaster was not the institutor of the magi; nor the author of a new religion, which we shall shortly prove at large; and this, as we conceive, occasioned the great confusion about Zoroaster; it was a received opinion that he was the founder of magism; it was easily discoverable that magism was as ancient as the days of Abraham, and that it was the religion of Chaldees: it was natural enough therefore, for such as looked upon Zoroaster to be the institutor of the magian doctrines, to say with assurance, that he lived in these times, but then discovering from the Persian records at what time he truly lived, they chose rather than abandon their former opinion, to make two Zoroasters; the first a Chaldean or Assyrian cotemporary with Ninus; the second a Persian, flourishing in the reign of Darius Hystaspes.

Aristeus the Proconnesian, mentioned by Suidas to have had an art of letting his soul ^a go out of his body, and return as often as he pleased^c. The sixth lived at Babylon at the time Pythagoras was carried thither by Cambyfes, as we are told by Apuleius^f. As the Greeks made several Zoroasters, so they placed them in different ages of the world; Justin makes him thirteen hundred years older than Sardanapalus^e. Eudoxus, cited by Pliny, placed him six thousand years before the death of Plato^b. Plutarch makes him flourish five thousand years before the war of *Troy*¹. Some authors, mentioned by Suidas, fix him 500 years before the Trojan war¹. *Apuleius*¹, Jamblicus^m, *Porphyry*ⁿ, Clemens Alexandrinus^o, and Agathius^p, place him where he ought to be placed, about the time of Cyrus; and Pliny discoursing on this very subject, says, that the most accurate writers were of opinion he lived a little ^b before Xerxes^q. But however they might differ in circumstances, they all agreed in paying him great honours. Plato^r, Aristotle^s, Plutarch^t, and Porphyry^u, acknowledge him to have been a person of extraordinary learning. Pliny tells us that he laughed the same day he was born, that his brains beat so hard, that they lifted up the hand laid upon them, which was a presage of his future sagacity; he adds what is very extraordinary, that he lived in the deserts 20 years, upon cheese so mixed that it did not grow stale^v. Solinus draws his character in few words; He was, says he, optimarum artium peritissimus, in the best arts skilful^w. Apuleius styles him omnis divini arcani antistes, the chief doctor in all divine mysteries; and adds, that he was the preceptor of Pythagoras^x. Agathius tells us he lived ^c under Hystaspes, and that he was the author of magism among the Persians, changing their old religion, and introducing new opinions^a. Dion Chrysostome says more of him than any of these writers, and from better authority, since what he delivered he had from the Persians themselves, as we shall hereafter have occasion to shew^b. Ctesias, an author universally condemned, was in all probability more in the right about Zoroaster, than those who have answered him, since we know from Arnobius that he affirmed him to have lived under the reign of Darius Hystaspes, and spent the first book of six, which he wrote on Persian affairs, in delivering his history^c. The sum and conclusion of all we have hitherto said, is this, that except Ctesias and Dion Chrysostome, all the ancients, who have written concerning Zoroaster, knew ^d little about him more than this; that he was a very learned and wise man, and the principal of the magi, in respect to which Eusebius indeed says, that he wrote a book, which from the citations he has given us, seems to have contained the chief doctrines of the Persian religion^d.

THE oriental writers are somewhat better agreed in relation to this wonderful man, whom they call Zerdusht, Zaradusht, Zaratusht, and Zard-busht; for they, generally speaking, acknowledge that he flourished in the reign of Gushtasp. The author of Lebtarikb, indeed, says, that some old writers confound him with Dobak or Zobak, one of the Pischedadian princes^e; but all the Persian historians, who are ^e to be supposed best acquainted with the affairs of their own nation, speak of him, not as the author, but as the reformer of the magian religion, which they say he performed by the assistance of Gushtasp (L). With respect to his family; the com-

(L) Some Arabian writers have endeavoured to insinuate, that what they call the religion of the fire-worshippers, is not of great antiquity; but all impartial authors agree in rejecting this notion, and admit that magism began very early, nay, even before the time of Abraham: certain it is that the oldest book extant in the world favours this opinion; for thus speaks Job in his protestation of his integrity, and his fervent declarations that he had always held the true faith, and done all the good he could. "If I beheld the sun, when it shined, or the moon, walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity cognizable by the judge, for I should have denied the God who is above (2)." Nothing can be clearer than this, nor can any thing more fully prove, that this heresy was as old as the Persians make it, who affirm that Keymaras, their first king was the author of their religion, and therefore of old they affected much to call themselves Keymarians, or Keymarthites. But the point they chiefly laboured in respect to antiquity, was the persuading themselves and others that their religion was the religion of Abraham. It would be no difficult matter to shew the probable source of this opinion, which we have also

- a mon opinion of the Persian and Arabick writers is, that he either was a Jew, or went very early into Judea, where he received his education, under one of the prophets, with whom he lived as a servant, and, emulous of his glory, set up for prophet afterwards himself^f. Who this prophet was, is not well agreed; some say Elias, others Ezra, and some again one of the disciples of Jeremiah. Doctor Prideaux thinks Elias was too early, and Ezra too late, he therefore fixes upon Daniel^g. Dr. Hyde inclines to Ezra^h. How true the whole of the story is, is hard to say, since the Mohammedans are all great enemies to Zerdusht, and if we take a part of their evidence, we ought to take the whole, and then it will stand thus; he quitted
- b the service of the Hebrew prophet, because having deceived and cheated him, the holy man prayed God to strike him with a leprosy, which accordingly followed; if so, then Zerdusht must have been the same with Gebazi, the servant, not of Elias, but Elisba, and consequently the credibility of the whole tale will be destroyed. The Persees in India, pretend that Zerdusht was originally a Chinese, that his father's name was Espintaman, and his mother's Dodo: but in this they are mistaken, for as to his genealogy, we are not at all at a loss, since it is thus set down in the book Sad-der; Zaratasht was the son of Purtasp, who was the son of Piterasp, the son of Hitcherasp, the son of Tbechbunesh, the son of *Espintaman*ⁱ; hence Zerdusht, being frequently called the son of Ispeutamen, the Persees in India mistook him for
- c his immediate parent, whereas indeed he was only his remote ancestor. He first took upon him the character of a prophet in the province of Aderbayagjan, which was always the residence of the fire-priests, as we have already shewn. Khondemir gives us this account of his turning prophet: he says that Zerdusht, from his great skill in astrology, discovered that another prophet was to arise, not inferior to Moses, whose voice all the world was to obey; he from thence took it into his head that he must needs be that prophet: upon this, retiring into a cave, and revolving these things in his mind, a light suddenly appeared, being no other than an illusion of the devil, who conversing with him out of the midst of the fire, Zerdusht no longer doubted that he had received the mission of prophecy, but immediately set
- d about a book, containing a system of diabolical doctrines, which he called Zend, and having finished it, he made it his business to go about the world, teaching this new religion, and erecting fire-temples^k. There is certainly a great deal of truth in what this writer says, but we presume his notion of the devil's appearing in

also touched elsewhere; but as this work is intended for a body of history, and not a collection of critical enquiries, we chuse to insert here some extracts from a celebrated Arabian history of the religions of the east, rather than to amuse our readers with conjectures of our own. "The Persian kings in general, says this writer, adhered to the religion of Abraham, and their subjects were always of the religion of their prince; there was likewise a chief or high-priest, reputed the wisest of wise men, from whose mandate there was no appeal, and whose sentence was never reversed, the same reverence being shewn to them, as we heretofore shewed unto our caliphs." A little after, he says, "The peculiar doctrine of the magi was the duality of the spiritual nature, which they affirmed to be good and evil, virtuous and wicked, benevolent and destructive; these natures they distinguished, by calling the one light, and the other darkness, or rather in their own terms Yezdan and Abriman. Hence it came to pass that their whole religion, and all the questions of the magi, turned on these two points, the explication of light being mixed with darkness, and of light freeing itself from darkness." Some pages farther the same author speaks thus: "Though the magi affirm these two principles, yet the most ancient of them did not think themselves under a necessity of affirming

"that both existed from eternity; on the contrary they held only light itself existent, and that darkness was produced; but in accounting for this they were sometimes at a loss: however, they constantly asserted that they received these doctrines from wise men and prophets, among their ancestors; first, from Keymaras; secondly, from Zerwan the Great; thirdly, from another prophet, whose name was Zerdusht. The Keymarthites insist that Keymaras is the same with Adam, wherein they agree with some Indian and Persian chronologers; yet they are contradicted by others skilful in that art. The Keymarthites also affirm that their great master established the opinion of two spiritual beings Yezdan and Abriman, acknowledging the former to be eternal and self-existent, and owning the latter to be produced and created, and that after this manner: Yezdan, i. e. God, said in himself, Unless I am opposed, how shall it be; i. e. how shall my glory arise? which thought produced darkness, which is opposite to light, and then began the controversy which has since subsisted between them (3)." We are informed by the same author, that Zerdusht himself owned Keymaras to have instituted that religion he came to reform; so that it may pass for a point tolerably well established, that the religion of the Persians is as ancient as their monarchy.

the fire, and dictating diabolical doctrines to Zerdusht, is a stroke of Mohammedan zeal, and not much to be depended on. That Zerdusht really retired into a cave, and there studied and composed his Zendavestâ, is certainly true; and that in this cave he gave himself up to prayer and contemplation, embellishing it with a great number of curious symbols, is acknowledged, and may be proved; but that he was either prompted by the devil, or acted from a spirit of imposture, is what we dare not assert, since his doctrine, if we except his permission of incest, which however is nowhere found in his writings, and is fixed on him only by his enemies; we say, his doctrines, if we except this, do not seem calculated at all for supporting the empire of Satan; and if we may believe the divines, and a greater than all divines, the devil is too wise to do or teach any thing which may destroy his own kingdom. We shall content ourselves therefore with observing what has not been observed before, that the Almighty had a peculiar favour for the Persians, and even for Darius Hystaspes, the patron of Zerdusht, and spoke many things by his prophets, as we shall prove at the bottom of the page, insinuating his care, that they should not be deceived in the first and principal point of a religion, which it is agreed, Zerdusht made it his business to fix beyond dispute (M). How long he remained

(M) We have already given our reasons for referring our thoughts on the chronology of the Persian history, till we have deduced it as low as the reign of the last monarch of the Persian nation. But this hinders not our applying the prophecies recorded in the sacred scriptures, relating to the Persian kingdom; and therefore, for the sake of clearing the memory of Zerdusht, we shall in this note shew, first, that the Almighty spoke of and to Cyrus as of and to a prince, acquainted with him the true God, and never reproaches either him or his people with idolatry. Thus the prophet Isaiah, having with wonderful eloquence displayed the power of God, and assured his countrymen that after all their sufferings, which their sins would bring upon them, he would yet turn again and remember them in mercy, and raise up a deliverer for them, which was Cyrus, king of Persia: "this, saith the prophet, is the God, " that saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited; " and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built; and " I will raise up the decayed places thereof. That " saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy " rivers. That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, " and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to " Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, " Thy foundation shalt be laid. Thus saith the Lord " to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I " have holden, to subdue nations before him; and " I will loose the loins of kings; to open before " him the two-leaved gates, and the gates shall not " be shut; I will go before thee, and make the " crooked places straight, I will break in pieces " gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of " iron. And I will give thee the treasures of dark- " nesses, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou " mayest know that I the Lord, which call thee by " thy name, am the God of Israel. For Jacob, " my servant's sake, and Israel, mine elect, I have " even called thee by thy name, I have surnamed " thee, though thou hast not known me (4)." This remarkable prophecy, which does so much honour to Cyrus, was spoken of him a hundred years before he was born; and surely, if language can prove any thing, the stile of this prophecy will be sufficient to shew that Cyrus was no idolater. We are very well aware that there is an expression at the close of what Isaiah says of this glorious monarch, which has been construed in this sense; but we can easily and at the same time fully prove that it ought not so to be understood; the expression is this: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. The meaning of which, we say, is this; that God gave him the title of his shepherd and his anointed, and actually employed him as the minister of his will, before Cyrus knew any thing of the matter; but how does this shew that he was an idolater, or that he worshipped not the true God, though he was unacquainted with the Jewish dispensation, and knew not that God by the name of Jehovah? After the taking of Babylon, Daniel certainly explained all these prophecies to Cyrus, and shewed him that while he believed himself acting only in consequence of the schemes he had formed, he was indeed fulfilling what God had told of him; in all which he was furthered and assisted by the divine power, particularly in his amazing stratagem for taking of Babylon, by altering the course of the great river, which, in the prophecy before quoted, Isaiah had distinctly foretold, making the Almighty speak thus, That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up rivers. As soon as Cyrus was acquainted with these prophecies, he readily testified his obedience to Jehovah, and his sincere belief that he was the only true God, as appears by his edict for restoring the Jews, which begins with these remarkable words: " Thus, saith Cyrus king of Persia, Jehovah, God " of heaven, hath given me all the kingdoms of " the earth, and he hath charged me to build him " an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah; who " is there among ye of all his people, his God be " with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which " is in Judah, and build the house of Jehovah. " God of Israel, he is God who is in Jerusalem (5)." We suppose there needs no commentary to prove that Cyrus was now acquainted with Jehovah, and was convinced that Jehovah, who revealed himself to the Hebrews, was the only true God, or, as Cyrus himself styles him, God of heaven. The very king, of whose reign we are now speaking, viz. Gustasp, knew all this as well as Cyrus, for in his decree relating to the temple of Jerusalem, we find these words; " That which they have need of, young " bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt-offerings of the God of heaven, wheat, salt, wine, " and oil, according to the appointment of the " priests which are at Jerusalem; let it be given " them day by day without fail, that they may offer sacrifices grateful unto the God of heaven, and " pray for the life of the king and of his sons (6)." But the close of this decree is yet stronger: " God, " who hath caused his name to dwell there, i. e. " at Jerusalem, destroy all kings and people that " shall put their hand to alter or to destroy this " house of God at Jerusalem. I Darius have " made a decree, let it be done with speed (7)." But let us return a little to Isaiah, and mark what

- a remained in this cave, or how many books he wrote there, is not very certain; we are told indeed that he brought twelve volumes to Gushtasp, each of which contained a hundred skins of velum; but this will be the less wondered at, if we consider that the ancient Persian character took up a great deal of room, and Zoroaster did not only deliver the principles of his religion, but also his own history, and the rudiments of most sciences therein, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter, when we come to speak particularly of that book, and of its contents. In the mean time, we need not wonder that he retired so long from the world, or chose a cave for his abode, since works of this nature require silence and composure. The ancient prophets resided much in deserts, that is, in unfrequented places. Epictetus and other philosophers had their cells, whither they retired to avoid the noise and tumult of the world, and they did all this without reproach; but Zoroaster's cave is made the strong proof of his being an impostor; nay, it is said that his living in a cave was a precedent for other impostors, particularly his scholar Pythagoras, who as Jamblichus informs us, had his cave as well as Zoroaster. Nay, Mohammed borrowed this notion too from Zerdusht, and wrote his Koran in imitation of the Zendevesta. After all, there is a good deal of prejudice in this, every institutor of a new religion, at least that we have ever heard of, hath collected his doctrines into a book, or directed them to be collected, and left them to his disciples: Moses did this; Zerdusht did this; and Mohammed did this; does it follow that Mohammed had in view
- b Zerdusht rather than Moses, or that he retired to a cave in imitation rather of Zerdusht than of the ancient prophets? This is certainly doing him great honour, and even attributing more to him than is his due. We have already shewn that his retirement to a cave was natural and reasonable; at the bottom of the page we shall prove, that as far as we know any thing of it, there is no just ground to suspect that it was not innocent, nay laudable, if the instructing mankind may be esteemed so. This we do not say out of any prejudice in favour of Zerdusht, arising from the pains we have taken in compiling his history, but because we are afraid of deceiving our readers, and of complying with popular opinions, at the expence of truth. If we

God says of himself, after the long description given by him of the power and empire of Cyrus, "I am Yehovah, and none else; there is no God besides me, I girded thee, i. e. Cyrus, though thou hast not known me, i. e. by my name Yehovah, that they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west that there is none besides me: I am Yehovah, and none else: I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I, Yehovah, do all these (8). It is most evident that this declaration was made in regard to the errors which had crept into the Magian religion in respect to light and darkness, and the powers presiding over them. That Zerdusht rectified these errors, and expressly taught what is declared in the text, that there was one self-existent being, author of light, and of darkness, of good, and of evil, is acknowledged by ancient and modern authors, by the friends and enemies of Zerdusht, nay by dean Prideaux himself, who yet loads him with reproach, and never mentions him but by the opprobrious name of Impostor (9). Impostor in what? In teaching that there was but one God, and that men ought not to erect images in his honour, or pretend to restrain him within the narrow bounds of temples; that instead of such mean notions of the Deity, they ought to look up to the first and most glorious creature within their ken, i. e. the sun, and before him, as the witness of his Maker, and the expressive symbol of his omniscience, testify their gratitude, thankfulness, and reverence, for all the favours conferred on them by the Creator and Ruler of all things, resolving with themselves to make a right use of his blessings, by living temperately, and doing good, and not hurt to their neighbours; till in his own due time God should instruct them farther, by the mission of the Great Prophet who was to come, concerning whom Zerdusht as well as Moses spoke: surely there are no signs of imposture. If it should be asked, How comes it then to pass that the Persians have not acknowledged Christ? we may answer, by asking another question; Why have not the Jews acknowledged him? These are secrets which God hath reserved to himself, teaching us however, plainly enough, that it is our duty to endeavour the conversion of both, and of all the nations of the earth, not by the sword, though that was an allowable argument of old, and as such put into the hand of Moses, Jesus, David, and Cyrus, but by milder methods, expressive of the christian spirit, by reasoning calmly, and by living piously. It may be justly said, that the greatest impediment to this best of all works, is the laziness of christians, their neglecting to study the grounds of their own religion, and the sources of those errors which blind the minds of others, and hinder their seeing the truth of the gospel. Many learned Jews have been converted, nay and are daily converted in Germany, not by the antichristian proceedings of an inquisition, but by proving to them, that according to the maxims of their own doctors, the Messiah is come, and consequently the obligation to their laws is removed. Might not the same thing be done with respect to these Persians? Would they not be sooner invited to christianity, if we should study and explain the writings of Zerdusht with impartiality at least, if not with respect: we say, Would they not be sooner invited by this method, to consider the arguments in favour of the gospel, than by calling him whom they esteem a prophet, an impostor, and charging them with idolatry, of which we are morally certain they are not guilty? But our note begins to exceed all bounds, and is already of a length which nothing can excuse, except its subject.

err, it shall be through defect in our abilities, and not from any bias of our inclinations; we therefore make no question, but even such as differ from us in sentiment, will be satisfied with our conduct, and approve of our intentions, though they censure our opinions (N).

(N) There cannot be a more difficult task assigned any man, than to reduce into order, and make sensible of what Greek authors have delivered in relation to oriental affairs; sometimes they speak truth, and are not believed; at other times they tell the most arrant falsties, with such an air of knowledge, that such as are not acquainted with these matters, readily take for granted all they say. The Latins copy, generally speaking, after the Greeks, and therefore are as little to be depended upon as their masters, or rather less; sometimes, however, they tell us truths, and truths which destroy in a line or two all the romantick stories that are told us elsewhere. For example, Porphyry has quoted an oracle, which, he says, was pronounced at Delphi, of a very extraordinary nature; it runs thus:

Chaldees and Jews are wise in worshipping

A self-begotten God, of all things king.

These Chaldees were the Magi, which we can easily prove from another learned writer, viz. Laetius, who speaks thus (10). It is said that philosophy had its original from the Barbarians, since among the Persians were Magi; among the Babylonians or Assyrians the Chaldeans; among the Indians the Gymnosophists, and among the Celts the Druids. For this Laetius quotes Aristotle; nay, Porphyry himself had the highest esteem for the Magi, since he describes them thus: Among the Persians, those wise persons who were employed about the Divinity, and served him, were called Magi. Laetius, on the authority of Aristotle, or the author of the treatise of magic, speaks of the manner in which they lived; They refrain, says he, from rich attire, and from wearing gold; their garments are mostly white; their beds the ground; their food nothing but herbs, cheese, and bread; their chief employment is praying to God, and exhorting men to live uprightly. Dion Chrysostome, the most polite writer among the Greeks, corrects the errors of his countrymen with respect to these Magi, in these words: "The Persians called those Magi, who were employed in the service of the gods; but the Greeks, being ignorant of the meaning of that word, apply it to such as are skilled in magic, a science unknown to the Persian sages (11)." These Magi were not only the scholars, but the masters of Zoroaster or Zerdusht; they flourished long before his time, and he doubtless acquired the rudiments of that knowledge which he afterwards so much improved, from them. Dion Chrysostome has very happily set down what from good authorities he learned in relation to Zoroaster. "It is reported, says that admirable writer; that through love of wisdom and justice, he, i. e. Zoroaster, withdrew himself from men, and lived alone in a certain mountain; that afterwards leaving the mountain, a great fire descending from above, continually burned about him. Upon this the king, with the prime nobility of Persia, came and prayed with him to God. That he was unhurt by the fire, delivered himself in terms, which discovered more than human wisdom, exhorting the people to be cheerful, and to offer certain sacrifices, as if God had come with him to that place; thenceforward he conversed not with all men, but with such only as were most addicted to truth, and by reason of their studies more capable of the knowledge of the gods, whom the Persians stile Magi (12)." Having thus learned from an unbiassed author, what it was that led Zoroaster to mountains and deserts, let us next see what we can discover as to his employment in his Cave. But before we proceed to quote authorities on this head, let us observe that according to all the accounts we have hitherto had of the Magi, they were very indifferently fitted to act in subserviency to an impostor, such as Zerdusht has been reported; for they were spiritual people, who sought not power and wealth, but wisdom and truth; they resembled rather the baptist in his coarse cloathing, and simple diet, than those who are to be seen in the courts of kings, prostituting religion to private ends, and unworthily taking the name of God in vain, to gratify the pride of mortals. In our account of the Persian religion, we have given Zerdusht's rule for the clergy of all ranks, and from thence it evidently appears, he thought not of erecting an empire over the consciences of men for the aggrandizing the priesthood; which among the Persians was hereditary, but endeavoured to make his priests superior to other men by the single method whereby one man can excel another, viz. through purity of morals, and improvement of the understanding (13). Such a scheme as this needed neither conjuring nor fanaticism to recommend it; and therefore, prima facie, it should seem that a man of Zerdusht's character retired to a cave for the sake of privacy and silence, and not to raise devils, or coin lying fictions; these are fit works for illiterate and ambitious men, such as Mohammed was, but not for Zerdusht. It so happens, however, that we have some proof of this great man's employment in his cell; Porphyry tells us, "that Zoroaster, first among the Persians did consecrate a natural cave in the mountains in honour of Mithra, the king and father of all, signifying by this cave the world framed by Mithra, by the other things disposed within it in fit distances, the elements and quarters of the world (14)." The very learned Celsus, as we find him quoted by Origen, gives us also an account of these caves in these words: "The Persians, says he, in their Mithrian rites, represent symbolically the two-fold motion of the stars, viz. of those fixed, fixed, and of the planets, and the passage of the soul through them. To demonstrate this, they set up a ladder, on the ascent of which there were seven gates with the eighth at the very top; the first of lead; the second of tin; the third of brass; the fourth of iron; the fifth of a mixed mass; the sixth of silver; and the seventh of gold. They attributed the first to Saturn, the slowness of that planet's motion being intimated by the lead; the second to Venus, on account of the softness and brightness of tin; the third being of brass, than which nothing is more solid or durable, to Jupiter; the fourth to Mercury, because, like iron, he is suited to all sorts of labours, from whence profit may be drawn; the fifth, because of its mixture, variableness, and irregularity, to Mars; the sixth to the moon; and the seventh to the sun, because of the likeness in their colour to silver and gold (15)." Here is a great deal of philosophy, but no witchcraft or enthusiasm in these representations; and if Zoroaster be condemned either as a magician or an impostor on account of the furniture of his cave, what will become of our makers of Oracles? We will conclude this very note, with observing, that the most judicious Dion Chrysostome, whom we have so often quoted and commended, knew well the folly and falsehood of the

Greeks,

2. As our design in this section is to follow the oriental historians, we think it necessary to insert here what is delivered by the Persian historians, relating to the appearance of Zerdusht, when he first took upon him the character of a prophet, and demanded from Gushtasp and his subjects the obedience due to a Messenger from God. In regard to this we have a copious relation written by a Persian, from authentick memoirs of ancient times, preserved by the judicious Dr. Hyde, the substance of which, as it never appeared before in our language, we hope will be well received, though doubtless it stands in need of great allowances, as to the miracles mentioned in it, and other things. However the fabulous history of the Persians is at least as well worth knowing as the conjectures of western authors on this subject, which are often as improbable, and always as uncertain. Thus then proceeds our author: "In this reign flourished Zerdusht the prophet. He coming into the presence of Gushtasp, informed him of his commission in these terms. I am a prophet, sent to thee by the most wise God, and this book, viz. the Zend-avesta, I brought from Paradise; also he gave me this cassock, and this girdle, saying, Put on this cassock, and gird thyself with this girdle, that thy soul may be delivered from Gebenna, and that thou mayest find salvation; go also and propagate the true religion throughout the world. When Gushtasp had heard this message from the prophet, he said, But how shall I know that thou art really a prophet, and came to me from the most high God? For without a sign, the truth of what you say cannot be known, neither ought a religion to be received till it be supported by miracles. If therefore thou art truly a prophet, shew us some sign that I may know, and be assured that thou art a messenger of God. When Zerdusht heard what the king demanded, he in compliance therewith wrought the following miracle. He planted before the gate of the palace a cypress tree, which grew in a few days so wonderfully, that it was near ten fathoms in girth, and fell ten in height; and in the top of this tree he erected a summer-house. When the king had beheld this miracle, he was convinced, and determined in his mind to embrace the religion of Zerdusht. He was however advised to call for certain wise men, who might dispute with Zerdusht. This was accordingly done, but they could not convince him; on the contrary Zerdusht prevailed. These however hating him, devised this method for his destruction. Zerdusht had his lodgings in the palace, and as often as he went out he left his keys with the porter. This porter they corrupted, and engaged him to be silent, and not discover any thing they did. They then made use of him to gain entrance into the lodgings of Zerdusht, when he was abroad; and when they had so done, they threw into his wardrobe, put into his book Zend, and into his cloak-bag all sorts of unclean and impure things, such as the bones of cats and dogs, and the hair and nails of dead bodies; these they scattered amongst his things. Which when they had done, they went out, shut the doors carefully, and returned the keys to the porter. Zerdusht in the mean time walked in the simplicity of his heart, praising God, but his enemies considered not this. They immediately addressed themselves to the king, to this purpose: This wicked man, viz. Zerdusht, is employed every night in diabolical practices, by which, O king, thy heart will be inevitably ensnared, unless thou wilt instantly send some of thy guards to search his apartments, that thou mayest be certified whether these things be so or not. The king sent hereupon his guards to the apartments of Zerdusht to search them, and to bring all things they found in them before him. This accordingly was done, and all sorts of unclean things, such as the bones of dogs and cats, the hair and nails of dead bodies were found in his chest of cloaths, his book of Zend-avesta, and in his cloak-bag. The king seeing all this, turned to Zerdusht, and said, in a high passion, How is this, thou profligate, and what is it thou hast been doing? Zerdusht heard his accusers, and the king pa-

Greeks, in what they reported of the religion of the Persians, and of their consecrating horses to the sun (16). They were far, says he, from fancying the chariot of the sun, the most sublime spectacle in nature they were acquainted with; the supreme charioteer who put the universe into motion, and still guides it. Of this subject, not Homer, nor Hesiod, but Zoroaster, and the magi, his disciples taught by him, have sung in strains worthy of the glorious theme. But all their discourses are to be interpreted in a very different manner, say directly opposite from the comments of our writers. They acknowledge that the director of the universe is inaccessible and inscrutable; they compare the motions of the sun and moon to horses under direction, but as to horses consecrated to them, the Greeks have reported numberless fables.

"tiently, and without emotion. At last he thus answered for himself, O king, a
 "all that thou seest I know nothing of, neither belongeth it to me. Then the "king called for the porter, and having examined him, the king threw from him
 "the book Zend, and commanded Zerdusht to be shut up in prison. Thus, notwithstanding his innocence, Zerdusht was thrust into confinement, which he endured "cheerfully, standing all day in one posture, praying to and praising God, without receiving any sustenance whatever. It happened shortly after that a black "horse, of which the king was particularly fond, was taken in an odd manner, its "fore-feet shrinking up to its belly in such a way, that the creature fell down to the "ground, and could no way be raised up. The master of the horse, called in the "Persian language Mib-mard, when he came, as he was wont, into the stables, and b
 "perceived what had befallen the king's favourite steed, he went immediately "and acquainted Gushtasp. The king no sooner heard it than he went in person "to the stable, and having viewed the horse, called for the wise men who had "engaged him to imprison Zerdusht, and desired them to contrive immediately some "remedy for this extraordinary malady of the horse, which they were unable to "do, and confessed as much to the king. When Gushtasp found this, he grew very "uneasy, because he valued his horse extremely. On the fourth day the porter "went to see Zerdusht in prison. Of him Zerdusht enquired news, and why he "came not before to visit him. The porter told him the court was much disturbed
 "on account of a misfortune which had befallen the king's black courser. Zerdusht c "bid the porter tell the king that when he should be released out of prison, he "would quickly restore his horse. The porter ran with this news to the king, who
 "as soon as he was informed thereof, sent for Zerdusht out of prison, and carried him with him to the stable. Zerdusht seeing the condition the horse was in,
 "turned to the king, and said, Sir, this is no easy matter, but, on the contrary,
 "a cure very difficult to be performed. One thing however I have to desire, "that what you wish may be performed; it is this: That you believe with "your whole heart that the religion I taught you is true, and came from God;
 "which if you do sincerely, I shall be able to restore your steed, otherwise it "must remain in the state it is in. Then the king, struck with the awful steadiness d "of Zerdusht, believed according as he desired. Upon which the prophet "advancing to the black horse, stroaked his right fore-foot with his hand, whereupon "the fore-foot immediately withdrew out of the belly of the horse, and "hung in its natural position. Then Zerdusht, turning to the king, said, It is "necessary, Sir, that both your sons come hither, embrace the religion I have "taught, and promise to make war on infidels for the propagation of this religion.
 "Then came instantly Basbuten and Ispendiyar, the sons of Gushtasp, and embraced "the religion of Zerdusht, as he had desired. Upon this the prophet went again
 "to the horse, and with his left hand stroaked the horse's left fore-foot, which immediately e
 "the creature extended in its natural state. Then turned Zerdusht to the "king, and said, Sir, it is still necessary that Ketayun the mother of Ispendiyar
 "should embrace this religion. Then Gushtasp sent one of his attendants with Zerdusht
 "to the palace, and the prophet being come into the queen's presence, addressed
 "her thus: O thou, matron of matrons, whom God hath preferred above all "women and raised high above your sex, by giving thee Gushtasp for thine husband, "and Ispendiyar for thy son, like whom there is none upon the earth.
 "Behold now the king of kings, and thy son Ispendiyar have embraced, and "with their whole hearts believe the truth of the religion I have taught; it is necessary, f
 "O queen, that you also receive and believe it. Then answered Ketayun, "Whatsoever my husband and my son believe, that also will I embrace and believe.
 "Then Zerdusht returning to the black horse, put up his prayers, and stroaking "with his right hand the right hind foot, it was restored to its natural strength.
 "Then Zerdusht turning to the king, said, You see your horse has recovered three "legs; it is necessary for the recovery of the fourth, that you interrogate your
 "porter, and get the truth out of him, that the innocent may not be blamed,
 "seeing if the porter told the truth, then the horse will fully recover, or otherwise "remain in the state it did. The king thereupon ordered the porter to be "brought, and caused him to be severely threatened that he might discover the "truth, as to the scattering unclean and abominable things in the lodgings of "Zerdusht. The porter, dreading the king's anger, most humbly besought him to "grant

- a " grant him his life, which the king having promised, he then opened the whole
 " conspiracy in these words: Four of these wise men, who are so much in your " favour, that I was afraid of refusing them any thing, gave me a bribe, and " taking the keys from me, did all that your majesty has heard and seen. When " the king had heard all that the porter had to say, he was extremely sorry, and " made a long apology to Zerdusht for the injury he had done him, in causing him " to be so long imprisoned, without any grounds at all, beseeching him to pass
 " by and forgive it. Then the four wise men were hanged on a gibbet, and " Zerdusht having lift up his hands in prayer, stroked with his left hand the left " hind leg of the horse, which immediately fell from his belly, and rested on the b " ground as it used to do, so that quickly after the beast rose and stood upon all his " feet. At this the king greatly rejoiced, treating Zerdusht with greater honour " and respect than ever, causing him to be placed on a golden seat himself,
 " i. e. the king believing the book Zendavesta, and living in exact conformity
 " to its precepts. It is reported that some time after this king Gushtasp applied " himself to Zerdusht, and said, There is one thing that I desire of thee, and I " desire it so earnestly, that I hope you will not refuse it, since if you grant me
 " this request, then shall I be thoroughly satisfied that thou art a prophet sent unto " me by the most high God. Zerdusht desired the king that he would explain " himself, that he might apply to God for the gratification of the king's will. Then c " king Gushtasp said, My desire is this, that while I am yet alive, my soul may be " satisfied as to its future state, by beholding the joys of heaven, that it may be " certain concerning them, and at ease. Moreover, I desire that I may know all " things that shall pass till the day of judgment, with the same exactness as I know
 " things present. 3dly, I desire that in all the wars I wage on account of religion,
 " my body may remain as it is, and I become invulnerable. 4thly, I desire that " my soul may continue to exist to the day of resurrection, and that I die not " at all. The prophet of God hearing this, answered, I will certainly put up
 " my prayers to the creator of all things, neither doubt I at all that the most high " God will grant what you have desired. But your fourth request must be yielded d " to four different persons, since it belongs to God alone to enjoy them all at " once. Do you therefore consider who these persons shall be, and I will put up " prayers that one of your requests may be granted to each. Then king Gushtasp
 " desired for himself, that he might be permitted to behold his place in paradise, " and take a distinct view of all that was therein. He likewise mentioned three " other persons on whom the remaining blessings should be bestowed; then Zerdusht
 " being satisfied, retired to his own lodgings, and spent the whole night in pray" ers and praises to God, beseeching him, that if it were possible all these things might " come to pass. The next day when light appeared, and the sun displayed his " beams on the tops of the mountains, it came into the mind of Zerdusht to cone " secrate the four following things, viz. wine, a rose, a cup, and the kernel of a " pomgranate. And after he had consecrated these by prayer, having the sacred
 " twigs in his hand, he presented the wine to Gushtasp, and as soon as the king
 " had drank thereof, he fell down as if in a deep sleep, and continued for three " days and three nights in the same position, his soul within that space ascend" ing into heaven, and beholding there the joys of the blessed. At the end of " three days he awaked, and going to Zerdusht, beseeched him to pardon his incre-" dulity. Then the prophet gave to Gjmasp the rose which he had consecrated,
 " which he no sooner smelt, than he knew all things that passed, all that had hap" pened from the beginning, and which were to happen, and which should happen f " to the day of resurrection. Then Zerdusht gave milk in the cup to Bshaten, the " son of Gushtasp, who by drinking thereof was made immortal. As to the fourth
 " thing, Isfbeniyyar having eaten the kernel of the pomgranate, had his body
 " rendered as invulnerable as brass. After this the religion of Zerdusht spread,
 " and was propagated every-where, all men readily yielding belief thereto, excepting
 " Argjasp, king of Touran, who embraced it not¹.

THE great desire all people have to magnify the princes who have ruled, and the prophets who have taught them, hath doubtless encouraged the Persians to propagate a multitude of strange things in relation to Zerdusht; the foregoing long quotation is sufficient to shew the nature of their notions, and to excuse us from a making any farther transcripts from their books. Let us return therefore to the story of his propagating his doctrines, and let us endeavour to put our materials together as succinctly as we may.

THE two reigning heresies before the birth of Zerduſht were Zabiſm and Magiſm; the latter was far leſs groſs than the former, and conſequently there required more care to keep its profeſſors from going over to the oppoſite religion. For hiſtory informs us, and the experience even of our own times, renders it manifeſt, that the bulk of mankind embrace more readily ſuperſtition than truth. Hence it came to paſs that the Zabians gained ground in Persia, and multitudes, eſpecially of the common people, were fallen into wrong notions of the deity, and into groſs errors in their manner of worſhiping him, living alſo in continual fear of the evil ſpirit, whom they conceived to be the enemy of their ſpecies, and the continual diſturbur of the world. Zerduſht took pains to root out all theſe notions, and to make the people eaſier than they had been, by inſpiring them with reaſonable opinions; he taught them that the ſupreme being was independent and ſelf-exiſtent from all eternity, that light and darkneſs, good and evil, were continually mixed, and in a continual ſtruggle, not through any impotency in the creator, but becauſe ſuch was his will, and becauſe this diſcordancy was for his glory; that in the end there would be a general reſurrection, and a day of retribution, wherein ſuch as had done well, and lived obedient to the law of God, ſhould go with the angel of light into a realm of light, where they ſhould enjoy peace and pleaſure for evermore; and thoſe who had done evil, ſhould ſuffer with the angel of darkneſs, everlaſting puniſhment in a land of obſcurity, where no ray of light or mercy ſhall ever viſit them; that thenceforward light and darkneſs ſhall be incapable of mixture to all eternity. He took great pains to perſuade his diſciples of all the attributes of the divinity, eſpecially of his wiſdom and his juſtice, in conſequence of which he aſſured them that they had none to fear but themſelves, becauſe nothing could render them unworthy of the divine favour, but their vices. Of all virtues, he eſteemed what the Greeks called philanthropy, and the apoſtles brotherly love, the greateſt: for which reaſon he exhorted all his followers to acts of charity and beneficence; ſometimes alluring them by promiſes, at other times; driving them as it were by threatnings. The credenda of his religion were not numerous nor perplexed, though according to the mode of the eaſt, he ſometimes made uſe of parabolic relations; as for example; when he taught that on the fourth day after death the ſoul came to the bridge Tchinavar, and was there met by the angels Mibr-Izad and Reſhu-Izad, who weighed in the balance the good and evil actions of the ſoul attempting to paſs; and in caſe the former prevailed, then it went ſafely over the bridge; if the latter, it was thrown thence into Gebenna, that is into the region of darkneſs, where the ſouls of the wicked are puniſhed. That this is really a parabolic deſcription, and not a literal account of what is to happen after death, we ſuppoſe appears from the very face of the relation; for it cannot be ſuppoſed that Zerduſht, who was indifputably a very wiſe and learned man, and who took pains to make all his diſciples ſo, ſhould nevertheless attempt to impoſe upon them ſo abſurd a thing as this taken in a literal ſenſe, viz. that a ſpirit diveſted of matter ſhould travel over a bridge lying acroſs hell, and leading to heaven; and that after weighing his actions in a pair of ſcales, the good angel ſhould either lead him over ſafe, or the bad one puſh him down; this is abſolutely incredible. But that he ſhould make uſe of theſe terms to inſinuate that the effects of our good and evil deeds transcend the grave, and either lead us to everlaſting reſt, or project us into never-ending miſery, is eaſy to be underſtood, and might as eaſily have been believed. In the book Sad-der, which is a compendium of the doctrines of Zerduſht, collected in his own words, this deſcription of the ſtate of the dead is placed in the firſt chapter; and in the ſecond it is thus applied: Men who believe the religion of Zerduſht, will be afraid not only of great but of ſmall ſins; for ſince all are weighed and numbered, and according to the preponderating of this or that ſcale the ſoul is to be happy or miſerable for ever, whoever thinks of this will be afraid of adding weight to the left-hand ſcale, and earneſtly deſire to heap meritorious actions in that on the right hand, becauſe his all reſts on this trial. This is very ſound divinity, and very intelligible, where the

a mind is unprejudiced, otherwise it is easy to ridicule the soul supporting bridge, and the action weighing angels, and consequently to expose Zerdusht, not only as a wicked but as a weak impostor. But to proceed, he carefully instructed those who heard him, and directed them to instruct all who would believe in his religion, that no man ought to despair of the mercy of God, or suppose that it was too late for him to amend; he declared, that tho' we had a faculty of distinguishing between good and evil, yet that man has no conception of the value which God sets on our actions, nor how far the intention may sanctify even a trivial act, wherefore even the worst of men may hope the divine favour from repentance and good works; this he exemplified by another parable, which is also recorded in the book Sad-der, and which runs in these words: "It is reported of Zerdusht, the author of our religion, that one day, retiring from the presence of God, he beheld the body of a man plunged in Gebenna, his right foot only being free, and sticking with- out. Zerdusht thereupon cried out, What is this that I see, and wherefore is this man in this condition? He was answered, This man, whom you see in this condition, was formerly the prince of thirty-three cities, over which he reigned many years, without doing any one good action; for besides oppression, injustice, pride, and violence, nothing ever entered his mind; and though he was the scourge of multitudes, yet without regarding their misery, he lived at ease in his palace. One day, however, as he was hunting, he beheld a sheep caught by the foot in the thicket, and thereby held at such a distance from food, that it must have perished; this king, moved at the sight, alighting from his horse, released the sheep from the thicket, and led it to the pasture; now for this act of tenderness and compassion his foot remains out of Gebenna, though his whole body be plunged therein for the multitude of his sins. Endeavour therefore to do all the good thou canst without fear or apprehension; for God is benign and merciful, and will reward even the smallest good thou doest". These hints of his doctrines, compared with what has been already delivered, in speaking of the religion of the ancient Persians, cannot but be sufficient to shew the general import of Zerdusht's scheme of religion; as to exterior rites, he altered the old method of burning fire on the tops of mountains, and in other places, under the open air, engaging his followers to erect Pyrea or fire-temples throughout all the dominions of Persia, that this symbol of the divinity might not at every turn be liable to be extinguished. He gave them likewise a liturgy, which they hold to have been brought to him from heaven; and therefore refuse to make any alterations therein, though the language in which it is written is long ago grown obsolete, and is very little understood by the priests themselves. The priests, or, as we stile them, the magi, were, according to his institution, of three ranks: The first, consisted of the ordinary or parochial clergy, as Dr. Prideaux very significantly terms them; their duty was to read the holy offices daily in the chapels, and at certain stated and solemn times, to acquaint the people with the contents of Zerdusht's books, and to paraphrase on and explain them. In these parochial chapels, there were no fire-altars, but lamps only, before which their devotions were performed. The next degree of their clergy had the superintendency of these ordinary priests, and were to them what bishops are to us: these too had their churches, in which, were altars, whereon fire was continually kept, there being a certain number of the inferior clergy appointed to attend them, who, by four at a time, waited constantly near the altar, to provide it with fuel, and to assist such devout persons as resorted thither, with their advice, and their prayers. Above these was the archimagus, i. e. the high priest, or as the Persians stiled him, the Mubad Mubadan. Zerdusht himself assumed this office, and resided in the city of Balch, where he governed his magians, and instructed them in all sorts of learning. As the austerity of his own life, and his extensive knowledge, supported him in the high reputation he had gained among his contemporaries, he recommended, as we have seen in the rules given by him for the conduct of the archimagus, the same behaviour, and the same application to study unto his successors. These injunctions were for many ages pursued by them, and was the reason that they were admitted into the king's councils, sat with him in judicature, and had the education of the heirs of the crown; insomuch that Pliny tells us in his time, This religion was received by many nations, and bore sway in the East over the king of kings. It remains now that we give an account of the book of the laws still extant among the Persees, and indubitably written by Zerduſht, whether he was a prophet or impostor; for as to the remaining actions of his life, and his immature death, they belong to the reign of Gushtaſp, and shall be accordingly taken notice of therein.

Zerduſht's book, containing the institutes of his religion, is stiled Zend or Zendavasta, usually pronounced Zund and Zundavastaw, which is not a Persian, but an exotic word signifying a Tinderbox; its author in compliance with the oriental custom of giving all important treatises allegorical names, having pitched on this to express the nature of his book, which was to inspire its readers with divine zeal; he likewise caused it to be stiled the book of Abraham, intimating that it contained the doctrines held by that patriarch. It is written, not in the ordinary Persian character, but in the old Perſic, called from thence, among the ordinary Persees, the Zund character. The very learned Dr. Thomas Hyde proposed to the world the publishing a correct edition of it with a Latin translation, but meeting with no encouragement to undertake so laborious and expensive a work, the world has been deprived of the sight of this great curiosity*. It was originally written in twelve hundred skins, and consists of one and twenty parts, or different treatises, all comprehended under the general title of Zend or Zendavasta, which is the reason that we have had in Europe so many different accounts of this book, and its contents. For the sake of the people who profess this religion, and who have notwithstanding no knowledge at all either of the Zund character, or of the language in which that book is written, a very learned priest has taken the pains to make a compendium thereof in modern Persian, which is the book Sad-der, so often quoted by us from the Latin version published by Dr. Hyde, and annexed to his impartial history of the religion of the antient Persians. This learned critic is of opinion that Zerduſht did not originally intend to have made this book consist of any more than two parts, viz. the Zend and Pazend, resembling the Mishna and Gemara in the Jewish Talmud; the first containing the liturgy and principal doctrines of his religion; the second a commentary on them, explaining and shewing the rationale of them: but as new adversaries rose up daily, and other occasions required new treatises, Zerduſht continued to write them, and to add them to his Zendavasta, which still retained the general title of the volume. Amongst the pieces comprehended under that title, there is one bearing the title of Zeratusht-nama, i. e. the history of Zerduſht, which is no other than his life, written by himself. This, that it may be more generally known, has been rendered into the common Persian by the priests who published the book Sad-der†. The celebrated Dr. Prideaux, speaking of this book, acknowledges that the rules and exhortations to moral living are written very pressingly, and with sufficient exactness, excepting only in one particular, which is that of incest; for this, he says, is wholly taken away by Zerduſht, who teaches that nothing of this nature is unlawful, but that a man may not only marry his sister or his daughter, but his mother; and he very justly observes, that this is such an abomination, that though all things else were right in that book, this alonewere sufficient to pollute it. But in support of all this, the doctor does not quote either the book itself, or its compendium the book Sad-der, or any other treatise, written by an avowed Persee, but the authorities of Diogenes Laertius, Strabo, Philo Judæus, Tertullian, and Clemens Alexandrinus‡. It is but reasonable that we should suspend our belief till we have a decisive account of this matter, especially if we consider that in other respects these authors are frequently mistaken. It may indeed be urged, that incest was commonly practised by the Persian kings (if we give intire credit to the Greek historians); but admitting this to be so, it is no direct proof that Zerduſht allowed it, any more than the contrary practice of the Persees at this day, is a demonstration that he did not allow it. As to the rest of the contents of this book, we shall not insist farther on them here, because it would lead us into too long a digression from the thread of our history; but the inquisitive reader will find at the bottom of the page some farther memorandums relating to the works of Zoroaster (O).

(O) In this note we shall speak largely of Zerduſht's writings, that is, as largely as the nature of this work will allow; and that we may do this clearly, we will consider them, first, as they are known

W E will conclude our account of this extraordinary person, with observing that he is said by credible authors to have predicted the coming of the Messiah, and this not in dark and obscure terms, such as might have been applied as well to any other person, but in plain and express words, and such as could not be mistaken; nay farther, it is affirmed that the wise men out of the east, recorded by the evangelist¹ to have come to Bethlehem, and there worshipped our Saviour on account of his star, which they had seen in their own country, were the disciples of Zerdusht. Some of the learned indeed slighting this relation have fixed on Balaam's prophecy², in order to account for that event; and hence without doubt it happened that so learned a man as Hornius, was of opinion that Zoroaster might have been the same person³. Far be it from us to countenance any superstitious stories, and as far be it from us either to conceal or to detract from truth, or what has the appearance of truth; we are writing the life of Zerdusht from such authors as have come to our hands, we ought not therefore to omit mentioning a circumstance of such consequence, and supported by various testimonies. If the distrust which critics affect to shew of all things reported by oriental writers, should be sufficient to overturn to the Perses, and oriental nations in general; secondly, as they are known to the Greeks.

The Zendavasta, as we have said in our text, is divided into one and twenty treatises, each called by the Perses Nesick, or broadly pronounced, Nusk, i. e. a part. Every one of these treatises has its proper title suited to the subject of which it treats. Thus Panend, which is the name of the second treatise, signifies the prop or buttress of the Zend, because it comprehends the reasons supporting the doctrines delivered in the first part, called simply the Zend; the sixteenth treatise is that called Zerdushtinama, or the life of Zerdusht, mentioned in the text. Dr. Hyde, who like a generous man desired that all the world should partake of the treasures he had in his hands, published the contents of this book, in hopes they might so far move the curiosity of the publick, as to enable him to publish the book itself. It contains forty chapters, and about a hundred and forty pages, wherein the whole mystery of Zerdusht's character as a prophet, and the methods made use of by him for the propagation of his religion are set forth at large (17). The twentieth treatise in the Zendavasta is called Bizisht-nama, i. e. the Book of Physicians, because it treats of the virtues of drugs, and how they may be applied. Thus the writings of Zerdusht contain not only the religion, but the learning of the magi, and therefore he recommended it to all his successors, in the office of high priest, to be perfect masters of all useful learning. As the book Zend is the bible of the Perses, so to express a right or just thing, they say Zend-aver, i. e. permitted by the Zend, and an evil action they call Na-Zendaver, i. e. not permitted by the book Zend. Zend-Laph signifies a zealous Perser, but Zend-chuan, which literally rendered, is a reader of the Zend, signifies not a common reader, but him who reads it in the parish church, so that it is equivalent to what the Jews call Chacham, and the Mohammedans, Imam. As to the notion of Curtius, of the magi's singing their prayers, it is not, strictly speaking, true, though they have a particular tone of voice proper to the recital of their prayers, in which they agree with the modern Jews, and perhaps with many other nations (18). Dr. Pridaux is very severe on this method of devotion, and compares it to the manner of popish priests celebrating their mass (19); but in respect to those things which are regulated by custom, perhaps those censures should be spared, since it is hard to find the reason why the custom of one country should render ridiculous the custom of another.

As to what the Greeks knew of Zoroaster's writings, it is difficult to say what ought to be believed; Eusebius speaks of a collection of physicks written by this great man, and quotes from thence the following descriptions of God's attributes, affirming them to be the express words of Zoroaster: "God hath the head of a hawk, he is the first incorruptible, eternal, unbegotten, indivisible, most like himself, the charioteer of every good, one that cannot be bribed, the best of things good, the wisest of things wise; he is moreover the father of equity and justice, self-taught, self-existent, infinitely perfect, omniscient, and the sole ruler of nature (20)." Suidas ascribes to him four books of nature, one of precious stones, five of the wisdom of the stars (21). Pliny says he wrote two millions of verses, on which Hermippus wrote commentaries, a treatise on agriculture, and a book of visions (22). But of all the works mentioned by the Greeks, his oracles are the most considerable, because of them there are still some remains, could we be sure they were genuine; but Porphyry says expressly, that some christian hereticks boasting of the secret works of Zoroaster, attempted to deceive the world, and if they believe what they say, are deceived themselves, since these treatises are no better than forgeries (23). The famous prince of Mirandula gave the oracles yet extant some reputation by the following account of a manuscript in his own possession; "I was, says he, forcibly taken off from other things, and engaged to study the Arabian and Chaldean learning by certain books, in both those languages which came to my hands, not accidentally, but questionable, by the disposal of God in favour of my studies; hear the inscriptions, and you will believe it. These Chaldaic books, if I ought to call them books and not treasures, are the oracles of Zoroaster Abenefra, and Melchier, magi, in which those things which are faulty and defective in the Greek are read here perfect and intire. There is also an exposition by Chaldaic wise men on these oracles concise, and somewhat obscure indeed, but full of rare mysteries, and curious learning. There is besides a book of the Chaldaic theology, with a copious and admirable discourse of the wisdom of the Persians, Grecians, and Chaldeans (24)." Ficinus, to the credit of these predictions in the judgment of an impartial reader, it is not our fault; we are to relate, but in cases of this nature every man must determine for himself (P). On the whole we may be permitted to say, that on a view of what different authors have delivered concerning Zerdusht and his writings, he stands fairly entitled to the character we have given him of an extraordinary person, especially when we reflect that his ministry was of no long continuance, according to the most to whom he directed this letter, found these books after his decease, but so worn and illegible, that nothing could be made of them. Some of these oracles which escaped the injuries of time, were first published at Paris by Lewis Tillet in 1563, with the commentaries of Gemijus Pletho; the same were afterwards translated, and with the comment of Pfellus published at Paris 1607. But Franciscus Patricius, having greatly enlarged them by excerpts from Proclus, Hermias, Simplicius, Damascius, and Arnobius, sent them into the world with an accurate translation of his own. From him our ingenious countryman Mr. Stanley took them and published them with the commentaries of Pletho and Pfellus, at the end of his Chaldaic philosophy in 1661 (25).

(P) The wisdom of the east, was not only a scripture phrase, but used also by the best profane authors, who knew very well, that notwithstanding the boasting of the Greeks, science came originally from that corner of the world. It is a common, but no very probable opinion, that they were kings who visited our Saviour in his cradle; tho' they might indeed come from a king, that is from the king of Persia, to enquire for the Messiah. That they might come, as some have insisted, from Arabia, is true, because Arabia lay in their way; but that the magi came from another country than Persia, in which they always flourished, is what cannot easily be believed; but that these magi or wise men went into Judea in pursuance of Zerdusht's prophecy, is a point to be proved, not by us indeed, who have not seen the Zendavasta, but even without seeing it we shall be able to justify what we have said in the text, and defend ourselves from the imputation of superstition, if we can but produce probable authorities. Sbarisiani, whom we have more than once quoted in his history of the religions of the east, says expressly, that Zerdusht prophesied in his Zendavasta, that in latter times there should arise a man called Osbanderbagha, i. e. Homo Mundi; which differs little from the title Christ often gives himself of the Son of Man, of whom Zerdusht prophesied, that he should teach the world true religion and justice, that for a time his kingdom should be oppressed by the devil; but in the end, this righteous person shall triumph, and shall establish peace and happiness upon earth (26). To this let us add a very extraordinary passage from the travels of M. Tavernier. "They give, says he, three children to their prophet, and though they have not hitherto appeared in the world, their names are however settled. As he passed the river, say they, ab ipso cecidit tres seminis genitales guttas, which are preserved to the end of the world. That God shall send a virgin for whom he has a favour into the same water, who per receptionem primæ guttæ, shall be impregnated, and bring forth a son, who shall be called Osbander, he shall appear in the world with great authority, and shall oblige it to receive the law of his father, and shall discourse with much eloquence, and confirm what he says with miracles. The second, who shall be called Osbanderma, shall be conceived in the same manner, he shall second his brother in his designs, and shall assist him in preaching, he shall stop the course of the thirteen days, to force by that sign the belief of the people whom he teaches. The third shall be conceived by the same mother in the same way; his name shall be Sannaïet-batius, he shall come into the world with greater authority than either of his brothers, that he may reduce all nations to the true religion; after which shall be the general resurrection, when the souls in heaven, and in hell, shall return and take possession of their bodies; the mountains and all the metals shall then melt, and sinking into the gulph of hell, shall fill it up, so that the mansions of the devils shall be ruined. After this great change the earth shall be plain and pleasant, and men shall live happily therein, praising God, and his prophet (27)." Dr. Hyde observes very judiciously, that these three sons represent the three states of the Messiah. His nativity, when his coming was published to the world by various means; his ministry, while he continued upon earth, preaching and doing miracles; and his second advent, when he shall judge the world in righteousness, and his saints shall rejoice and sing (28). But the strongest evidence of this matter is the testimony of the famous Abul-Pharajius, who writes thus: "Zerdusht or Zordusht, the preceptor of the magian sect, began to teach in Aderbaydjan, or as some say, in Affria. He taught the Persians, that our Lord Christ would manifest himself, commanding them to carry him gifts, telling them that in the latter times a virgin should conceive without the help of man, and that when she should bring forth, a star should appear shining in the day-time, in the middle of which the figure of a virgin should be seen. You therefore, O my children, having notice of his birth before all other nations, when ye see that star, follow it, which will direct you to the place where he is born, adore him, offer him your gifts, for he is that word which established the heavens (29)." This passage is quoted by Dr. Hyde, but there is another in the same author which he has not mentioned, which we therefore shall from that excellent author exhibit to our readers: "The same year Cæsar the emperor sent Cyrenius into Judea in order to tax it. Joseph, the husband of Mary, going up upon this occasion from Nazareth to Jerusalem, that he might give in his name, when he came to Bethlehem, in the way Mary did bring forth a son. The magi brought their gifts from the east, and offered to Christ gold, myrrh, and frankincense. Being questioned on this head by Herod, in their passage they answered thus: A person of great fame among us, in a book which he left us, hath thus admonished us: There shall hereafter be born in Palestine a male child descending from heaven, whom the greatest part of the world shall obey; now the sign of his appearance shall be this: Ye shall see a strange star which shall direct you till it stops, which when ye shall behold, take ye gold, myrrh, and frankincense, and offer them to him, and adore him; then return ye, lest great evil should overtake ye. Now, therefore this star appearing, we come to do as we were commanded (30)." A noble testimony surely!

a authentic accounts not above five years, that is from the time of his presenting himself to Gushtasp, on his being slain at the sack of Baleb; but it is now time for us to return to the history of Gushtasp, and of the remarkable events which happened during his reign (Q).

THE old animosities between the inhabitants of Touran and Iran broke out into a fresh war, while Gushtasp sat on the throne of his ancestors; it is not easy to say, whether this monarch, or Argjasp, who then reigned in Touran, was the aggressor. Mirkbond inclines to the former opinion, and makes this a war of religion, undertaken to reduce Argjasp and his subjects to the faith of Zerdusht, that prince being according to Dr. Prideaux a zealous Zabian;* which if he was, we know not how to account for it, since it should seem that the old religion of Persia flourished there in the days of Phridan; and as we have seen Zerdusht was not the institutor of a new, but the reformer of the old religion; however it was, Mirkbond informs us, that Gushtasp having assembled the whole forces of his empire, marched with them into Touran, and meeting Argjasp in battle he vanquished him, slew his son in the field, and before the Turkish monarch could assemble a new army, possessed himself of his capital, and gave the plunder of it to his soldiers. After which, returning triumphantly into Persia, he on some jealousies or suspicion, imprisoned his son Isphendiyar in a strong castle, seated on the top of a high mountain, called Gbird Kouch, i. e. the round mount; but he had soon reason to repent the ill usage of so deserving a prince; for Argjasp, irritated by the usage he had met with, raised all the forces of Touran, and making a sudden inroad into the province of Chorasau, he sacked the city of Baleb, where he killed Labrass, the father of Gushtasp in his cloyster, slaughtered Zerdusht with all his priests attending there on the chief Fire-Temple, which he likewise overturned, committing all the outrages, that a mind stung with the remembrance of what the Persian king had done in his own country could suggest. Elate with this conquest, he advanced so briskly into the dominions of Iran, that Gushtasp did not think fit to meet him in battle, but chose rather to consider how an army might be drawn together able to fight that of Argjasp on his return. His counsellors advised him to set his son Isphendiyar at liberty, and to intrust him with the management of the war. Necessity compelled him to take their advice, and he accordingly sent his brother Gjamasp to Isphendiyar, not only to release him, but also to assure him that his father would resign to him the throne, in case he proved victorious. As soon as Isphendiyar arrived in the army, the Persians took new courage, and numbers resorted to his standard, though they had declined following his father. The young prince failed not to make use of these advantages, and coming suddenly on Argjasp, he defeated entirely all his numerous army, obliging him to retire out of Persia, to make all the haste he could into his own dominions. After this glorious victory, Gushtasp received his son with all imaginable marks of kindness and esteem; however he declined putting him in possession of the crown, and in order to amuse him, he observed that it would be unbecoming so brave a prince

(Q) The death of Zerdusht was violent indeed, but we cannot call it unhappy, since his religion did not perish with him, which certainly it would have done, if he had been as bungling an impostor as some would make him. A Persian historian tells us, that Argjasp overturned the Fire-Temple erected by Zerdusht in Baleb, and slew seventy priests, putting out the sacred fire, with the blood of the magi (31); whether this must be understood literally or figuratively, it would be difficult to tell, if another historian had not related it more at large. "Notice," says this writer, being given to the king of Touran of certain merchants, that there were no soldiers left in Baleb, all of them having repaired to the army of Gushtasp, and that his father Labrass was left alone in that city, with such as attended on the Pyre, and mighty priests; Argjasp on this information drew together an army of fifteen thousand men, sending his son Kebram before him, and following with an expedition himself. It is said that when Argjasp entered Iran, Labrass receiving advice thereof, came out of his retreat, and putting himself at the head of a small troop, with whom he killed many of the enemy, but in the end Labrass, with the eighty priests before mentioned, were slain, and the holy fire extinguished with their blood; with these priests also, fell Zerdusht the prophet, who then resided at Baleb (32). Hence it came to pass, that Suidas affirms of the Assyrian Zoroaster, that he desired to die by fire from heaven, and advised his countrymen to preserve his ashes, assuring them that while they were kept, their kingdom should never fail (33). All which the Alexandrian chronicle refers to the Persian Zoroaster, or our Zerdusht (34). Of these fables we have said enough, perhaps too much, already.

to put his father's crown upon his head, while his sisters, who were taken prisoners at a the sack of Baleb, remained still in captivity. Ispbendiyar, piqued at this pretence of his father, which shewed that he did not think the prince had thoroughly humbled his enemies, made that noble youth immediately determine to undertake a new expedition, that his father might have no excuse left for the non-performance of his promise. With this view he selected out of his army 12,000 foot, and as many horse, with whom he advanced towards the frontiers of Touran, accompanied by his brother Basbuten, who was elder than himself. Having received intelligence that Argjasp was retired to one of the strongest places of his dominions, to which there were three different roads, the one plain and easy, fit for the caravans, but so round about, b that it required no less than six months time to reach the place; the second pretty difficult, but so direct, that by it a man might reach the court of Touran in a month; the third which was hardly passable, lay through woods and morasses, and afterwards over high mountains covered with snow. Ispbendiyar having directed his brother to advance as expeditiously as he could through the second of these roads, he with some resolute friends threw himself into the third. They were all habited like merchants, and carried with them jewels and other curiosities of great value. The instructions he gave his brother were these, that when he drew near the residence of Argjasp, he should post his army with all the silence imaginable in the neighbourhood of certain meadows which lay near the city, and that as soon as he should c perceive a great number of fires lighted in that meadow, he should order his horse to advance, and execute the orders which should then be given them. Ispbendiyar and his retinue making the best of their way, reached in seven days the court of Touran. The prince being introduced to Argjasp as a merchant, who fled from the severity of Ispbendiyar, and was desirous of selling his goods in the dominions of Touran; the king received him and his companions with all imaginable courtesy, and accepted very kindly the magnificent present which the prince thought fit to make him. This lucky beginning was followed by a train of success answerable to Ispbendiyar's wishes, for in a short time he wrought himself into the highest degree of confidence with the king and his principal courtiers. When therefore he was d apprized that his brother with his forces was arrived at the place appointed, he invited the king and court to a grand collation, in the meadows adjoining to the town. Thither they came in the evening, and great fires being lighted for dressing the provisions, these served as signals to Basbuten, who at the head of his horse suddenly charged the Turks, and made themselves masters of the city. Ispbendiyar, and those who were about him, dispatched without delay the most considerable of the nobility, the prince killing with his own hand Argjasp, king of Touran. Then putting his sisters, whom he had released out of captivity, into the hands of his and their brother Basbuten, he advised him to retire, with part of his forces, into Persia, while he with the rest, marched against several Indian princes, in order to force them and their subjects to abandon idolatry, and receive the religion of Zerdust, e in which expedition Ispbendiyar had prodigious success, and returned afterwards into Persia, crowned with laurels. When he arrived at Isfacbr, he expected that his father would without delay perform the promise he had so solemnly made, and so often repeated, of resigning to him his dominions; but the politick Gushtasp intended nothing less. He received his son as before with all the tokens of amity and tenderness; but instead of putting the crown upon his head, he entertained him with a studied discourse on his own great abilities, and the laudable obedience he had hitherto paid to all his commands. After this the crafty old prince complained that there was still one enemy left to be subdued, even in the heart of his dominions, viz. Rustan, who having fortified himself in the provinces committed to his charge, f absolutely refused to obey the king's commands, or receive the religion of Zerdust. Gushtasp insinuated that it was necessary for Ispbendiyar to reduce this nobleman before he assumed the diadem, since otherwise he would receive from his father but half a kingdom. Piqued at this behaviour, the generous Ispbendiyar set out for Sigjistan, carrying with him his son Babaman; on their arrival there Rustan met him, and conferred with him at first with great civility and respect; but when the prince insisted on his yielding obedience to his father's commands, and professing immediately the faith of Zerdust, Rustan grew angry, and from hard words, they quickly came to blows. As they were both men of great strength and agility of body, as well as of high spirit, and unconquerable valour, the combat was long and doubtful;

- a ful; at last it inclined to Ispendiyar, but Rustan collecting all his force into one blow, gave the prince so deep a wound, that he died upon the spot, having only time to recommend his son to Rustan, and to desire his brother Babuten to take care of his body. Both his requests were exactly complied with; Babuten carried back his body into Persia, where it received the highest funeral honours, and Rustan carefully sent home his son. Gushtasp was inconsolable for the death of so deserving a prince. His grief however was forced to give way to the necessity of the state, for the new king of Touran no sooner heard what had happened in Persia, than raising a great army he invaded that kingdom, and wasted it without mercy with fire and sword. Gushtasp having collected as great an army as the time would permit, marched
- b with all possible diligence to oppose him; and after having encountered and entirely routed his forces, constrained him to retire into his own dominions. The publick peace being now restored, Gushtasp, to shew the respect he had for his son's memory, resigned the crown to Babaman, the son of Ispendiyar, and according to the example set him by his father, retired from the world to a magnificent pleasure-house he had erected, not far from Schiras, a palace of such superb architecture, that in after-times, as Mirkond tells us, it was attributed to Solomon, the son of David, to express its excellence^a. In all probability it stood in the neighbourhood of that mountain, which lying behind the famous palace of Persopolis, is held to be the sepulchre of the ancient Persian kings. We have seen from various instances,
- c that it was a common thing among the Persian monarchs to quit their thrones, when they found their health and spirits decay, and to spend the last years of their life in contemplation. If we admit that Gushtasp was the Hystaspes of the Greeks, then we may apply what Ammianus Marcellinus says of the latter to this retreat. "Hystaspes, " says this historian, was a most wise person, who boldly penetrating into the inner " parts of upper India, came to a woody desert, whose calm silence was possessed " by those high wits the Brachmans; from these he learned the true system of the " heavenly bodies, and their motions, and the pure rites of true religion, with which " knowledge he returned into Persia, and taught it to the magi, amongst whom " it has by tradition been preserved even to this time^b." But perhaps, admitting
- d Gushtasp and Hystaspes to be one and the same person, we ought to refer this expedition to his junior years, when he fled from his father into Touran, from whence his journey into India was not difficult. There are some Persian writers however, who give a very different account of this matter, of which the reader will have a clearer apprehension, if he recollects what from an ancient Persian historian we cited, as to Zerdusht's promising king Gushtasp to fulfil his extraordinary requests. These historians say, that not Gushtasp, but his son Babuten, addicted himself to divine meditations; and that this Babuten, in conformity to the prophet's promise, was transported to the mountain Dunbavand or Damavand, with thirty of his guards, where they yet live in the most quiet and happy manner, the approach of all living creatures to their sacred retreat being prevented by thick steams of sal-armoniac, issuing from all sides of the mountain^c. Our famous traveller, Sir Thomas Herbert, ascended this mountain, and passed directly over it without meeting any such steams; he acknowledges however that there are vast quantities of sulphur thereon, and that in the night some luminous vapours are seen thereabouts, which he thinks proceed from the sulphur^d; but the learned Dr. Hyde is for the old opinion, and is for attributing them rather to sal-armoniac, but the doctor confesses not only that the history of Babuten is fabulous, but that some stories of the same sort related of Gushtasp are likewise unworthy of belief^e. We may with tolerable certainty affirm, that the reign of Gushtasp was the reign of learning in Persia. In his time flourished a
- f celebrated astrologer, whose name was Gjamasp, surnamed, according to the oriental custom, Al Hakim, i. e. the wise or the sage. That such a person there was, and that he flourished about this time, is pretty clear, but who he was is very far from being certain; some have made him the son of Daniel the prophet^f; others the counsellor of king Gushtasp; but the greater number, and those too of the most credible writers say, that he was the brother of that prince, and not only so, but his confident and chief minister^g. The science for which he was particularly famous was astrology, and from his skill therein he is said to have predicted the coming of the Messiah. Some treatises under his name are yet current in the east, of which the reader will meet with some account at the bottom of the page (R).

Babaman,

(R) Dr. Hyde, speaking of the philosopher mentioned in our text, cites a passage from a very ancient author, having before told us, that this author asserted there had been among the Persians ten doctors of such consummate wisdom, as the whole world could not boast the like; then he gives the author's words, to the sense following: "Of these the sixth was Gjamasf, an astrologer, who was counsellor to Hyfiassp. He is the author of a book, entitled, Judicia Gjamasfis, in which is contained his judgment on the planetary conjunctions. And therein he gave notice that Jesus should appear, that Mohammed should be born, that the Magian religion should be abolished, &c. nor did any astrologer ever come up to him (35). Of this book there is an Arabian version, the title of which runs thus: The book of the philosopher Gjamasf, containing judgments on the grand conjunctions of the planets, and on the events produced by them. This version was made by Lali, the title he gave it in Arabick was Al Kiranat, and he published it A. D. 1280. In the preface of his version it is said, that after the times of Zoroaster or Zerdusht, reigned Gustasp the son of Lohrasp, a very powerful prince, who possessed not only Iran, but Touran and Habashia, i. e. Ethiopia; that in his reign flourished in the city of Balch on the borders of Chorassan, a most excellent philosopher, whose name was Gjamasf, author of this book, wherein is contained an account of all the great conjunctions of the planets which had happened before the time of this astrologer, and which were to happen in succeeding ages; and wherein the appearances of new religions, and the rise of new monarchies, were exactly set down. This author, throughout his whole piece, styles Zerdusht or Zoroaster our Prophet, (36). That astrology, by which we mean foretelling future events, or pretending to foretell them by contemplating the heavenly bodies, was a Science, if we may be allowed so to call it, very early in vogue among the Persians, might be easily proved, if this were a proper place. To lay the truth, the very terms in use among astrologers are irrefragable proofs of it, for they are most of them either Arabic or Persian; and for this reason, Chaldea the mistress of our western astrology was in ancient times always in the possession either of the one or the other of these nations. The notion of predicting the rise and progress of religions from the grand conjunctions of the planets, has been likewise propagated in our western parts; Cardan was a bold assertor of this doctrine, and if he did not intend it himself, we are pretty certain that his scholar Vaninus actually thought of subverting the belief of the gospel dispensation, by pretending that all religions owed their force and predominancy to the influence of the stars (37). The modern Persians are still great votaries to this sort of knowledge, but they distinguish between astronomy and astrology, they stile the former Elm-nejūm, i. e. the science of the stars, and the latter Esf-Krag, i. e. the revelation of the stars; they have however but one word to express astronomer and astrologer, viz. Manegjim, which is exactly equivalent to the Greek word Astrologos. Of all the provinces of Persia, Chorassan is the most famous for producing great men in that art, and in Chorassan there is a little town called Genabed, and in that town a certain family, which for 6 or 700 years past has produced the most famous astrologers in Persia; and the king's astrologer is always either a native of Genabed, or one brought up there. Sir Jahn Chardin affirms, that the appointments in his time for these sages amounted to six millions of French livres per Ann. which shews how highly these sort of people are yet esteemed in that country. As to the notions they have of the transcendent skill of the ancient professors of that art, the author just now mentioned gives us a singular instance in the history of Alkendi, a Jew, who was professor of judicial astrology at Bagdad in the caliphate of Almamun. Against this Jewish astrologer, all the Mohammedans had a very great spleen; and more hardy than the rest, resolved to attack his reputation, and to endeavour to dispossess him of the caliph's esteem; to this end he repaired to Bagdad, and finding Alkendi in the caliph's presence, he asked him why he took upon himself to know more in astrology than other people? Because I know, replied Alkendi, what you know not, and you know not what I know. This provoked the Mohammedan doctor so much, that he would needs make a trial of his boasted knowledge in the sight of the caliph. In order to this each drew a circle about himself, and sat down thereip, with his books and instruments. The Mohammedan doctor at last took a piece of paper and a pen, and after seeming to write a good deal, folded it up, and gave it the caliph, desiring Alkendi to give a proof of his skill, by telling what was written in his paper; to which the other, after a little time, answer'd, You have wrote but two words in your paper, one is the name of a plant, the other of an animal. The caliph opening the paper, found this to be true. And this adventure spread the fame of Alkendi throughout all the east. It happened there was then resident in the college of Balch, a young student of bright parts, who had been scholar to the Mohammedan sage, over whom Alkendi had triumphed. He was so much piqued at the dishonour done his master, that as soon as he heard this story he brought himself a poignard, and took a journey of twelve hundred English miles from Balch to Bagdad on purpose to murder Alkendi. When he arrived at this last mentioned city, he enquired the time when Alkendi taught in the public schools, which when he had learned, he went thither with his poignard under his gown, as if he had been a student come to hear him. Alkendi was in the midst of his lecture when he entered the room, but he immediately made a full stop; and turning his eyes to this stranger, address'd him thus: I know who you are, and to what purpose you come. Your name is Albumazar (the true orthography is Abu Ma, Sbar) and you will become one of the greatest astrologers of your time; but then you must lay aside the bloody design which brought you hither, and you must throw into the midst of the school that poignard which you carried on purpose to kill me. Albumazar, struck at this speech, first threw down his poignard, and then himself at the feet of Alkendi; thenceforward he applied himself strictly to the study of astrology, and became, as that sage had predicted, wonderfully famous, being known to the learned world, by the name of Albumazar of Balch (38). The reader may perhaps think this a long and unnecessary digression; but we had our reasons for inserting it. We were speaking of Gjamasf's predicting the coming of Christ. A very learned countryman of our own has reported the same thing from Albumazar, his words are these: "In the sphere of Persia, saith Aben Ezra, there riseth upon the face of the sign Virgo, a beautiful maiden, she holding two ears of corn

b mighty empire he had acquired. Before we enter upon the reign of this prince, it is necessary that we should settle his name. Mirkbond calls him as we do Babaman, and says that he had two surnames, the one Dirazdest, i. e. long hand, because his right hand was longer than his left, and the other Ardshir on this account; when his mother was big with this son, there came a great astrologer to the court of Gushtasp his grandfather, and addressing himself to Ispendiyar, presented him a small basket, which he told him was for the use of the son that should be born to him; upon opening it, there was found a vessel full of milk, and a little flour, the person who brought it alledging by way of excuse, that his circumstances did not allow him to bring c any thing better. Ispendiyar and his spouse were so much satisfied with the present, that they took from thence the name of their son, Ard signifying Flour, and Shir Milk, in their ancient language: hence it came to pass, that this prince was better known by his surname than by his proper name, being generally called in the oriental histories Ardshir Dirazdest, and by the Greeks Artaxerxes Longimanus. He is represented by Mirkbond as one of the wisest and best princes that ever swayed a scepter; he was so solicitous for the impartial distribution of justice to all his subjects, that he sent some favourites of his own privately into the courts of all his governors, that they might bring him exact informations of their behaviour; and when the time of their governments was expired, he sent for them into his prec fence, and either rewarded and commended their virtues, or else punished what they had done amiss, according to the nature of the offence. In a year after his accesion to the throne he summoned the states of his kingdom, whom he addressed in terms full of tenderness and love; he told them that he had assumed the regal dignity not to gratify his own ambition, but to do good to them; he therefore intreated them if they knew any wrong steps he had taken, or any vices that he had, which were detrimental to the publick, that they would freely censure and reprove them; nay, if they held him utterly unworthy of the empire he exhorted them to depose him, for he said that kings ought to be publick blessings, and that such as were not so ought not to wear the title. The states, after highly commending the king's d zeal, and receiving from him whatever they desired, separated, and going into their respective provinces, carried with them the highest sentiments of duty and respect for so deserving a prince. Ardshir or Babaman took care to repair all the cities, fire-temples, and publick edifices, which during the wars in Iran had either been beaten down, or through the injuries of time had fallen to decay. This being done, and his empire every where in a flourishing condition, he thought it a proper time to revenge the death of his father, and to reunite the provinces of Sigji- stan and Kabul to his estates; and to this end he raised a considerable army, and marched into the territories of Rustan, whither he was no sooner come than he was informed that this great warrior was dead, but that his son Feramorz had taken pose session of his government, and was marching to oppose him with a great army.
 The king of Persia being desirous that the war should have a speedy determination, did not decline a battle, in which he had all the success he could desire, the enemy being entirely defeated, and Feramorz killed upon the spot. He took likewise Zal- zer the father of Rustan, prisoner, and returned triumphantly into Persia, after obliging the inhabitants of those provinces to acknowledge him for their lawful lord. Mirk- bond gives us a very extraordinary account of the death of Rustan, which happened a little before this war commenced, he had according to this historian a brother whose name was Chajal, whom he sent to collect his revenues in Kabul, where it so happened, that Chajal fell desperately in love with the governor's daughter, who was a woman f of most accomplished beauty, and of the rarest qualifications. The governor observing how much the young man was smitten, he gave him all the interruption possible in

"corn in her hand, and a child in her arm, she "feedeth him, and giveth him suck, &c. This "maiden, saith Albumazar, we call Adramedusa, the "pure virgin. She bringeth up a child in a place "which is called Abria (the Hebrew land) and the "child's name is called Eisi (Jesus). This was e"nough to make Albertus Magnus believe that our "Saviour Christ was born in Virgo, and therefore "cardinal Allias erecting our Lord's nativity by "his description, casteth this sign into the horo"scope. But that was not the meaning of Albu-

"mazar. His meaning was (saith friar Bacon)
 "Quod beata Virgo nata fuit, quando sol fuit in "Virgine, & ita habetur signatum in Calendario, &
 "quod nutriet filium suum in terra Hebræorum.
 "That the said virgin was born, the sun being in "that sign, as also we have it set down in the calen- "dar, and that she was to bring up her son in the "Hebrew land (39)." The reader is to observe, that Albumazar wrote expressly from the ancient Persic astrologers, it may be from the very works of Gjamasf, which induced this note.

his armour until he promised to do for him whatever he desired, provided he might have his daughter. Cbajal having promised this, the governor proposed to him the putting his brother into his hands, that he might secure to himself the absolute possession of his own territories, by putting him to death; to which Cbajal, for the sake of his mistress, assented. On his return home, discoursing with his brother, he informed him that the governor of Kabul, whom he trusted so much, was indeed a very tyrant, and grievously oppressed the people under his jurisdiction. Rustan, highly inflamed at this, threatened to put that governor to death, and to extirpate his family, to which end he assembled his forces; but his brother laying hold of the predominant quality of vanity, which was always prevalent in Rustan's temper, persuaded him that his presence alone was sufficient to fright the governor of Kabul into submission, whereupon he set out, attended only by a friend, and this treacherous brother. As soon as they arrived in the neighbourhood of Kabul, the governor with a very few of his attendants came and made his submission, and having most humbly besought Rustan's pardon, which Rustan having given him, the governor intreated him to rest that night at his house, which was but a small distance from them. When they came near its gates, Cbajal rode on his brother's right, and the governor on his left, when on a sudden the ground gave way, and Rustan and his horse fell into a deep pit, which had been prepared for him, and so artfully covered with earth and leaves, that he did not perceive it. Rustan being apprized of their treachery, intreated one of the governor's attendants to give him a bow and arrows, that he might not be devoured alive by wild beasts. The man touched with his misfortunes, put them immediately into his hands; whereupon Rustan drawing the bow with all his strength, let fly two arrows with such dexterity that he struck the treacherous governor, and his perfidious brother, each to his heart, dying a little after himself of the wounds he received on his fall. Such, if we yield an implicit belief to the Persian historians, was the end of this mighty warrior, the glory and support of his country, and of its kings; but we shall shew in the note below that this story of the life and adventures of Rustan, must not be understood exactly as they have related it (S). After the reduction of the provinces formerly

(S) The title of this section is the history of Persia, according to the oriental writers. It is therefore our duty to report whatever we find in authentic historians; but it does not follow that we must either believe ourselves or obtrude on our readers all things contained in them for matters of fact. We are as sensible as the most inveterate critics can be, that there is much of fable perhaps in the best Persian historians, and it is not impossible that we may sometimes mistake their meaning. For example, we know that Aphrasiab, king of Touvan, must have lived several hundred years, if what we have set down in our history be true, or else for a long series of years the princes of that country were stiled Aphrasiab, as the kings of Egypt were called Pharaohs, and the kings of the Philistines were intitled Abimelech. But then the same difficulty recurs as to Rustan. His father Zalzar lived to be carried away prisoner by Bahaman, of whose reign we are now speaking; he must then have been near seven hundred years old, and Rustan, who was lately dead, must have been greatly upwards of six hundred: these are incredible things, and therefore we must suppose that notwithstanding the Persian historians speak all as of one man, there was a succession of heroes in that family, who were hereditary governors of the province of Sigistan, and called from their famous ancestor Rustan. Something of this sort we meet with in scripture, where not only two kings of Gerar are called Abimelech, but both the captains of their hosts are stiled Phicol (40). What renders our conjecture still the more probable is, that the provinces governed by this family took their name, which is more likely to have happened after a succession of governors, than in the time of one man. We mention this merely to prevent a suspicion that we swallow without consideration all that oriental writers have delivered. When we shall have closed our history of the Persian kings, natives of that country, we shall as we have promised give a large account of the chronology of these times, and make it as intelligible as we can. In the mean time, let us add a few circumstances which we have not had occasion to insert in the text, as to the family of which we were just now speaking. The author of the Gulistān tells us, that Zalzar gave his son Rustan this caution, Never despise an enemy, however impotent he may seem at present; for a stream which will scarce bear a straw at its source, grows in its course strong enough to carry away a camel and its burden (41). We have frequently taken notice of the mighty encomiums bestowed by the oriental romance writers on our hero Rustan. Of all his exploits, none however furnishes them with so much room to expatiate on as his two days combat with Ispendiyar. These stories were so pleasant in themselves, so agreeably embellished by those who took them for their theme, that they gave no small interruption to Mohammed in his settling his new religion. It seems there was one Nesser who had been in Persia about his concerns as a merchant, and there picked up the relation of Rustan's combats with Ispendiyar; he vehemently opposed Mohammed, and laughed at his pretended mission; and the better to carry his point, he diverted the people with these stories, which had such an effect, that when Mohammed brought them a new chapter of the Koran, they would frequently cry out, This is an odd story; there is no great matter in this; it is not half so pleasant as the stories of Nesser: which provoked the pretended prophet very much, and put him upon cursing this Nesser violently as an enemy to God, and the true religion.

a merly held by the hero we have just now mentioned, Babaman or Ardshir extended his empire on all sides; some historians say that Kiresh, i. e. Cyrus, was his governor in Babylon; but this is a palpable mistake grounded on a real fact, viz. the great kindness which this prince expressed for the Jews; some have reported that his mother was of that nation; however it was, we may be assured that he had a very great regard for the chosen people, and did them great kindnesses. This prince had a son, whose name was Sassan, a man much addicted to learning, and especially to astrology, whence it came to pass, that either through his own modesty he pretended not to the empire, or was precluded therefrom by his father on account of his studious life, which that active prince thought incompatible with the duties of b a sovereign: however it was, historians are agreed that he did not succeed, nor did pretend to the succession on the demise of his father, but led contentedly a private life, though his descendants afterwards recovered the kingdom, as will be shewn in the next period of our Persian history from oriental historians. After a long and glorious reign, wherein he so far extended his dominions, that some will have his surname of Dirazdest derived from thence; Babaman, or Ardshir, died and left his empire to his wife Homai, whom some writers also affirm to have been his daughter, and who at the time of his decease was big with child. The favourite saying of this prince was, That the gate of a king ought never to be shut.*

Homai or Khamani, about five months after her accession to the throne, brought
 c forth a son of wonderful beauty. According to the custom of those times, the astrologers were consulted as to the fortune of this young prince. They, it seems, were unanimously of opinion, that his fate would by no means correspond with his face, but on the contrary he would bring great misfortunes on his country as well as himself, for which reason they advised that he should be immediately destroyed. The tenderness of a mother would not permit Homai to follow their counsels, and yet her love for her country extended so far, that she determined at any rate to prevent his bringing on it those mischiefs the astrologers had threatened. With this view she caused a little wooden ark or chest to be made, and having put the child in it, covered him with precious stones, and then suffered the vessel to sail down the Gibon
 d or Oxus. The floating cradle came at last within the view of a poor man washing linen, who was by trade a dyer. He, struck with the novelty of beholding a chest on the water, took pains to draw it on shore, and was mightily surprized on finding therein a child with things of such value, not doubting but it was the descendant of some great family. He carried it with the precious stones which were in the cradle with it to his wife, who concurring with him in opinion, that it was the son of some person of distinction, bred it up with as much tenderness and care as if it had been her own; the dyer giving him the name of Darab, from the vehicle in which, and the element wherein he was found, Dar signifying a wooden vessel, and Ab water. When this child was grown up to such an age as required its learning e some trade, the dyer would willingly have taught him his own; but the boy shewed a visible reluctance thereto, and appeared to have a strong genius for war. The good old man who had brought him up, far from checking his inclinations, strained his abilities to the utmost to furnish the young Darab with an equipage necessary to his serving in the army, then raised for the reduction of Roumestan, into which the young hero readily went. This war was of no very long continuance, but Darab religion (42). It is to these stories of Nessar's, and to the behaviour of the people thereupon, that Mohammed alludes in the following passage of his Coran: "There is with God great reward for the righteous. O ye that believe, if ye fear God, he shall remove your enemies far from you, and pardon your sins, his goodness is infinite. The wicked have conspired against thee to punish and slay thee, or drive thee from Mecca; but God hath rendered their conspiracy ineffectual, he knoweth all the designs of conspirators. When his miracles were related to them, and his commandments taught them, they said we have heard them; we had said the like things, had we so inclined; it is but a song and a fable of old men: Remember thou how they said, My God, if what Mahomet declareth be true, cause a shower of flint stones to fall upon us, and rigorously chastise us; he shall not chastise them when thou art with them, neither when they beg pardon of him: who is he that is able to hinder God to punish them? They are not in his grace when they hinder true believers to enter the temple of Mecca, he protecteth only such as have his fear before their eyes, but most of them understand it not. Their prayers are very light, they go hand in hand in the temple, but shall one day feel the punishment of God because of their iniquity (43)."

performed therein such extraordinary feats of arms, that they rung through the a whole army; wherein, though the flower of the Persian nobility had served, yet none had attained to so high a reputation as this unknown youth. At their return therefore from the war, the commander in chief reported such favourable things of him to the queen his mistress, that she would needs see him. Darab upon this was introduced into the royal presence, where after some discourse about the war, and the great things he had done therein, the queen demanded of him what was his name, and who were his father and mother. He answered as to the first, that his name was Darab, but that as to his parents he was able to say nothing; that the persons he lived with, and whom he acknowledged for his father and mother were a dyer, and his wife; that the man had taken him out of the water, where he floated b in a little chest, and that from thence they had given him the name of Darab. The queen having considered and inquired into this story, owned him for her son, and declared him her successor with the general approbation of her people f. This princess, all the oriental writers who speak of her agree, had a prodigious capacity, and was wonderfully careful in ordering all things for the good of her people. Above all things she studied the adorning of the glorious capital of her dominions Istacbr; to this end she erected a noble palace therein, the ruins of which are glorious even to this day, and are the same which the Persians call Chilminar, and in the palace of Persepolis. We will not take upon us to affirm that these authors are in the right, but we may safely say, that in all human probability, this palace was built about c this time; and the reason which the eastern writers assign for queen Homai's chusing to erect it here is neither absurd nor incredible; they alledge that Gushtasp having erected several Pyræa or Fire-temples, and cut for himself and for his successors superb tombs in the rock, which lies behind this palace, Homai was tempted to build a royal house in their neighbourhood, that all these marks of Persian magnificence might appear together and set off each other; to her also are attributed several other monuments of a royal mind, and a deep desire of fame, such as a multitude of pyramids smaller, but not unlike those in Egypt, scattered throughout all Persia, and every-where overturned by the soldiers of Alexander the Great. This princess is likewise said to have built a city called Semrim or Semirab, whence a famous Persian author hath d been led to think that the Homai of the Persians was the Semiramis of the Greeks; but in this perhaps there is more of criticism than solidity *. The author of another Persian chronicle is so far from thinking her either the Semiramis of the Greeks, or so famous a queen of Persia as other authors make her, that he has totally omitted her name in his history of the Persian monarchs of the dynasty of the Casanides b. Mirkbond however assures us, that she reigned thirty-two years, and then resigned the crown to her son Darab i (T).

(T) The oriental histories mention various queens who flourished and did great things in their respective countries, and yet are little known to us in the west. If we consider what the Persian historians say of her building the glorious palace at Istacbr, we shall find it not so improbable as at first sight it may seem. We have shewn before from authorities of all kinds, that in the reign of Gushtasp arts and sciences flourished exceedingly in Persia; his grandson and successor Bahaman must have carried them still higher, for he was very successful in all his wars, and after he had finished them, applied himself to the adorning his country with stately buildings, as Mirkbond expressly informs us. That his widow therefore, who was also a potent and successful princess, should endeavour to establish her fame by erecting so magnificent a pile, has nothing in it unlikely or incredible; she might adorn this new-raised palace of hers with the spoils brought by her immediate predecessors out of Egypt and Syria; and as to the grand procession which yet appears on the walls of that palace, if one might be indulged to conjecture, why may it not be supposed to represent the homage paid to Bahaman or Ardshir by the states of Persia, when he assembled them in the first year of his reign, and submitted his conduct, and even his qualifications for the royal dignity to their censure. That he did this, Mirkbond affirms, and that they were profuse in their expressions of gratitude and loyalty on that occasion. What more noble transaction could this princess chuse, than this recognition of her husband's right to his crown, from virtue as well as descent, by a generous and wise people. But let this procession be what it will, it may as well be placed here as any where else; and till the learned by dint of their enquiries and criticisms can furnish us with a better account, we may as well accept of this from the Persian historians. As to the modern Persians, they, as we have here before observed, speak very tenderly on this head; and if we bar their tales of king Solomon and the fairies, have nothing to offer against queen Homai's being the founder of that stupendous fabrick, the ruins of which are now called Chilminar, i. e. forty pillars; though, if we may trust Dr. Hyde, its old Persic name was Haxar-jum, i. e. a thousand columns (44).

- ^a Darab, as we have already heard, was educated by a poor dyer, or fuller, who took of him all the care that could be expected from a man in his low condition. It is reported by a Persian writer, that the young Darab being one day at the water-side with his supposed father, addressed himself thus to the dyer: "I should be very glad if you would tell me the truth as to my birth, for I begin to imagine from the aversion I have to this business, and from my contempt of all manual labour, that I am not really your son, as you have hitherto made me believe." "Who ever," said the dyer, beheld a ruby, and supposed it dropt from a common stone, might conceive that a youth of your shining parts, was what till this time you have passed for, the son of a fuller." "Whatever my parts may be," returned Darab, I should be much pleased to hear, without either allegories or metaphors, who I am to suppose myself, and whether that spirit of ambition which I feel in my breast ought to be checked or cherished. Upon this the honest old man related to him all he knew, which as soon as Darab heard, he demanded the jewels, and having received them went directly to the army, and applying himself to the commander in chief, told him all that his reputed father had related." The general was at that very time about to give battle to the Gruks, he therefore gave no answer to Darab, but advised him to keep his own counsel, and to serve the queen valiantly in the approaching engagement. Which instructions of his he exactly pursued, and behaved with such prudence and vivacity in the battle, that the general gave easy credit to what he had told him, and on his return from the war, presented him to the queen, and gave it as his opinion that he was her son. Which of these stories is true, or which comes nearest the truth, we pretend not to determine. All historians agree that he ascended the throne as the son of Babaman or Ardshir, and that he gave the highest proofs of his royal descent by his wife and gentle administration. His valour had been sufficiently distinguished before he ascended the throne, he suffered it not to rust after he assumed the royal dignity; for at the same time he loved justice, and took care to have it exactly administered throughout all his wide dominions, he was likewise a munificent patron of arts and sciences, easy of address, eloquent in speech, and one of the most humane princes that ever swayed a sceptre. On some account or other he found it necessary to turn his arms on Filikour, that is Philip, king of Macedon; at first by his captains, and at last in person, with such success, that Philip, being driven to extremities, was obliged to accept such terms as Darab thought fit to impose: and they were these; that the king of Macedon should pay yearly the sum of forty-thousand pieces of gold by way of tribute, and should give his daughter, one of the handsomest princesses in Greece, to Darab for a wife; which was accordingly done. The very first night that Darab passed with his new spouse, he found her breath so offensive, that he resolved to send her back to her father, notwithstanding that, as some writers say, she was with child. After the Macedonian war was over, Darab applied himself wholly to the arts of peace, and to the settling such things as were still in disorder, and inventing new methods for giving ease and satisfaction to his subjects. Amongst other wise and glorious acts of this good prince, the settling posts throughout all Persia is particularly recorded, which he executed with such skill, that he had news brought him from every corner of his empire, by couriers setting out regularly twice a day. He was the founder of a pleasant and beautiful city in proper Persia, on which he bestowed his name, calling it Darabgerd, i. e. Mount-Darab, in the middle of which rose a hill in the shape of a tent or pavilion, and without its walls lay a circle of hills, producing salt of various colours, transported from thence into all the provinces of Persia; he likewise erected another city called Kbourch, and after a reign of four years according to Mirkbond^b, of fourteen, says another writer^c, and of twelve, says a third^d, he died universally lamented, and left the crown to his son (V).

(V) It is certainly no bad caution to an historian that in his writings he should forget his country, or rather that he should lay aside that partiality which a man naturally has for his country; the Persian historians, as we have said in our text, represent Darab moralizing in his last moments, and reading a lecture on the vicissitudes of this world with his expiring breath, closing all with passionate intreaties, that Alexander would use his subjects kindly, and take his daughter Rousbeugh to wife. Who can avoid admiring a prince, so truly a prince, even in the sight of death? The Greek writers on the other hand

Darab the second, or the younger, surnamed Darab Kuchek, came very young ^a to the crown, and what was much worse, came to it without any of the qualities of a prince; he was of an ill disposition, haughty, brutal, false and cruel, properties which rendered him in a short time hateful to his people, and obnoxious to his neighbours. The Persians, unused to such treatment, entered into private negotiations with Ascander, the son of Filikous, that is Alexander the Great, the son of Philip, whom many of the Persian writers believe to have been the son of Darab the first by the daughter of Filikous, whom he sent back because of her stinking breath, and persuaded him to enter Persia with an army, promising him to join with him as soon as he arrived with a force sufficient to protect them, and to put ^b him in possession of an empire, of which they held Darab to be unworthy. As a pretence for making war, they advised Ascander to refuse payment of the tribute which his father had agreed to send annually into Persia; and with these negotiations the king of Macedon readily fell in. Darab finding that Ascander did not send his tribute as usual, sent an ambassador to demand it; to whom Ascander answered that those who paid tribute in his country were dead. But others say, that the pieces of gold in which the tribute was payable, being called by a name which signified at once a piece of corn, and an egg, Ascander answered Darab's ambassador in derision, when he demanded a mighty sum of gold for the tribute in arrear, that the bird which had laid those eggs was flown into another world; alluding to his ^c father's death, who had burthened his subjects with this tribute. This answer terribly provoked Darab, who, to shew at once his resentment and contempt of so weak an enemy, sent a second ambassador with a harsh message, accompanied with a present, more expressive of his master's sentiments, than any speech or letter could have been; this present was a little casquet, containing a dibble, or planting stick, a bag full of small stones, and another full of small coin; the first to intimate that he was young and inconsiderate, and that he had better employ himself in his gardens, than in matters of state; the second shewing the power and strength of the Persian nation; and the third their riches; the whole implying that it was a rash, imprudent thing, for such a petty prince as he to oppose so great and powerful ^d a monarch. However this ambassador with his present found Ascander on the point of going into the field, and had therefore no opportunity of carrying back, to his master any answer. The troops of the king of Macedon were not very numerous, but they were all chosen men, such as were valiant in their persons, and at the same time enured to hardships. On his entering Asia he met with little opposition, partly through the hatred which the people had conceived against Darab, and partly from the generosity of Ascander's behaviour, who treated them not as enemies, but subjects. When he arrived in Armenia, he received a letter from Darab, wherein that monarch pretended great concern for his welfare, advised him not to hazard a battle, but rather to consent to a peace while it was yet in his power, hand make Darius moralize too, but then it is in favour of their hero; he was so struck with the virtues of the Macedonian, that he yielded to him his sceptre rather with admiration than disgust. Let us hear what Plutarch puts into the mouth of Darius on this subject, and we shall be constrained to own that the desire of making all facts contribute as far as possible to the glory of one's country, is not peculiar to Persian writers. Plutarch, having long expatiated on the virtues of Alexander, tells us that Darius was a long time of opinion that he owed his successes to fortune; but when he understood the truth, he said, "Well, I do not yet perceive the condition of the Persians so deplorable, since the world can never tax us now with imbecility or effeminacy, whose fate it was to be vanquished by such a person. Therefore my prayers shall be to the gods for his prosperity, and that he may still be victorious in war, to the end that in well doing I may surpass Alexander. For my emulation and ambition leads me in point of honour to shew myself more cordial and friendly than he. If then the father have otherwise determined of me and mine, O Jupiter, preserver

"of the Persians, and you his equal deities, to whom the care of kings belong, hear your suppliant, and suffer none but Alexander to sit upon the throne of Cyrus (45)." One may safely say there is as just ground to suspect this passage of forgery as any of the romantic stories in the Persian authors. Darius worshipped no God but the true God; he was utterly unacquainted with the Jupiter of the Greeks; and it does not appear that even after Alexander conquered Persia, he established the superstitions of the Greeks there. That Darius might recommend his kingdom or his daughter to Alexander, or that he might intreat him to use his subjects well, is credible; but that Darius fell in love with the virtues of an enemy who came unprovoked to lay waste his empire, is a stroke of Greek eloquence which may please us well enough in an oration, but can hardly be digested for history. We must therefore bear with the Persians as well as the Greeks, seek truth in the writings of one as well as the other, receive her kindly as oft as we find her, and not charge one people more than another with concealing or disguising her to serve a turn.

- a adding some menaces at the close. Alexander returned him for answer, that empires were bestowed by God alone, who changed them as he thought proper. After this he continued his march till he entered the province of Aderbaydjan, where he defeated one of Darab's captains, who endeavoured to oppose his passage, and having done this, he advanced into Gbilan : This province, according to Mirkbond, was in old times a flourishing kingdom, called by its inhabitants Endsafet, i. e. the White Indies, in allusion to the beauty of the country, which is far preferable to that of the Indies properly so called ; its situation also being remarkably happy by reason of the Caspian sea on one side, and their easy correspondence with Tartary, Persia and Armenia, lying round them. This country Alexander quickly subdued ; from thence he
- b marched into the heart of Persia, where, in the province properly called by that name, Darab met him with a prodigious army ; after an obstinate and bloody battle, Alexander carried the victory, and Darab was forced to fly, leaving his camp, his wives, and his daughters in the power of the victor. In their flight the Persians met with a river, wherein many entering heedlessly, were drowned ; at last a ford was discovered, through which Darab, attended by the principal persons in his army, passed ; but the soldiers who followed him crowding one another, the weakest were thrown down, and perished miserably in the water. As soon as the king was come to a place of safety, he sent once more ambassadors to Alexander, to treat of peace, offering in case he would send back his wives and daughters, and retire with his
- c troops back to Greece, he would renounce all right of tribute, and make some other concessions. At the same time that he entered into this treaty, he dispatched ambassadors also to the kings of India and Masberek, intreating them to yield him assistance, that they might be able to drive the Greek out of his dominions ; which they furnished with such readiness, that in a short time he had an army on foot more numerous and potent than that which he had lost. As for Alexander, he treated the offers made him by Darab with derision, making all the haste he could to engage the Persian forces a second time, notwithstanding he was well informed of the great reinforcements they had received. It was not long before he brought him to a battle, in which the Greek gained another complete victory, Darab flying with a few of his
- d captains to a strong fortress, where, before he could well recollect himself, some of his own subjects most treacherously put him to death ; that is, they gave him several mortal wounds with their poignards, and then fled to the camp of Alexander, leaving their unhappy prince weltering in his blood. Alexander no sooner received the news, than he went with the utmost expedition to Darab's fortress, and found him in his last agonies ; which sight so touched the Greek, that melting into tears, and holding up his hands to heaven, he protested he had neither knowledge of, nor pleasure in so execrable a deed. The dying king expressed great satisfaction thereat, assured him that he thoroughly believed all he said, besought him to chastise the traitors, by whose hands he died, and intreated him to espouse his daughter Roushengh, and not to put the several provinces of the empire under the direction of strangers, with
- e all which Alexander promised to comply. Then Darab, after making many pitiful complaints of the misery of human life, and the inconstancy of fortune, all of which are repeated by Mirkbond, yielded up the ghost after a reign of fourteen years. Thus far we have followed for the most part the author last mentioned. An author mentioned at the bottom of the page informs us, that in compliance with Darab's last request, Alexander or Alexander appointed for the governors of Persia natives of that country ; but that afterwards he had it in his head to have changed this disposition and to have appointed Greeks in their room ; but that Aristotle, whom this writer calls his visier, advised him to leave things as they stood, and not to remove
- f any of the Persian lords, to whom he had given the direction of provinces *. It is very certain that this circumstance is not, strictly speaking, agreeable to truth : Aristotle neither accompanied Alexander in his expedition, nor took upon him to dictate to him in matters of state, except in general terms ; otherwise it is not at all improbable, that he would have given him the advice mentioned by this author, since it would evidently have contributed to the keeping the people quiet and easy ; and would also have been very conformable to the temper of Alexander, who, when in a right frame of mind, always professed a generous regard for mankind in general, and a desire of behaving as an universal parent towards those over whom as a universal monarch he sought the power of ruling; at least, this is the idea Plutarch would give us of him, and of Aristotle, who, though a philosopher, was a great politician, and had perhaps better conceptions of this conqueror's intentions, than most of the writers who have taken upon them, not only to record, but to criticize his actions (W). The reader might very well expect that we should here put an end to this section, especially since he has already seen the history of Persia, according to the Greek writers, concluded at the death of Darius. But so it is, that in order to pursue the theme laid down in the title of this section, we are bound to carry on our history to the death of Alexander; for as we have shewn before, the oriental writers, in order no doubt to save the credit of the Asiatics, have pretended that the empire of Iran, with its dependencies, which were then very great, came into the hands of Alexander, not so much by conquest, as by right; in this light therefore Alexander was the last monarch of the Dynasty of the Kainites, and his reign consequently ought as much to be taken notice of here, as the reigns of any of his predecessors.

Alexander, son of Philip, king of Macedon, is by the Persian writers stiled Isander Ben Filoukous, which signifies the same thing, only they pretend that it was a kind of surname bestowed on him for the following reason; they will have it that he was the son of Darab the first, by the daughter of Filikous, whom he sent home, because of her stinking breath; but that Philip bringing him up as his own son, and leaving to him the kingdom, he called himself out of gratitude Alexander the son of Philip, though he put in his claim to the kingdom of Persia as heir to Darab his father (X).

(W) That Alexander should promise a dying monarch whatever he demanded, seems perfectly agreeable to his character as drawn by eastern and western authors; he was fierce in battle, but full of pity towards the vanquished. That Aristotle gave him general precepts as to government we may easily believe; and if the authority of Plutarch hath due weight, we shall conceive the expedition of Alexander against the Persians to have been no other than an attempt made by an active philosopher to civilize all mankind. It would be however a difficult matter to swallow this; we shall therefore instead of pressing it farther, produce the passage from the Greek author last mentioned, to which we alluded in the text, and which will sufficiently shew that the Persian writers are not absolutely in the wrong when they ascribe some points of Alexander's conduct to the influence Aristotle had over him, tho' they are grossly mistaken in making him his visier. "If philosophers, says Plutarch, assume to themselves their highest applause for cultivating the most fierce and rugged conditions of man, certainly Alexander is to be acknowledged the chiefest of philosophers, who changed the wild and brutish customs of so many various nations, reducing them to order and government. 'Tis true indeed that so much admired commonwealth of Zeno, first author of the Stoick sect, aims singly at this, that neither in cities, nor in private houses, we should live under laws distinct one from another, but that we should look upon all men in general to be our fellow countrymen and citizens, observing one manner of living, one kind of order like a flock feeding together with equal right in one common pasture. This Zeno wrote, fancying to himself as in a dream a certain scheme of civil order, and the image of a philosophical commonwealth. But Alexander made good his words by his deeds: For as Aristotle sagely advised him, he did not rule the Grecians like a moderate prince, and insult over the barbarians like an absolute tyrant; neither, like one that took particular care of the first as his friends and domestics, but scorning the latter as mere brutes and vegetables, did he fill his empire with fugitive incendiaries and perfidious tumults. But believing himself sent from heaven as the common moderator and arbiter of all nations, and subduing those by force whom he could not associate to himself by fair offers, he laboured thus, that he might bring all regions far and near under the same dominion. And then as in a festival bowl, mixing conversations, manners, customs, wedlocks all together, he ordained, that every one should take the whole habitable world for his country, of which his camp and army should be the chief metropolis and garrison; that his friends and kindred should be the good and virtuous, and that the vicious only should be accounted foreigners. Nor would he that the Greeks should be distinguished from the Barbarians by their long garments, by their targets, by their scimitars or turbans; but that the Grecians should be known by their virtue and courage, and the Barbarians by their vices and their cowardice. However, that their habit, their diet, their marriages, and custom of converse, should be every where the same, engaged and blended together by the ties of blood, and pledges of offspring (46). How glorious a reputation would Alexander have obtained, if his actions had been uniform, and apparently founded on such notions as are attributed to him by the philosopher? His burning of Persepolis is a little inconsistent with the idea given us by Plutarch; but it is very probable that great man meant no more than to shew us what Alexander would have done if he had always acted up to the heroic maxims laid down by his tutor Aristotle. On the whole, it may be justly said, that it was the passions of Alexander only which spoke him a man; in his cooler moments, and when he acted without their impulse, he seemed something more than man; such are the effects of an excellent education, and of such importance it is, that those who are to govern multitudes should be superior in knowledge to the multitude they govern.

(X) The history of Alexander the Great has not only been intermixed with fables by the Persian writers; the eastern authors in general, even those most esteemed, abound with very extraordinary circumstances relating to that conqueror. Joannis Malala, a very celebrated writer, to whom we are indebted for a very curious history of the Constantinopolitan emperors, hath given us some strokes in his account

- b The oriental writers in general bestow another surname upon him, viz. that of Dhaulcarnein, or rather Dulcarnein, which signifies literally with two horns, in allusion to the two ends of the world, the east and the west, both of which the eastern writers of Alexander, which do not very well agree with what the Greek writers have delivered, though he follows them in the main: for example, he makes Roxana the daughter of Darius, in which he joins with the Persian historians, who, as we have seen, alledge, that the emperor of Persia, in his last moments, intreated Alexander to marry his daughter Roushengh; whereas Arrian makes Roxana the daughter nox of Darius, but of Oxyartes; but this is a small matter: we have in the same author a story of some length, which is quite in the oriental taste: "It was the custom, says he, of Alexander the Great, in the expeditions he made after the conquest of Persia, to go in disguise with such ambassadors as he sent to the courts of neighbouring princes, that in this situation he might make such observations as might facilitate his designs. Of this it seems Candace, queen of the inner or higher Ethiopia, had notice, whereupon she made strict enquiry as to the form and presence of this conqueror; the result of this was, that she was told he was low in stature, had large broad teeth, some of which stood out; that of his eyes, one was of a light grey, the other quite black, which marks she carefully remembered. When therefore Alexander appeared with his ambassadors in her presence, she instantly singled him out, addressing herself to him in these words: 'You, O Alexander, have been too wise for all the world, and yet one woman has been too wise for you; to which he replied, I therefore grant you and your subjects my protection, as a reward for your extraordinary capacity; I also accept you for a wife' to which Candace readily yielded. After this marriage Alexander went into Ethiopia, and several other countries (47)." If we were critically to enquire into the origin of such stories, we should perhaps find it no difficult thing to shake off all romantic circumstances, and leave only the naked truth: but the compass of these notes neither admit of such disquisitions, nor indeed does the nature of this work allow them. Our present business is to shew what oriental writers have said of affairs mentioned in the text; and this therefore leads us to recite what is recorded by Abul-Pharagius. This celebrated historian calls Nebuchadnezzar by the name of Bechtanfer as the Persian writers do, and in his short account of the Persian kings, preserves exactly the names recorded by Mirkbond; I mean the latter race of kings, the descendants of Gushtasp, who succeeded after the Greek power ceased to have dominion in Persia; he calls the last king of Persia Darab, the son of Darab; of Alexander he speaks thus: "Alexander, the son of Philip, reigned six years after the death of Darius, having also reigned six years before his death. He subdued many nations, so that his dominions extended even to India, and the frontiers of China. He was called Dhal-Karnain, i. e. two horned, because he seemed to have passed from one horn of the sun to the other, i. e. from east to west. Five-and-thirty kings he slew, and twelve cities he founded; two of these in the province of Chorasán, viz. Hera and Marwas; one in the region Alfegh, viz. Samarchand, and in Egypt Alexandria; when he returned out of India, he went to Babylon, where he died of poison, and his body being put into a chest of gold, it was borne on the shoulders of kings and nobles to the Egyptian Alexandria, where it was interred. It was Alexander who began the wall

"Tajuj, which was composed of stone and iron, the iron being let into the stone to fasten it by the help of fire, each of the stones being twelve cubits in length, and eight broad. This wall when it was finished came down to the place called Baba l'Abwab, in the vallies of the region of Xapbjak, from whence it was carried over and through the mountains, as far as the sea of the Greeks; nor were there wanting many of the Persian kings, who to defend their dominions from the incursions of the Turks, sought to find the foundations of this wall. At last they were found by Yardjerd, the son of Babram Jur, who began to carry on the work, but did not live to see it finished; several succeeding kings prosecuted the same design, but none of them with effect, till God rendered it easy to Chafraz Nushrawan, who built it strongly, uniting it to the mountains, and at last brought it down to the sea, placing iron gates at the end, so that a hundred men were then able to defend what would otherwise require an army of an hundred thousand (48)." Of this wall, as it nearly concerns the history of Persia, it is necessary that we should give some further account. The famous Abu l'Ghazal Balader Khan of Khorwarazm, in his genealogical history of the Tatars, has given us the following account of it: "Those of Kitay have built a great wall to cover their country, in which there are two iron gates for the passage of the merchants, and other travellers. This wall is called Sai in Arabic, which signifies Fortress; in the ancient Turkish language it is called Tark-urga; and in the language of Kitay, Ungu. Alexander the Great caused a like wall to be raised to cover the frontiers of his dominions; but it was composed of all sorts of metals. His design by this wall was to hinder the nation of Jadatz-Madzuib, i. e. of Gog and Magog, from carrying their ravages into the lands under his dominion, where they had done great mischief in times past. 'Tis a general tradition with the Tatars, that those people have the muzzle of a dog; and that this wall being made up of all sorts of metals, they did all in their power to make a passage through it by dint of licking, but they could not succeed. That nevertheless before the day of judgment, they shall come and lick their way through the wall, and that then they shall do a great deal of mischief in the world. Nauzbir Wanadill, sultan of Samachy, caused in like manner a wall of earth to be built round about his kingdom (49)." On this passage the ingenious editor of that curious work has added the following remarks: "The remains of this wall which the Persians pretend their king Narw-shirwan caused to be drawn from the Caspian to the Black-Sea, are at this day to be seen upon the confines of the province of Sbirman and Georgia: it begins at the higher town of Derband, and extends thence north-westward across the mountains of Georgia towards the Black-Sea. These remains are every where three feet thick, but its height is very unequal; for in some parts it is still six and seven feet high, in others only one or two, and in some places it is quite beaten down. It appears at first sight to be built of stone, but when one comes to examine it near, it proves to be only a kind of petrified earth, sand, and shells, which has formed so solid a body, that there is no free-stone better than it: and it is on this account that our author thinks it might be called a wall of earth. The late

writers affirm to have been conquered by two Alexanders, to whom therefore they have given the surname. The first Alexander, if any credit could be given to the authors who have written about him, ought to be preferred far before the latter, since he stretched his conquests to the very extremity of the globe, if we may be allowed the expression, and built a brazen wall in the north, in order to hinder the descendants of Gog and Magog from pouring down like a torrent upon their southern neighbours. It is pretty difficult to discover at what time this mighty hero lived, and as difficult to know when he died. Some writers place him in the days of Abraham, and say that he lived sixteen hundred years; but then they give him for his chief counsellor the prophet Kbedber, who it is said found out the fountain of life, and having drank thereof, rendered himself immortal; which prophet, according to others, was cotemporary with Keykbad, of whom we have spoken so much already. As to the latter part of this story it is easily cleared up; since it is certain that they confound Kbedber, the counsellor of this mighty monarch, with a latter prophet of the same name, or rather surname, who is no other than the prophet Elias, whose translation to heaven in a fiery chariot, is by them changed into a discovery of the fountain of life, and gaining immortality by drinking its waters*. But enough of this elder Dulcarnein, unless we could say more of him with certainty, or even with probability. Our Alexander received the same surname from his being monarch both of the east and west. The eastern writers, and especially the Persian historians, pay him great honours, and tell a multitude of things concerning him, which are not to be met with in the Greek or Latin histories; for example, they tell us, that this monarch being asked why he paid greater honours to his tutor than his father, he answered that it was but just, because his father made him descend from heaven or earth, whereas the instructions of his master, had made him to rise from earth to heaven*. One day he said to a counsellor of his, who had been long about his person, I am not satisfied with your service, for this reason, I know that I am a man, and that as a man I am liable to errors and mistakes, for which you have never reprov'd me; if this happened for want of perceiving them, then you must be ignorant and unworthy of your office: but if you did know them, and yet were silent, it was treason*. It is likewise reported of him, that to make an experiment of a courtier's temper, he removed him from a higher to a lower office, and afterwards took occasion to ask him how the latter agreed with him, and how he brought himself to discharge its functions. Very well, answered the courtier, since it is not any office or dignity that does honour to a man, but the man that does honour to it; since every post requires sense and honesty to execute it well, and he who possesses these, cannot fail to discharge his duty with reputation. Alexander having heard this, commended him highly, restored him to his former employment, and gave him a great reward*. Somebody wondering, in the presence of Alexander, at his acquiring, so young, so large an empire, and adding it was still stranger, he preserv'd it; he thereupon turned about, and said, By two maxims, I have done all this, I have taken care to treat my enemies so well, that they have found it their interest to become my friends; while, on the other hand, my care of my friends has been such, as to raise out of gratitude a double affection for my service. Kboudemir, the famous historian, speaking of Alexander the great, informs us, that a person in a very bad apparel presented him one day a petition, admirably well penned, the king having read it with great pleasure, and admiring greatly both the thoughts and the style, looked next on the person of the man, and then answered him thus: Friend, if you had taken care to appear before me in a habit

" late emperor of Russia, in his Persian expedition, " had the curiosity to go for the remains of this " wall, so far as the situation of the country and " his affairs would permit him; and he could not " but admire the solidity of that composition which " he found every where so exceeding hard, that " there was no breaking off any pieces of it with- " out employing a good deal of strength. He found

" also some leagues within the mountain a skirt of " it which seemed to be intire, and was about fif- " teen foot high. In all probability, this wall had " stood intire to this day if it had nothing to fear " but time; but the hands of men which built it " have also destroyed it; and most of the towns, " boroughs and villages of the country thereabouts " are built with the ruins of this wall (50)".

- a as neat and decent as that in which you have cloathed your thoughts, I should have been much better pleased with you than I am; to which the man readily answered, Your servant has received from nature that capacity of speaking and writing which you are pleased to commend; but it is to you, great monarch, who are so much famed for your bounty and generosity, that he must be indebted for such a garment as may render him worthy of your regard. Alexander was so well pleased with the modesty and justice of this answer, that he ordered a magnificent habit to be brought, and with a considerable sum of money gave it to this wise man in necessity, whose learning till then had left him in rags. In the Nigbiaristan, i. e. a book so called, the word signifying literally a gallery or place to walk in; we are told that a certain
- b flagrant rebel being brought bound hand and foot into the presence of Alexander, that monarch generously restored him to his freedom; which surprising those about him, one of his favourites had the boldness to say, Sir, if I were in your place, I would not have extended mercy to such a man; and I, replied Alexander, who am not in yours, have pardoned him. Then after a short silence, he added, I the more readily pardon my enemies, because there is no comparison between the pleasure one tastes in an act of clemency, and in an act of vengeance. Rhondimer, speaking of the Death of Alexander, assures us, that finding his last moments approach, he wrote to his mother two verses to console her to the purport following; Your son, after having counted some moments of life, is delivered to death, he is gone like a flash of lightning, and has only left behind him matter of discourse. It may be supposed that the intent of these verses was to put his mother in mind that as human life so human glory was a mere nothing, and that therefore she ought not to grieve at his being snatched so soon from an empire so lately acquired, since, if he had lived longer, it would have been of no great consequence to himself, and would have furnished only more matter of speculation to those who amuse themselves with repeating the actions, and sometimes censuring the conduct of others. On what authority these stories are grounded is difficult to say; they are chiefly recorded by moral and political writers, who aim rather at instructing men by paraphrasing on remarkable actions, and wise sayings, than at delivering a dry detail of facts, which
- d without such reflections instruct very little. A Persian author of great genius hath related a remarkable story of the hero we are now speaking of, which is in all probability founded on what the Greeks tell us of his sparing Thebes, because it gave birth to Pindar. The Persian story runs thus: "Alexander having given orders after the reduction of a very strong place, that it would be given up to the mercy of the soldiers, some of his courtiers informed the king that there was in this place a philosopher of great note, who deserved his majesty's notice; the king ordered that he should be immediately sent for. When he appeared, it so happened that he made but a very indifferent figure; upon which Alexander turning to those who had sent for him, said, with a smile of contempt, What
- e "strange figure have you brought me here? Which so piqued the philosopher, that he repeated immediately the following lines, which he made upon the spot:

O! prince of manners void, though great in fame,
 Why should'st thou slight my person, though uncourt?
 Dost thou not know, that man's exterior form
 Is but the scabbard of the enliv'ning mind?
 Why should'st thou judge then of the weapon's edge,
 When yet you've nothing seen except the case?

- He added to this poetical reproof the following words in prose: "One may say f "of a man unendued with virtue, that his body is no better than a prison, since the "soul must find itself so penned up therein, that any other confinement would seem "liberty in comparison thereof. The vicious man is tortured continually, there is "no occasion for a hangman and guards to punish or distress him, the very skin which "covers his body is at the same time the insurmountable wall of a perpetual prison." The same philosopher added, "There is nothing more unreasonable than to envy
 "others those gifts which God and nature have bestowed upon them. The bosom "of the envious man is continually full of anger and spleen against his creator, he "thinks every thing amiss which is given to others, and at the same time covets
 "whatever is not design'd for him. As it is thus the custom of the envious to oppose

" constantly the conduct of him who governs the world with infinite wisdom, so a
 " the mouth that thus murmurs against providence deserves no other answer than to " be filled with earth. One of this disposition exclaims at every thing he sees in " the hands of his neighbour; For what reason should this man have more than I?"
 " At these words he stopped, but Alexander, admiring the boldness as well as prudence
 " of the man, bad him go on, assuring him that he took all that he said in good " part. The philosopher on this proceeded in his harangue: " Wise men, continued
 " he, are liberal of their wealth, and give part of it to their friends while they " are alive, while the covetous are such fools as to fatigue themselves in laying " up riches for their enemies. The railleries thrown out by the great against such " as are in low condition, tarnish the lustre of their high qualities, and take off b
 " that deference which otherwise would be paid them. Whoever wearies himself " with striking those who dare not strike again, will be easily beaten when he " meets one who dares oppose him; and he who puts to the sword without pity,
 " will one day feel without pity the edge of a sword. Alexander at this stopped " him, revoked his resolution, pardoned the citizens whom he had destined to " destruction, and rewarded the philosopher for his timely advice". It may very possibly happen that some rigid critick may object to the inserting this dubious relation in our history; but we hope, though it should be exploded as a fact, it will yet be received as a proper instance of the Persian mode of writing history, and at the same time we remark this, let us be indulged another observation, that the c writings of Xenophon, who was very well acquainted with the ancient Persian learning, correspond nearly with the manner of those authors we have lately cited; for he reasons on all the facts which he delivers, insomuch that his moral and political reflections have in the opinion of many removed him, as well as the Persian writers, from the class of historians into that of romance writers. But as his excellent treatise of the education of Cyrus has within these few years found many warm and learned defenders, so, it may be, the time is near when we shall see apologies written in favour of oriental historians, who, like Herodotus, may have their credit perhaps restored, when the subjects they treat of come to be examined to the bottom (Y).
 The

* FAREZ IN BANARISTAN.

(Y) It is a common mistake which reigns in Europe, that the eastern nations, and particularly the Persians, are in the gross very illiterate, and absolutely passive under a heavy tyranny, which they either believe to be established jure divino, and therefore not to be contradicted, or else stupidly drag the yoke without daring to enquire by whom or how it is imposed. One would imagine that the frequent revolutions which have happened in the east, and in Persia particularly, would have overturned this notion, because there could be no such thing as a rebellion or a revolution among abject slaves; there must be some reasoning to persuade people to take arms on the one side, and some arguments offered to prevent an immediate and total defection on the other; of consequence therefore there must in such countries be politicians, nay, and there must have been always politicians, since rebellions and revolutions are no new things. But the truth is, the people of good sense in Persia have in all ages had as rational ideas of government as we can pretend to, though it must be allowed they have unanimously preferred monarchy to all the other forms, or rather have professed a dislike of any form of rule but it. It is likewise true, that they have a professed fondness for that patriarchal right of kings which has been turned into such high ridicule by some of our great politicians: but after all, though they allow their kings to be absolute, yet they do not think they have any right at all to be wicked; they acknowledge that we owe them the same duty we do our parents; but then they will have their kings act like parents too, on pain of forfeiting that respect; they own that the prince is to be looked upon as God's vicergerent, this was the old and catholic opinion among the Persians; but at the same time they were far from paying him divine honours, or the king, from hiding himself, as the Greek writers would persuade us, from the sight of the people, that they might conceive extraordinary ideas of one who dwelt in such state. The truth of all this will appear from an ancient custom in use among the kings, of whom we have been speaking, on the first day of April, called from thence, that is from this custom, Churram-rax, i. e. the day of mirth, on which, as a very ancient writer informs us, the king descended from his throne dressed in a white garment; afterwards riding abroad on a white horse, accompanied by his nobility, he and they gave open and indiscriminate audience to all who approached them, laying aside all distinctions, and acting as if they were equals; husbandmen and clowns sat down at the same table with the king, without ceremony told him their minds, and without fear made such requests as they thought fit. The king on the other hand addressed them in these terms; I am one of you, and notwithstanding the elevation of my station, I know that all I have arises from your labour, and that kings could not be without you, any more than you could be without kings; let us then agree like brothers, since nothing but union can preserve us (51). The foregoing history hath shewn us that the Persian kings in ancient times were really as wise as humane, and as condescending as any that have reigned in the north or west; it would be invidious to say more so. If we look

- a The Persians are not only much charmed with the character of the great Alexander, they are also wonderfully pleased with that of his vizier as they call him, or, as he was in truth, his preceptor Aristotle; this wise man they call sometimes by the name of Aristbathialis, but commonly by way of abbreviation Aristou; they report that he was wonderfully sagacious even in his childhood, that he addicted himself very early to the school of Plato, and continued therein upwards of twenty years, till he set up for himself, and became author of the sect of Masebaisoun, i. e. the Peripateticks; they affirm likewise that he died very old, and in high reputation throughout all Greece. They are very positive that he was prime minister to Alexander, the son of Philip, and in consequence of this notion, they report a multitude of fine sayings and moral maxims under his name. Ben Cassan informs us that Aristotle composed above a hundred different treatises on various subjects, and amongst the rest mentions one which is neither found among his works as we have them at present, nor is at all taken notice of by any of the Greek writers. Its title runs thus; A discourse on the conduct which a great general ought to observe after the gaining or losing of a battle, which Ben Cassan says he dedicated to Alexander the Great. As to his philosophy we cannot find that it was thoroughly studied by the ancient Persians, though in after-times it came to be in high credit with the Arabians. But to return to Alexander; Mirkbond, who has wrote very copiously of his conquests, affirms, that he reduced many nations to the east of Persia under his dominion, and that he advanced as far as the Indies, that he was the founder of many glorious cities, particularly of Heri, or Herat, and Samarkand; he reports likewise that this prince, being mightily taken with the Persian learning, caused three celebrated treatises written in that language to be translated into Greek, the first relating to physick, look for the reasons which occasioned this, we may find them even in a Greek Writer: "At fourteen years old, says this excellent writer, those who were called the royal preceptors among the Persians take charge of the children of the crown; they are in number four, the most renowned persons in the kingdom for wisdom, justice, temperance, and valour; the first of these teaches the magick of Zoroaster, the son of Ormazdes (he should have said the worshipper, for Ormazdes was the name of God) and teach also the royal institutions, &c." As to the modern Persians, on whose credit we are now forced to take the history of these early times, they too are wise enough to abhor slavery, and to speak and write as freely about government as we. For example, the famous poet Sabdy wrote an express treatise on this subject, called an advice to kings; among other wise and prudent admonitions, he delivers these: "It is the wisdom of kings to be kind to the poor, and not to oppress the rich; the felicity of a state depends on the good sense and right disposition of the sovereign. The security of his country depends on his administering justice impartially, prosperity follows security, and will be where that is. If a country is once known to be secure, merchants will resort thither; the gain from thence will be large, and all temporal blessings will abound. If the country become rich, the king cannot well be poor, and besides at the last day he shall be recompensed amply by God for so well discharging his duty, whereas he who acts in a contrary manner will in every respect meet with a contrary fate. Be always kind to merchants, and publick ministers, that strangers being well received may carry a good report of you into their own country; soon will that kingdom fall wherein the souls of strangers are afflicted; be wise therefore, use the traveller well, that wheresoever he goes he may speak well of you.—A prince ought always to have before his eyes this maxim, dominion really belongs to God, and he has no certainty how long

"it shall be delegated to him; he ought likewise to remember that the country he rules was given by God to the people who inhabit it, to the end he may not be misled by the false ideas of things that have no solidity, and place his trust on joys that may not perhaps last five days. It is reported of the caliph Aron Reschid, that he one day said to the famous Beloul his brother, Give me some good advice; he answered, There is nothing to be carried out of this world into the other but good and bad works; it is in your power to carry which lead you please.—This Beloul was a very knowing man, who, that he might have the more leisure to attend his studies, would never marry. The caliph his brother asked him another time for his advice, how he might govern his people for their advantage and his own; the sage answered, Let your decisions become laws through their apparent equity, and never make reason yield to your will; prevent as far as you can requests, give little to such as ask, but think of giving in time to such as merit, and do not ask. The king is the head; the people are the body of the state; if the king is either ignorant or wicked, the head will devour the body with its teeth.—The government of an empire is an affair which requires a genius attentive and collected, and a heart which turns itself continually towards the Most High God, to invoke his aid, that its owner may turn his feet, his hand, his tongue, and his pen aright; and the king who acts thus, God will undoubtedly endue with grace, to conserve his empire and his piety (52)." It is evident from these citations, that the Persians have at present, and have always had very rational sentiments as to the reciprocal duties of governors and subjects; and it is likewise plain that the diffuse manner of writing peculiar to the east is not without its advantages, since the intent of history is not tiring the memory, but directing the judgment, which is perfectly answered by the oriental mode of delivering the wise sayings as well as great actions of famous kings.

the second to astrology, and the third to natural philosophy (Z); he divided, says the same historian, his ample dominions into ninety governments; and after a short and glorious life, ended his days at Babylon in the thirty-sixth year of his life, and seventeenth of his reign, leaving his conquests to be divided among his captains, who are distinguished by the Arabians and Persians with the title of Molouk al Sbaouaif, i. e. the kings of nations or families. The Persians likewise take notice of Alexander's brother Arideus, whom they stile Ardous, and generally speaking make him the son instead of the brother of that monarch; they agree however with the Greeks in representing him as a prince little qualified for empire; but they soften this account by pretending that he despised grandeur for the sake of wisdom, having learned from Aristotle to think those goods only valuable, which neither fortune nor force can take away.

(Z) At first sight it may seem, that Mirkhond might have inserted this story of Alexander's causing books to be translated out of the Perse language into Greek, merely to do honour to his country; but it would be unreasonable to suppose this, when we have good grounds to believe that the fact was really as he reports it. These grounds are, first, that Alexander was a very learned and inquisitive prince; and secondly, that it was his custom to transmit whatever he thought might be useful to the common-wealth of learning into Greece; as for instance, the astronomical observations which were found in Babylon. But as Mirkhond has set down the subjects of the books which he alleges were translated by that conqueror's command, the matter seems to be put out of dispute, since all the sciences he mentions were indisputably better understood in Persia than in Greece. First, as to physic, if we consider the prescriptions of Hippocrates, and other ancient physicians, we shall find that the drugs then in use were most of them brought from the east, and not a few from Persia; and if they had their drugs from these places, why should we question their learning from the inhabitants of these places how to use them? But farther still; among the works of Zerdusht, there is a treatise which bears the title of Bizistk-nama, i. e. the book of physicians, which is said to treat intirely of the virtues of herbes, and how they ought to be applied; nay, he is reported to have been so very skilful in these matters, that Sharifiani in his treatise of the religions of the east, which we have so often quoted, attributes expressly all the miracles Zerdusht is said to have done to his skill in simples only (53). Now take it either way, if he was inspired, he knew all things; if not, he knew so much of simples as to pass himself for a prophet; consequently there might be treatises on physic among the Persians well worth Alexander's directing to be put into Greek. Secondly, as to astronomy and other mathematical sciences, we have proved in our note N. that they were well known to this people, when they were very little known to the Greeks, and that from the testimony of the Greeks themselves. It is true that the modern Persians stand indebted for most of their knowledge in these sciences to the writings of the Greeks, which are translated into Arabic and Persian; but the reason of this is plain, because the ancient books relating to these abstruse sciences were not so carefully preserved as those which regard history and morality; these being valuable in the sight of many; those precious only in the eyes of few. As to moral philosophy, which was the subject of the third book mentioned by Mirkhond, it was the darling study of the ancient Persians, if we may venture to credit any thing which oriental writers have delivered. Morality is the subject of the book, intitled Gjoudan Chrad ascribed to Hushang, a king far older than Zerdusht. Morality was the subject of most of Zerdusht's writings, as we gather from such fragments of them as we have seen, and especially from the book Sad-der, which though written ad captum vulgi in verse, and in a ballad stile, contains as many moral sentences as are to be found in Diogenes Laertius's lives of the philosophers. To these arguments in favour of the learning of the ancient Persians we may add the amazing love of science visible in the modern Persians; for we can hardly account for it any other way than by their mixing with the ancient inhabitants of this country, and borrowing from their stores, since they far exceed the Turks, and indeed all the eastern nations, except the Chinese, in their affection for learning; as a proof of which we shall alledge the reigning maxim in their schools, not unworthy perhaps of being echoed in our universities: Doubting is the beginning of science: he who doubts nothing, examines nothing: he who examines nothing, discovers nothing: he who discovers nothing, is blind, and must remain blind. An extraordinary affection for mystical theology seems to have been the reigning passion of the ancient Persees, and of the Persians at this day. Among the latter there is a sect stiled Supbi or Sepbi, who profess themselves admirers of the Pythagoric philosophy. Pythagoras, as we have shewn, is generally, and not without good grounds, supposed to have been the scholar of Zoroaster, and is thought to have learned from him those refined notions with which these men are charmed. To describe the notions of the Supbi in few words, we must say that according to their own account they are quicquits or enthusiasts; in the opinion of the vulgar, atheists. They sail often and to excess, they pretend to ecstasies and conversations with God. They profess themselves friends alike to all men, and believe that the good in all religions are saved. They have a remarkable aversion for church-men, which is owing perhaps to the outrageous antipathy the clergy shew towards them. Sir John Chardin gives us a whimsical instance of this; he says he was present when a preacher at Spahoun told the people in his sermon that the Supbi's were atheists, that they deserved to be burnt, and that he who killed one of this sect did an action more pleasing in the sight of God, than if he saved the lives of ten other men. As soon as he came out of the pulpit, five or six Supbi's who were among his audience cudgelled him heartily; and when our author interposed and begged them to give ear to the poor man's cries, one of them answered briskly, What! Ought a fellow who preaches up murder to complain of a beating? (54).

- a We have now conducted the history of the Persian empire from its origin to its dissolution after the death of Alexander the great; in our next period we shall see it revive again under a prince descended from their ancient kings, and of the magian religion. We have referred our researches into the chronology of the writers from whom we have taken this history, till we come to the utter extinction of the monarchy of the native Persians in Yezdegerd; but before we close this section it will be proper to obviate some objections to the bulk of the foregoing history, which may arise from the very tenour thereof. For first it may be said that there is so much of confessed fable in almost every reign of these Persian monarchs, and the years generally speaking assigned for the reign of each are so incredible, that a prudent man will be tempted to reject the whole rather than take up with a tale full of apparent absurdities. To this we answer, that if it once becomes an established rule to reject every history which carries in it a mixture of fable, all the ancient historians must be condemned in the lump. Berosus, if we may judge from the fragments which still remain of his work, inserted many fabulous narrations in his Babylonish antiquities. Manetho, the Egyptian historian, can expect no mercy if once this law be owned. Herodotus, Ctesias, Xenophon, and innumerable others* will share the same fate with Mirkbond, and the rest of the Persian writers. But after all, there is so tolerable an account to be given of that mixture of fable which is interwoven with the Persian
- c history, that if a critick's stomach be not very nice, he may, after a little consideration, be brought to digest it. We opened this section with observing that the ancient Medes and Persians were very curious and exact in setting down all matters of consequence in their chronicles, and in preserving those chronicles through a long succession of time; the truth of this fact we prove from indubitable authorities sacred and profane. As to the stile of these records we may form some judgment of it from the edicts remaining in the sacred scriptures, and from the passage cited in relation to a conspiracy against Abasuerus in the book of Esther; and from all these it is plain, that though it was noble and sententious, it was far from being hyperbolic or romantic*. But these records are no more; what we have now is taken from Mohammedan
- d writers, who have certainly altered the old Persian history, and digested it according to their own taste; nay, what is still worse, many of these writers, neglecting the more ancient and plain accounts of the old Persian empire, have taken up with the romances written long after, to tickle the ears of the people, and perhaps to serve other purposes which at this distance of time we are unacquainted with. Can we wonder after this at the fables recited in the foregoing history? Can we suppose that strangers, born with a contempt for the Persees, the descendants of the old inhabitants of this country, will do their ancestors strict justice? Can we believe that those who in consequence of the religion themselves profess, are inveterate enemies to that religion which was held by the kings of whom they write, will ever speak
- e of it with impartiality and truth? or can we doubt that these writers have made many other alterations, when we find them asserting of such kings as they report to have lived wisely and piously, that they were not Magians, but true believers, i. e. of their own religion; whereas nothing can be more certain, than that the Persian monarchs from Keyomaras to Yezdegerd were all of one religion, allowing for such alterations in that religion as are incident to all religions in so long a tract of time? But the egregious length of the reigns of the kings of Persia remains yet untouched. To this charge there is indeed no reply, we admit it to be just, but at the same
- f time we can safely say the same charge may be brought against every ancient history extant among the orientals. To give but one instance from the history of the Tartars written by Abu l'Ghazi Babader Khan of Khorazm, from records the most ancient, and authentic, if the royal author is to be believed, and yet he places but seventeen Khans between Bertizena Khan, and Kabul Khan, though according to his history, there intervened 2550 years between those princes; and in another part of his history the allows a thousand years for the reigns of six princes^b. These are mistakes as great as any that are to be met with in the historians we have cited, and it would be no difficult thing to draw together many examples of the like nature, if this were a proper place. But this single one is sufficient for our purpose; we do not pretend to say that the numbers set down in our catalogues of kings are right, or capable of being defended; we only alledge, that they are not more proposterous than the numbers a which are met with in other oriental historians, who are notwithstanding allowed to have some truth in their works. This confession we hope will procure us some favour, and pave the way to those amendments which we shall offer in due time. But, secondly, It may be objected, that our Persian history from the oriental writers, being in most respects directly opposite to the history in the foregoing section, which is extracted from the Greek writers, one of the two must be rejected, since opposites can never be alike true. To this we may say, that we would be glad to compound the difference; and to allow that the Persian history from the Greeks is frequently to be preferred to this, and that this is in other places frequently to be preferred to that. Something in support of this demand has been already said on account of b Xerxes's expedition, the life of Zoroaster, and the death of Darius: Besides, as we have before observed, the Greeks differ among themselves, nay, there is not one author amongst them who in speaking of the Persian affairs may not be proved to have been mistaken in several points, even from his own works. As for instance, Herodotus, who in one part of his history makes them worshippers of the elements, and in another polluters, in a third chastisers of them; add to this, that the Greeks like all other writers, were notoriously partial to their country and countrymen as indeed were the Persians; so that on the whole what we ask will not appear very unreasonable, especially when we refer it to the judgment of the reader to compare, to weigh, and to decide as he pleases. But, thirdly, It may be objected, that these accounts being c opposite to what is recorded by the Greek writers, and having no authority to support them but their reputed antiquity, they ought for this reason to be rejected, since true history is always supported by concurrent testimonies of natives and foreigners, the latter of which is wanting here; the strength however of this objection, which is the last, and perhaps the most plausible of all that can be offered against the foregoing series of facts, will be effectually weakened from the following considerations, which we had no opportunity of inserting in the body of the work. First, amongst those writers which are best known to the learned, there are none which come near the times contained under the beginning of this period. Among the Greek historians the history of the Medes and Persians ascends, as we have shewn, very little higher d than Cyurs, if we except what Diodorus Siculus has transcribed from Ctesias (A), which has

(A) We have so often mentioned Ctesias and his works in the course of this section, that there seems to be a necessity of our giving a short account of this author and his works, to render those remarks we have had occasion to make, perfectly plain and clear. Ctesias lived thirty or forty years after Herodotus; he was by profession a physician, and seems to have been very eminent therein; he was taken prisoner by Artaxerxes Mnemon, whom he cured of a wound which he received in the battle which he fought against his brother Cyrus. He resided sixteen or seventeen years in the Persian court, and through the favour he was in there, had leave to peruse the royal chronicles, and those authentic histories of which we have so often spoken. From these he compiled in XXIII books the history of the ancient empires of Assyria, Media, and Persia; which history of his he brought into Greece, where it was received with the greatest applause. Diodorus Siculus, to whom we are as much indebted as to any ancient author whatever, has transcribed into his bibliothec, the substance of Ctesias's first six books, after having given us the following character of their author: "Ctesias the Cnidian was later than Herodotus, for he flourished at the time of Cyrus's expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, in which being taken prisoner, he was, for his skill in physic, received into Artaxerxes's favour, in whose court he lived in much honour and esteem seventeen years. During that space he digested into a regular history whatever he found worthy of notice in the Persian chronicles, wherein, by a fundamental law of the empire, all remarkable actions were exactly registered; and this history

"he brought with him into Greece (55)." Diodorus in the very place from whence we have quoted this passage, prefers Ctesias to Herodotus, as he does in most other places of his book where he cites either of them. Xenophon speaking of the death of the younger Cyrus, quotes this writer with applause (56). Plato agrees with him as to the power of the ancient Assyrian empire (57). Aristotle also commends him (58), and in a word almost all the ancient authors who have written in Greek prefer him to Herodotus. The very learned patriarch of Constantinople, Photius, has preserved in his bibliothec an abridgement of this author's Persian history, before which he premises that this writer differed not a little from Herodotus, and even from Xenophon, who was universally held to have written more knowingly on the affairs of the east, and particularly of those of Persia, than any of the Greeks; but so it is, that Xenophon, as well as Ctesias, has been suspected of mingling fiction with true history, because he has not represented the Persians as an ignorant barbarous people, plunged in sensuality and sloth, according to the usual custom of his countrymen. Besides his Persian history, Ctesias wrote also an Indian history, wherein it is generally agreed there are a great many strokes of fable; this Indian history of his has exceedingly hurt the credit of his other writings, and seems to be the true source of those severe censures which many and especially modern authors have passed on this famous historian. Photius at the end of his abstract gives us this character of the writer we are speaking of: "The style of Ctesias, says he, though it is extremely plain and simple, is far from being unpleasant; he uses the

- a has been generally exploded by the critics *. With respect therefore to writers of great antiquity, if our history be unsupported by them, it is likewise uncontradicted. The first race of Persian kings are to be placed in a void, where if we do not fix them, we know not who to fix besides, unless we take up with the feigned catalogue of Assyrian monarchs contrived by Annius of Viterbo; and as to writers of a latter date our Persian history is not destitute of friends amongst them, such as are unbiassed; and against whose credit there is nothing to be said. The royal author of the history of the Tartars, speaking of the original of his nation, which he derives, as most of the oriental writers do, from Turk the eldest son of Japhet; he proceeds thus: "Turk was a man of superior genius, having been the first who invented many of the conveniencies of life; he made himself tents, and pitched upon a fixed residence in a place called at present Isackkoll: he had four sons; 1. Taunak; 2. Zakale; 3. Benfazar; 4. Amlak. At his death he appointed his son Taunak for his successor, who became a very rich and ingenious prince, author of many fine inventions. It happened one day, that Taunak having gone a hunting, and killed much game, ordered a piece to be roasted; but when he was just going to eat some of it, he by chance let a bit drop upon the ground, and having taken it up, and put it to his mouth, he found it delicious, by reason a grain of salt had stuck to it; which having given him to understand that this land was impregnated with salt, he set himself to improve this discovery, and became the first inventor of the use of salt, no one before him having known what salt was, or that it could season victuals. Cotemporary with him reigned a prince in the country of Iran, called Cajumars or Keyomaras. Taunak lived 240 years, and at his death left his throne to his son Ielza Chan who lived many years, and before his death appointed his son Dibbakin Chan to succeed him. Dibbakin Chan lived also a long time, and disposed of the succession before his death to his son Kajak Chan, who reigned a great length of years, and had for his successor after his death his son Alanza Chan. From the days of Japhin and his descendants to the time of Alanza Chan, the true religion was preserved, and during the reign of this prince his subjects lived in a profound peace, having great abundance of all sorts of riches." From this passage it is evident, that the records of Tartary mention this Keyomaras just where the Persian historians place him; and it is likewise plain, that the belief of

"Ionian dialect, not every where as Herodotus does, but in some words only, for the sake of varying his language: what is objected to him of his frequently running into fabulous stories, is not without grounds, especially in what he has written, concerning Jndra. The delightfulness of this history, arises chiefly from his disposition of facts, which are so placed, as continually to surprize the reader, and keep his attention engaged; even his most fabulous accounts being adorned with a very pleasant and easy eloquence (59)." Besides these large extracts, there are various fragments of this author to be met with in the works of Athenæus (60), Apollonius (61), Plutarch (62), Ælian (63), Stephanus Byzantius (64), &c. It would constrain us to draw this note into a great length, should we pretend to shew wherein this author differs with the Greek writers, or wherein he agrees with the oriental authors, treating of the Persian history: for the satisfaction however of the inquisitive peruser, we shall subjoin a short account of those reigns which interfere with the foregoing sections of the Median and Persian empires.

Cyrus is by him said to have married Amysis, and to have had two sons Cambyfes and Tanyoxares; he allows him to have reigned thirty years, and says, that he died of a wound received in battle.

Cambyfes, according to him, married Roxana, and after a reign of eighteen years died of a wound which he casually gave himself in the thigh.

The Magian, filed by the Greek writers Emerdis, is by him called Spendadates; he computes his reign to have lasted only seven months, and to have been slain by seven conspirators.

Darius, the son of Hystaspes, reigned thirty-one years, died of a sickness which lasted thirty days; and left his empire to his son Xerxes.

Xerxes had to wife Amysis; his children were Darius, Hystaspes, Artaxerxes, Artemenides, Artabarius, Amysis, and Rhodoguna; this king was slain by Artabanus and Spamitres.

Artaxerxes, his wife's name was Damaspia; he reigned forty-two years, left but one legitimate son, viz. Xerxes, but seventeen by concubines, of whom Secyndianus and Ochus afterwards succeeded him.

Xerxes the second, he held the regal dignity forty-five days, and was destroyed by a conspiracy.

Secyndianus, after a reign of six months and twenty-five days, was smothered in ashes.

Ochus, called Darius, married Parisatis, he reigned thirty-five years, and had the following children, viz. Arfaxes, Cyrus, Artosus, Oxendras, and thirteen others; he died of a languishing disease at Babylon.

Arfaxes, this is the same prince whom the Greek writers stile Artaxerxes Mnemon; he overcame his brother Cyrus, his wife's name was Stateira; and in his time Ctesias resided in Persia, and compiled his history (65).

the true religion is reported by the same records to have remained untainted ^a in these countries, which is exactly what our Persian writers say; the same author agrees with them in many other things, such as making Sam, i. e. Shem and his descendants, the original inhabitants of Iran or Persia, and in acknowledging Hushanbg, the grandson of Keyomaras his successor: he relates likewise the wars carried on by the descendants of Turk against the monarchs of Iran, and proportions the reigns of those Kbans to the reigns of the kings of Persia mentioned in the foregoing history. In Dr. Hyde's learned book of the religion of the ancient Persians, there are many Arabic and other historians quoted in support of such passages of the ancient Persian history as he has occasion to touch on in that work. It is true, that learned and judicious writer is far from conceiving that all these oriental historians have ^b delivered ought to be taken on trust; on the contrary he points out many of their errors, as he does also those of the Greek writers, whence he argues, as we do after him, that intire credit ought to be given to neither, but that the likeliest method for attaining truth is to read and compare both *. Secondly, the whole series of ancient history teaches, that in the most remote ages of the world these countries were very populous, and under the dominion of potent monarchs; this is exactly conformable to what our writers of the Persian history, and other oriental authors affirm; so that we must either renounce that opinion which has hitherto been generally entertained of these eastern countries, being first and most fully peopled, or we must admit that these accounts are probable, if it were in respect only to this point. Thirdly, there ^c remain of the ancient Persians those poor distressed creatures who are now stiled Persees, as so many living witnesses of the truth of this history. We can no way avoid affording our belief to this proposition, that the religion they profess is the very same which their ancestors held in the reign of Texdegherd; and if so, we must trace this religion from their accounts, those of their conquerors, and such as are to be met with among their neighbour nations. Now the Persees, as well those in India as those which still remain in their own country, affirm steadily, that it was settled by Keyomaras, reformed by Zerdusht, and so continued till the dissolution of the empire of the native Persians. The modern Persians, and the Arabic historians, acknowledge these facts to be so; they are likewise admitted by such of the oriental christian writers as have come to our knowledge: we may therefore conclude, that ^d there is not so much in this third objection as at first sight there may seem, but that, considering the nature of the thing, this history has as strong evidence in its favour as any other history of equal antiquity, excepting that of the Hebrews; a proposition which we long ago undertook to prove, and which we have hitherto prosecuted with no small pains. The reader will no doubt take notice of some deviations in this section from our ordinary method, and of frequent recapitulations of facts which have drawn this section to an extraordinary length; but at the same time we hope it will be observed, that this is a subject that hath hitherto been untouched, a scene of confusion, wherefrom little was expected; if therefore it has cost an unusual trouble to give it some form, it ought to be excused, since transactions ^e of this nature agree with the old mode of reducing Chaos, wherein there was first motion, and then light. The first is here, the latter may come in time; hitherto oriental histories have been confined to the learned languages, and, like books of alchimy, been despised as trifles by some, and esteemed as treasures by others. Of their value we pretend not to decide, it was our business to bring them here, to place them in the view of our English reader in the best method we could; and having done this, we are to leave them to the judgment of the public.

An Inquiry into the Origin, Antiquity, Migrations, and Settlements of the Scythians and Gomerians, considered as two distinct Nations, by way of Introduction to their History.

^a THESE two nations are so splendid in ancient history, that it would be next to impossible to assign their different territories, or give their history with any tolerable clearness, without previously tracing them to their distinct originals, taking a cursory retrospect of their migrations and settlements; and considering each of them under those various names, by which they are mentioned by ancient historians. We have already seen at the beginning of this history, that they were both descended from Gomer†, the eldest son of Japhet. This last we have also proved to have been the eldest son of *Noah, and to have received this peculiar blessing from his father, that God would enlarge his borders^b, upon which account Moses observes immediately after, that the isles of the Gentiles, by which is understood Europe, was divided by, or among his posterity^c. This perhaps is what induced Berosus and those who have followed him, to make such desperate haste to settle Gomer's children in Italy, Asturia, Biscay, and other parts of Europe, even so early as 142 years after the flood. Hence others, no less sanguine, have ventured to bring Gomer into Gaul, Tubal into Spain, Astenaz into Germany, and Magog into Sweden, or Denmark^d. These precipitate migrations stand sufficiently confuted by their palpable impossibility^e (A), were there nothing else to disprove them. But nothing appears more certain, than that those patriarchs never came out of Asia. On the contrary, we find their descendants making a considerable figure in that cradle of the world, and settling themselves as near as they conveniently could to one another, till scantiness of room, want of pasturage, some accidental discords, or some other reasons, obliged them to branch out further on all sides towards Europe, and northern Asia, whilst the descendants of Shem and Ham enlarged their territories in their several allotments, in the southern parts of Asia and Africa, as we have already seen in their several histories.

To make the same appear the more clearly with respect to the sons of Gomer, let us now take a short retrospect of their first settlements in Asia, their migrations thence into Europe, their successive stations before they came into those parts in which they settled themselves into regular kingdoms and governments; and from which some of them returned again into Asia in process of time, where they gave

(A) Nothing indeed were more absurd, than to suppose that they separated themselves from the rest, before the general dispersion at Babel; and if immediately after, how little time soever be allowed for the building of that stupendous fabrick, the remainder will be vastly too short for a migration of near 3000 miles, thro' woods, forests, and deserts;

and with all the incumbrance of their families, cattle, and other luggage; for so far Sir Walter Rawleigh has proved it to be by land, in the place above quoted. It were still more monstrous to suppose that they could come into Europe by sea, with such a numerous retinue, so long before any thing of navigation, even by coasting, was known.

names to countries, cities, mountains and rivers, which have caused such a confusion ^a in ancient historians, for want of rightly distinguishing between those two distant migrations. This circumstance makes it very necessary, to examine, in the first place, whether the Scythians and the Gomerians, properly so called, were originally the same, or two distinct nations. Without such a previous inquiry, we shall find their names, countries, and exploits so confused, that it would be next to impossible to settle their geography, or understand their history with any satisfactory clearness.

We have formerly hinted at the different opinions of the learned concerning this point ^{}, which seems chiefly to be owing to these two causes. 1. That none of the sacred historians mention these two nations by any other names than that of their progenitor ^{}; and 2. That prophane authors have been so confounded by their variety of names, migrations and exploits in several parts of Asia, as well as Europe, and particularly by the affinity of those names which they gave in both places, to towns, rivers, mountains, and the like, in their driving one another out of their territories, which they often did by turns; that it is not easy to know whether they spoke of the same nation, under different names, or of two distinct ones. Sure it is, that if they meant the latter, they have most egregiously confounded them, by ascribing names, places, and exploits to the one, which belonged to the other, which makes it extremely difficult to discover when they speak of the Scythians, and when of the Celtes or Gomerians. At least it is evident that Herodotus, Ptolomy, and Justin [†], to name no more, have called the Scythians, who remigrated into Asia by some names, and attributed some actions, and places to them, which, upon closer examination, are found to have belonged to the Celtes or Gomerians, whom they had driven thither out of their European territories. An accurate ancient geographer tells us ^{*}, that the old Greek historians gave the name of Scythians and Celto-Scythians, to all the inhabitants of the northern regions, though it is plain that a considerable part of them were properly Celtes or Gomerians ^{*}. And in the same book he adds, that those people who inhabited beyond the Caspian sea, which should be the Scythians, were by the same Greek historians, called some Sacks, and others Massagetes, though the former of these names, at least, ^d belonged only to the Celtes, as we shall shew in its proper place.

For these reasons, many learned men have chosen to reckon them as one people branched out into that variety of names and characters, under which they are distinguished in history. Notwithstanding which, and the silence of the sacred books, Josephus's authority has been more universally received both by ancient fathers, and modern authors; who affirms the Celtes or Gauls to be descended from Gomer, and the Scythians from Maggog, his next brother [†]; and we think very justly too. As to the first, there is not the least reason to doubt of it; for besides the testimony of the Jewish historian, we have this undoubted proof, that notwithstanding all the various denominations, which they have undergone, and which ^e seem rather to have been given to them by other nations, than assumed by themselves (B); they have still preserved their original name of Gomro, or Cymro, or descendants of Gomer, and retain it to this day, in all those countries where the Celtic or Gomerian language is preserved; which is therefore called Gomeraeg or Cymbraeg, that is the language of Gomer ^{*}.

To all this we may add the concurrent testimony of Ptolomy, Strabo, Pliny, Dionysius of Alexandria, or rather Charax, Mela and others, who mention them under the

(B) By these names we mean, not only those which were a palpable corruption of their original one, such as Cymbrians, Cymmerians, Cammerians, and the like; but those of Celtes, Gauls, Galatians, Titans, Sacks, and perhaps also those of Scythians, Celto-Scythians, Celtiberians, and some others; all which, if we may guess at them by their etymons, seem to have been given to them, some out of compliment, and on account of their valour, and others out of contempt, and in revenge for their incursions, plunders, and conquests. Thus the word Celtes, in Greek κελται, or κελται, signifying horsemen in Homer and Pindar, might be given them on account of their great expertness in horsemanship (1).

a the names of Comarians, Camarians, Ebomarians, Cymbrians, Cymmerians, and such like; all which do plainly appear to be a corruption of their original name of *Gomerians*¹. We have likewise the authority of some ancient fathers, who agree that Gomer was the father and founder of the Gomerians, called afterwards Celtes, Galatians and *Gauls*². And if all this be not enough to prove the Celtes to be derived from Gomer, we shall add another pregnant argument out of Cluverius, who proves that the ancient Celtic nation, which according to him included the regions of Illyria, Germany, Gallia, Spain, the Britannic, and other northern isles, did all speak the same language³, which could be no other than the Gomeraeg, or the language of Gomer, which had been universally preserved among all his descendants, as we b shall shew more fully when we come to speak of their language and history. To all these we shall add at the bottom some authentic monuments, which the warlike descendants of Gomer, and his brethren, have left in their various settlements, which still more corroborate what we have said concerning their origin, migrations, and settlements (C).

WHERE we as well acquainted with the Scythian nation, with respect to these two particulars, it would not be difficult to trace it to its fountain-head, and to dispel that obscurity which we find in ancient authors concerning them, who as we hinted before, have too much confounded them with the Gomerians. However, we are not without some additional proofs to the testimony of Josephus, who affirms them
c to be descended from Magog above-mentioned, and for which he had been followed by many of the fathers, and by a greater number of moderns⁴. For first, we find some ancient monuments of that patriarch, and of his two brothers Meshech and Tubal in the neighbourhood of his brother Gomer, in the regions of lesser Asia, where they planted themselves after the dispersion (D). Secondly, As they spread themselves towards Europe, and Gomer's descendants turned towards the north-west, so those of Magog may be reasonably supposed to have spread themselves towards the north-east into both Scythias, where we find some plain foot-steps of their progenitor, besides the name of Mogli, which was that of the ancient Moskovites and

Another author (2) derives that word, and that of Gaul from the Celtic, in which both signify a warlike man. Bochart conjectures that they were called Gauls and Galatians from the redness of their hair (3).

That of Titans, may either allude to it, as it was a name of the sun, whose etymon can no where be so appositely found as in the Celtic, in which Ti or Ty, signifies a House, and Tan, or Tæn, Fire, and both together, The house of fire. Some however fetch it from the Celtic Tit, which in that as well as in the Hebrew, signifies dust or dirt; so that Titans shall signify the same as terrigenæ, or children of the earth or dirt. This last etymon, if admitted, may be supposed to have been given them in scorn, and to imply the baseness of their origin, as that of Sacks, which signifies thieves and plunderers, was given them on account of their living chiefly by that trade.

That of Celtiberians, or inhabitants of Celtiberia, or Spain, might be designed to distinguish those Celtes on that, from those of this side the Pyrenæes, as we shall have further occasion to shew in another note. For thus we find Gallia or Gaul divided into Cis and Trans-alpina, and the word Iberia seems derived from the old Celtic and Teutonic Iber which signifies over (4); and thus Spain, which is sometimes found in the plural number, was divided into Citerior and Ulterior.

Other etymologies of their names we omit, because authors have been too apt to fetch them from other languages, in order to make them square with their own hypotheses, because they were ignorant of the Celtic, from which it is most natural to derive them, as shall be further proved in due time.

(C) Thus the Gomerians left their name to the Albanian mountains, when they exchanged them for the more pleasant plains of Phrygia; and to a city of this province, which in Pliny's time was still called Cymmeris, Askenas, Gomer's son gave his to the Sinus Ascanicus, to a lake and river of the same name; and in the lesser Phrygia, to a city and province, and to the Insula Ascanica.

From Riphatb, another of his sons, we have the Riphean nation and country, since called Paphlagonia, and from Togarma, his youngest son, whom the Greek version calls Θοργαμα and Торгамъ, the Trogmans or Trocmans of Cappadocia and Pontus; all these the reader may further see in the learned Bochart (5).

In like manner Magog, Meshech, and Tubal, whose bands are joined together by the prophet (6) have left their names to several countries, bordering upon those of Gomer; as Magog to the Gogareni, Meshech, or, as he is called by the ancients, Mosoch, to the mountains Moschici, between Colchis and Armenia; and mentioned by Ptolemy, Pliny, and Mela; as the reader may see it further proved in Bochart above quoted.

(D) of this kind are the provinces of Mongog or Monzug, Congigo, Gigwi, and some others; and the cities of Gyngui, Angui, Gorgangui and Guigui in Tartary †.

Tartarians (E); and seems only a corruption or abbreviation of Magogli, the sons a of Magog. To these we may add, Thirdly, That there is scarce a nation under heaven that so fully answers the warlike, bloody and dreadful character, which the scriptures give us of Gog and Magog, as that of the barbarous Scythian; upon all these accounts therefore we hope we may venture with Josephus to derive them from that patriarch.

HAVING thus far cleared the way, and disentangled, as much as possible, the intricacy of ancient authors concerning these two nations, we shall now proceed to add something of their different migrations from Asia into Europe, which will still give a further light to what has been said already. The reader may remember that we formerly settled Gomer, their common progenitor, with his descendants about b him, in the province of *Pbrygia*¹: Ashkenaz his eldest son, or, according to the Armenians, Togarmah his youngest, or, it may be, both of them, in Armenia; and Riphat the second son in Cappadocia; or, in some province, in the neighbourhood of *Pbrygia*². For the condition the young world was then in, would not permit them to go far from each other at first; and when their increase made it afterwards necessary to enlarge their territories, it is reasonable to suppose, that they kept a correspondence with each other, by means of those rivers, along whose banks both they and their descendants were forced to pitch their tents, for the convenience of pasture for their numerous herds³, even when they began to spread themselves further and wider into Europe; they seem to have moved regularly, and in columns, c without interfering one with another, and as it were by a settled contract. For in proportion to their advancing northward, we find the Gomerians, who had taken the left hand, insensibly spreading themselves westwards, towards Poland, Hungary, Germany, France, and so quite up to Spain, whilst the Scythians or descendants of Magog, moved to the right eastward, towards Moscow and Tartary, as far as the borders of Cathai, if not beyond.

THUS was all Europe, and the far greater part of Asia, their utmost extent northward, peopled by those two famous nations, the former almost wholly by the Celtes, or Gomerians, that is from the utmost parts of Spain to Scythia Europeana, eastward, and the latter from thence almost to the territories of China, as we shall d see in the sequel. So that the whole extent of these two nations reached from the 20th degree west, to the 8th east longitude, and in latitude from the 40th degree quite up to the arctic circle.

UPON the whole then, it appears, that the first rank belongs to the noble Celtic nation, as descended from the elder brother, tho' the preference has been given to the Scythians by the universal vote of profane authors, who were unacquainted that their progenitor was Gomer's younger brother. Scytbarum gens antiquissima was even a proverb among them; upon which account we gave them the first rank in the plan of this history. But being now convinced of the contrary, and we hope that our readers are so by this time, we shall restore it to its right owners the Celtes, who claim it on account, e not only of their eldership, but much more on that of their superior merit; as will appear more fully from the history of both.

(E) Accordingly, we do scarcely find any part of Europe in which some of these are not mentioned by ancient geographers and (7) historians, under the names of Gomerians, Cymbrians, Celtes, Celtiberians, Celto Syrians, and such like, as we shall more fully see in the sequel.

As for Iberia, or Spain, Josephus doth indeed affirm, that it was first peopled by the Tubalims, or sons of Tubal or Tobal, as he calls him (8), who was the fifth son of Japhet (9). On the other hand, Sir Walter Raleigh thinks it more probable, that it was first inhabited by the Africans, who did from thence conceive such fondness for it, that they have been ever since striving from time to time to regain it (10). But we see no reason for preferring either of these opinions to the concurrent testimony of the authors above quoted; to which we may add that the surname of Celto, given to that province, and that of Celtiberians or Celto iberians, to its inhabitants, doth make it much more probable, that the Celtes were the first peoplers of it, especially if we consider that the name of Iberia signifies in the old Celtic and Teutonic, over, or on the other side, as we hinted in a former note. So that the Celtiberians might mean only the Celtes, on the other side the Pyreneans, to distinguish them from those on this side (11).

It is likewise more natural to suppose, that the warm situation of Spain, might invite the Celtes thither from the more northern climates of Europe, than that the Africans could come thither so early by sea; unless we can swallow that ridiculous Spanish tradition, which makes Tubal to have crossed over thither, and to have built the towns of St. Vaal, which is still standing at this day (12).

S E C T. II.

The History of the CELTES, under the names of GOMERIANS, CYMMERIANS, CYMBRIANS, CELTES, GAULS, GALATIANS, TITANS, SACKS, &c.

- ^a WE have already spoken of the migrations of these sons of Gomer, from Asia, into Europe, and endeavoured to account, as well as we could, for their variety of names in the last section; wherein we observed their regular progress from Pbrygia their first settlement, through Thrace, Hungary, Germany, Gallia, Italy, till they had spread themselves to the utmost borders of Spain. In this large European tract it was that having fixed their boundaries between the Scythians and themselves, they began to appear a powerful nation under a regular monarchy, and gave their country, or others for them, the name of Gallia, and Galatia, whilst themselves did retain their own antient name of Gomero, or Gomerians. As for those of Cymerians, and Cymbrians, &c. which seems only a corruption of that, it is observable, that it was given to none of the Celtes, but those who inhabited the more northern regions of Europe, above the Euxine sea, and the north of the Danube, where they were less known and intermixed. Thus that part of Germany now known by the name of Holstein was called Cymbria Kersonesus. The names of Tytans and Sacks were given only to those of lesser Asia, so that they seem to have been only known in this part of Europe, by those of Celtes and Gauls (A). The name of Galatians, γαλαται was given them also by the Greeks, but it is plain it meant the same with the Gauls, and accordingly antient authors make them descended from the same father, namely Gomer. It was not however in this tract of ground that they began to be famous for their warlike exploits; they had already
- ^b signalized their names in several parts of both the higher and lower Asia, where it is likely they began very early to be governed by several valiant princes of their own, and this is the reason that we find the name of Gomerians, and Gomarites, as well as those of Sacks and Titans in those parts among ancient geographers, which names were afterwards changed to that of Celtes, after their spreading themselves into Europe, as will more fully appear by the sequel. But those early exploits are so intricate, and built so much upon conjecture, that it would be dangerous to rely too strenuously upon them. At the most, it is plain, that these Asiatic conquests did not remain long enough in their possession, to deserve a place in their geography of their country. Those exploits will be best resumed in the history of those nations with whom they had to do. Whilst we confine their territories at present within those limits of Europe, in which we can speak of their actions with much greater certainty (B).

(A) Cæsar in his commentaries, doth indeed tell us, that they took the name of Celtes to themselves, whilst the Romans did give them that of Galli or Gauls (1), not knowing in all likelihood that they both signified the same thing in the old Celtic, namely warriors (2). We would not depend too much upon uncertain etymologies, though we have ventured to give some other sense of these two names; as they are fetched from other languages, and indeed there is nothing more easy than to find in all languages such likenesses of sounds as Gauls and Galli, Celtes, and γαλαται, though of such different meanings, as to make it very dubious, which is the right etymon. At least those are the most likely to be the truest, which are derived from the language itself, unto whom the name belongs; excepting however such of them as we observed there, were given in contempt, and by way of reproach, as that of Sacks or robbers. But here it is certain that the Celtes made too great a figure in the world long before Cæsar's time, to have been called Galli, in derision.

(B) We must not however omit taking notice, that when the prophet threatens the Jews with bringing Gomer and his armies against them from the north quarters (3), he seems to intimate that there were still some of the descendants of that patriarch settled in some of the northern parts of higher Asia even in his time, and that they continued there till the fulfilling of the prophecy, that is till some years after the Babylonish captivity, when they made that terrible irruption into Palestine, of which we shall speak in its proper place.

Accordingly we find Ptolemy placing the Chamarians and Gomarians as two distinct nations, though originally the same; the first with Chamara their supposed metropolis, in Bactria along the south banks of the river Oxus; and the latter a little further north in the province of Sogdiana (4). Mela, though he differs somewhat from Ptolemy in their situation, doth

Geography.

It is not easy to fix the exact boundaries, which divided the Celtes from the European Scythians, for the reasons given in the last section. We may perhaps be more particular, when we come to the geography of the latter. At present we shall only observe that the former extended from the Danube, their supposed boundaries, to the farthest part of Spain and Portugal, reaching at least three degrees from east to west, that is from that famous river to cape Fenestre. It was bounded on the south by the Mediterranean sea, and west and north-west by the western and northern ocean. How far it extended full north, whether to Hyperborean or frozen sea, or only to the Baltic, we presume not to say. The last however seems most probable, for reasons we shall give in the history of Scythia. For it is probable they did not advance towards Sweden, Denmark, and the other more northern regions, till they found themselves too streightened in the more pleasant climates of the south; which did not happen in all likelihood till many centuries after their migration into Europe. However, it is certain that in the time of Julius Caesar, not only they, but also the northern islands of Britain, Ireland, and even Iceland were inhabited, and made part of the Celtic Gallia. As for the southern islands on the Mediterranean, such as Sicily, Corfica, Majorca, and others, we need not doubt but they were much sooner peopled than those on the northern ocean.

So considerable was the Celtic nation, even in Augustus Caesar's time, though greatly abated of its former grandeur, and shrunk into more narrow limits; that it contained no less than sixty great people, distinguished by the names of cities or districts, according to Strabo. Tacitus says 64^d, but this is nothing to Josephus, who reckoned the number of these nations about 315^e, or to Appianus, who made them amount to 400, and their cities, if the greatest part of them were not really villages, to 1300. But how much greater a figure they must have made before that time, may be guessed by that notable expedition they made into Italy, in the time of Tarquin the elder, that is almost 600 years before Christ, when Bellovesus having penetrated through the Alps with a numerous army, did in a short time invade a great part of Italy, called from them Gallia Cisalpina. For this and their succeeding exploits against that province, and their conquest of its metropolis, we may justly look upon it as part of the Celtic or Gallic territories, tho' we should grant it to have been originally peopled by some other nation, than the descendants of Gomer. But this doth not seem to us to be the real case, for though we have already sufficiently discountenanced the fable of Berosus, who brings Gomer into Italy so soon after the flood; yet it is much more likely that his descendants were the first that peopled it, with the rest of Europe, it being impossible so fine a country should escape them in their progressive migration; than to suppose that either Kittim the son of Javan, or his descendants, were got thither before them. To make this still more probable, we must remind our readers of two things, namely that the Umbrians were by many antient authors esteemed the most antient people in Italy^f. And Pliny in the place last quoted tells us, that when the Heturians entred that country, and made war against the Umbrians, they destroyed 300 of their cities; which proves that they must have been there a considerable time. Our next observation is, that the Umbrians are affirmed by other antient historians to have been the descendants of the Gauls or Celtes^g. And if it be so, it will be more reasonable to believe that these Gauls or Umbrians had already passed the Alps, and settled themselves in Italy, long before Saturn's time, since we find that he made no scruple to go and take refuge amongst them, and was courteously received by them; than to imagine that the country was inhabited by the sons of Javan, or, as others pretend, that the Arcadians, their supposed descendants, could come thither so early by sea; they who are only famous for their pastoral life, and consequently so unacquainted with navigation (C). If ever therefore either of these did possess doth agree in placing them in the northern provinces of Asia (5), where we may have occasion to visit them again in the sequel of this history, as well as the Sacks, another branch of the Celtes, whom Strabo (6) places a little farther westward in Cappadocia along the south coast of the Euxine sea.

(C) We need not observe further to our readers, how fond the Arcadians were of vaunting their antiquity above all other nations, and how much they valued themselves for their assumed name of Aberigines every where. - a possess themselves of Italy, as some have conjectured from uncertain etymologies, and some intricate testimonies from antient authors, it is more reasonable to suppose it to have been of later date, and that they drove the greatest part of the Celtes out of it over the Alps; and this may be the reason of their making so many brave attempts to recover it out of their hands.

Plutarch indeed speaking of the Gallie or Celtic nation, tells us that some of them passing over the Ripbean mountains, went and dwelt towards the northern sea, the extreme or the northern parts of Europe, whilst others remained in the south parts, between the Pyrenees and the Alps^a. Where he adds, that having tasted of the wine that came out of Italy, they marched over the Alps, under the conduct of a malecontent, named Arron, and conquered those territories, which had been till then held by the Tuscans. But the name of Celtiberia, by which Spain was antiently known, and that of the Celtic promontory, now Cape Fenestre, or Finister, the utmost verge of Spain, westward, on the one hand, and of Gallia Togata, or Cisal-pina, on the other, including near one third part of Italy^b westward, shews nothing less than their having confined themselves within the limits of those two ridges of mountains (D). It is likely that our author either knew nothing of these Celtic names, or if he did, that he thought the Celtes had been only the invaders of those two provinces, rather than the first inhabitants of them, the contrary of which, we hope, we have shewn by this time to be at least the more probable of the two.

UPON the whole then, the antient territories of the Celtes extended themselves east and west, from the head spring, Ister or Danube, which divided them from the European Sarmatia (E), quite cross Europe into Cape Finister, and the streight of Hercules now Gibraltar, and contained the following provinces, namely Iberia, now Spain and Portugal; Gallia^c or Celtogalatia, now France, with the low countries; Germany as far as the Danube eastward, and Denmark northward; Rhetia, Vindelicia, and Noricum, since Switzerland, Savoy, and Lombardy, and the Gallia Cisalpina, or Togata, containing that part of Italy, now Piedmont, the duchies of Milan, Parma, Mantua, &c. and the republicks of Venice and Genoa, besides the southern and northern Islands of Europe, which we have lately had occasion to mention.

THESE extensive territories, had however been very much curtailed long before Julius Caesar's time, having been reduced within the boundaries of the Alps, and Pyrenean mountains, from east to west; by the Mediterranean on the south; and by the Rhine and British ocean on the north and north-east. In Caesar's time we find it still lessened by all that tract, which lies between Geneva and the Alps, which had been some time before added to the Roman empire, over and above the Gallia Cisalpina lately mentioned, which they had invaded in Tarquinius Priscus's time, and advanced almost as far as the middle of Italy. This Gallia, thus curtailed, was called Comata. Caesar divided it into three nations, namely Belgae, Aquitans and Celtes, or Gauls^d (F). But by this time a great part of the Celtic territories had been dismembered almost of the same import with that of Aberigines or Terrigenæ, out of the same ostentation, we would not venture to affirm, after Peuvron, seeing it is capable of another signification, as we shewed in a former note. We may say in general that the etymons of the various names of Italy are manifestly forced, as Latium from lateo, to be hid, because Saturn sheltered himself there, and Italy from the Greek Æolia or the Arcadian Elatus (7). Upon the whole then, those who will not allow it to have been peopled at first by the Umbrians abovementioned, and these to have been a colony of the Celtes or Gomarians; must be contented to remain in the dark about it.

(D) We could further confirm this, by multitudes of names of cities, towns, rivers, mountains, capes, promontories, &c. both in Spain and Italy, which are to be met with in all the antient geographers, and many of them even extant to this day, all which being plainly of Celtic origin, do shew them to have been given to them by that nation; but we shall refer our readers for them to the authors quoted in the margin (8).

(E) Herodotus says much the same thing, though in other words, when he tells us (9), that the Ister hath its spring in the land of the Celtes, and traversing the European regions, enters obliquely into the borders of Scythia.

(F) Probably from the inhabitants wearing their hair long, contrary to the custom of the Romans. Thus we find also the Gallia Citerior called Togata, from the long robes, and the Uterior or Transalpine Brachata from the breeches which were worn by its inhabitants.

disinherited from it; as Spain, which had passed from the Carthaginians to the Romans; the Gallia Narbonensis, which was become a province of the Roman empire¹, and included all the southern provinces of Gallia along the Mediterranean, from the Pyrenees to the Alps: this last contained at least Gascony, Languedoc, Provence and Dauphine. Nevertheless, these three divisions were far from being all that the Celtes had left in Europe, though Caesar has made the most of them in his account of that war (G). Other divisions of Gallia which were made by Augustus, and other Roman emperors (H), after the conquest of it, will be best seen in the Roman history.

(G) By which distinction it is plain, that he speaks only of the Gallia which he conquered, and not of the whole territories of the Celtic or Gallic nation, which still spread themselves vastly further, at least towards the north; and therefore when he comes to explain himself, and to give the particular names of each people belonging to each of those three nations, it appears that he goes no further than his own conquests (10), so that it should seem as if he had affected to compliment himself with the subduing of a numerous and powerful nation, of which the Celtes, so famous both in Europe and Asia, were but the third part.

It was probably out of the same ostentation that he ranks, for instance, 16 people under the name of Belgæ; namely the Bellovaci, or those who belonged to the city or district of Beauvais; the Suessones those of Soissons; Nervii, now Cambrasiens; Atrebatæ or Atrebi; Ambiani or Amiens; Morini whose capital was Terouana; Menapii, or the Gantines, Antwerpians and Brabantines; Caletes; or those of the district of Caux; Velocætes, now Vexinois; Veromandui, or Veromandis, now St. Quintin; Advaticæ, now not known, and variously guessed at; the Condrasti, Eburones, Caraci, and Panones, concerning which we are also much in the dark. Now it is plain that all this pompous list did take up little more than the north part of France and the Netherlands.

The same may be said of another third, viz. Aquitain, among which he reckons twelve distinct people, making up in all the Gallia Armorica, so named from the Celtic word Armor, which signifies those countries which are upon the sea coast; this province was afterwards called by the Romans Aquitain from its mineral waters (11). And this contained at most the western provinces of France from the river Liguris, now Loire, to the Pyrenees, according to his own account of it in another place (12).

As to the Celtes, to whom Caesar tells us the Romans gave the name of Gauls, their country extended only north and south from the Liguris or Loire to the Sequana or Seine, and east and west at most, from Burgundy to Low Britanny, including the Gallia Lugdunensis, part of which last was already under the Romans. But how short did all these three come of the Celtic territories, when some authors tell us that they extended from the Pyrenees and Alps quite to the Scythians (13)? When another tells us that all the inhabitants on each side the Rhine, were still called Celtes (14)? so that all that were on the other side of that river were out of the boundaries of the Gallia Belgica, and much more so out of those of the other three. Whether or no this Gallia Celtica was so called, and its inhabitants Celtes in Caesar's time by way of excellence above the rest, as the province of Holland is commonly taken for all the seven, and whether or no the other Celtes were unknown to that conqueror, we will not pretend to determine. Only it is plain that the three Gallic provinces which he subdued, one of which only he distinguishes by the Celtic name, were but about one half of the whole nation even in his time.

(H) This may, perhaps be thought a proper place to have spoken of the isles of Great Britain, both as they were first inhabited, and are still in some parts by the Celtes or Gomerians, which last name, as well as the ancient language of that nation, is still preserved amongst them, especially in the north part, of Wales. But as they make so great a figure in ancient history from their being first planted by some colonies of that nation, their history will be better referred to another book, wherein we shall resume that of the western and northern empires according to our first plan of this work.

However it will not be amiss to hint something here concerning the name of Britain, which has been confounded by Camden and others with that of Gomro, as if they had both belonged to the same people; for it is certain that the former is only to be found among the Britains in France, who call themselves Britained, and are as great strangers to the name Gomro, as the Gomeri or Welsh are to that of Britained or Briton. It seems therefore that those antiquaries have too lightly rejected the story of Brutus coming into England and conquering the gigantic inhabitants of it, from which conquest that part was afterwards called Britannia or Britain, which Camden and his followers will have to be derived from Brit painted, and Tain region; because the Britains painted their bodies, and were upon that account called by the Romans Picti or Painted.

It doth not appear at all probable, that if the Britains, who went out of England into France, had been the same with the Gomeri, or ancient inhabitants of Britain, they would have changed their original appellation, in which all the other descendants of Gomer did so pride themselves, for the nickname of Britained or Painted; much less that they should have quite obliterated the former, which was still so carefully preserved by their neighbours. But if the Trojans were themselves a colony of the Gomerians or Welsh, as a modern author seems to have nearly proved (15); and these after the destruction of their city, came under Brutus or Troilus as he is called by Vitus, and by others Brito, and from him they were called Britains, and invaded a considerable part of this Island; it will at once account for the name, and for the great affinity there is between the Gomerians or Welsh, and the Britained or British, which last is objected by the antiquaries against the probability of the first.

It is therefore not only more for the honour of this nation, but also more reasonable to suppose with Sir John Price (16), that these isles were at first peopled by the ancient and warlike Gomerians, than by the conquered and fugitive Trojans; for who can think that they should have been so long unknown to the former as 1000 years after the dispersion; for so long at least it was before the latter can be supposed

- a SEAS of note were the Mediterranean, the western, British, and northern ocean, and the Baltic. Their principal lake in these territories is that of Geneva, which is upwards of twenty miles in length, and about eight in breadth, and by its navigableness enriches both the city of that name, and all the countries about it. To this we may add that of Serviere, in high Dauphine, very remarkable upon another account. It is a good day's journey up to the Alps, and yet has been found to have a communication with another much smaller at 8 or 9 miles distance, and is calculated to stand near half a mile perpendicular lower than the former without being overflowed, or sending out more water than a very inconsiderable stream, scarce sufficient to turn a mill. Chief mountains are the Pyrenees and Alps, otherwise called
- b Apenine, which are of very great length, and of such prodigious height, that they are always covered with snow of incredible hardness. The latter were supposed by Livy and others to have been called Apenine from Hannibal Peninus, but much more probably from the old Celtic word Pen, a head, by reason of the exceeding height and whiteness of them. So that Apenine may be only a contraction of A Pen Gwin, white heads, as the word Alps may be derived from the Celtic Alp or Alb, white.

- THE chief rivers are the Ister, which runs into Scythia, and empties itself into the Euxine or Black Sea. The Rhine, which springs from the mountains of Switzerland, and runs through Germany and Holland into the British sea. The Seine, Loyre, and Garonne, of which we have lately had an occasion to speak, as they divided the
- c Gallia Celtica, Belgica, and Aquitana from each other. The Durius now Duero, which descends from the mountains of Siarro in Hispania, into the Atlantic ocean at Oporto. The Tagus or Tajo, which crosses great part of Spain and Portugal, and falls into the same ocean below Olyfipon or Lisbon. The Anas now Guadiana; the Batis or Tartessus now Guadalquivir; these two empty themselves in the gulph of Cadix. The Iber now Ebro which descends from the same mountains of Sierra, with the Durius, but taking a contrary course from it, runs eastward into the Mediterranean, and empties itself into the gulph of Valencia. The Rhodanus or Rhofne, which hath its spring from the mountains of Switzerland, but descends a contrary way, and crossing
- d the lake of Geneva, runs through the fourth part of France, and empties itself into the Mediterranean about Marfeilles; the Padus or Po, and Adesis now Adige, which descend the former from Piedmont, and the latter from Switzerland, and fall at a small distance from each other into the gulph of Venice. Those of Italy and of the European islands will be seen in another chapter.

- WE shall only add that the greatest part of the names of these and of other smaller rivers are certainly of Celtic extraction, and agreeable to their properties. Thus Garunna from Garw, rough, expresses its great rapidity. Rhodanus from Rhedog to run swiftly, implies its swift course. Arar now Saone is so called from its slowness, its descent into the Rhofne being scarce perceptible. Durius or Duiro from Dour, water or river, whence the names of a great many cities and towns situate near the water-side ended in
- c Duro and Durum. Thus likewise the names of counties and districts which end in Tan, or Tain, and in the Latin Tania, as Aquitain, Britain, Lusitania, &c. are formed from supposed to have come from Troy hither, by which time the others had spread themselves all over Europe. And is it not also more probable that these gave it the ancient name of Albion, which in their language signifies white, from the whiteness in which the Cliffs of Dover appeared clad from the other side of the water, than that it received it from Albion the brother of Bergion, the son of Nep-tune?

We may add, that Berosus and those who have followed his steps (17) have given us a list of 20 kings of the Celtes who reigned in Gaul, and the greater part of them also over the Gomros on this side the water, before Brutus. The reader will see by the following list of their names how several Cantons of Gaul might probably receive theirs from them, as Longobards from Bardus and Lengus, their fifth and sixth monarchs. Gallia Narbonensis from Narbo; Lugdunensis from Lugdus; the Belgic from Belgius; the Allobroges from Allobrox, &c. they run as follow: 1. Samobes, by others called Dis and Diselta. 2. Magus. 3. Saron. 4. Druis. 5. Bardus. 6. Lengus. 7. Lucus. 8. Celtes. 9. Galates. 10. Narbo. 11. Lugdus. 12. Belgius. 13. Tafius. 14. Allobrox. 15. Oegppus. 16. Paris. 17. Olbius. 18. Galates. 19. Namnes. 20. Franicus.

It is true, this list seems rather to be that of the princes of several cantons of the Celtes, than a regular succession of the kings of the whole nation, which it is not likely was governed by one sole monarch. Nevertheless as they reigned either in Gaul or Britain, long before this Brutus (suppose him to have come from Troy, as will be further seen when we come to that part of our history) the most that can be said of him is, that he invaded and took a great part of the latter from the Gomros, its original inhabitants, who were thereby forced to retire further westward, where they have continued ever since.

the Celtic Tan and Stan, a region ^a, and imply the country of waters, of the Britons, ^a and Lusians, which last were a Celtic people from whom came the Portuguese. We omit a multitude of cities, towns, mountains, and other ancient names which are palpably of the same extraction, concerning which the curious may consult the authors above named.

NATURAL and artificial rarities in so spacious a field would take up too much room in this history, and are so well known to the curious, that we think they may be safely omitted, those only excepted as have some immediate relation with some remarkable facts as shall fall in the course of this history, when we come to resume it in another chapter. One thing only we beg leave to mention here, namely the Littus Lapideum, ^b otherwise the Campus Lapideus, or stony shore or field of above a mile in length upon the coasts of the Gallia Narbonensis or Languedoc, where Hercules is said to have fought the giant Albion, the son of Neptune; which place is still called by the inhabitants Les Craux, from the multitude and largeness of stones with which it is covered; that word being derived from the Celtic Craig or Craic, which signifies rocks or stones*.

S E C T. III.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, learning and trade of the ancient CELTES.

THO' the Celtes exceed all other nations in antiquity, their descent being, as we have seen, from Gomer the eldest son of Japhet, the eldest son of Noah, in which respect ^c they outgo the Egyptians, Phrygians, and even the Scythians; yet it must be owned that our knowledge of their government comes vastly short of the two first, whether it be owing to the want of records, or rather to the slowness and length of their migrations into Europe, where we find them first settled into a spacious and regular polity. A late antiquary ^a hath indeed attempted to prove that upon the dispersion of Babel, Gomer or his immediate descendants did presently enter into Armenia, thence into Phrygia and Cappadocia, till at length, under the conduct of Aemon, and afterwards of his son Uranus, two warlike princes, they spread themselves further, and sent their colonies from lesser Asia even into Spain. Chronus or Saturn, Jupiter and Mercury, or Teutat, were their three next successors; and it was this last, according to our author, ^d who settled the Gomerians then called Titans in Europe into a regular government, gave them laws, and there they changed their name into that of Celtes and Gauls. According to this system then this Gomerian polity must have begun about the time of Terah, Abraham's father, or even of Nabor's, if Mancus be admitted to have been, as some historians think, the father of Aemon; tho' Saturn was the first who took the title of king.

ALL this our author brings proof for, from ancient authors, which would carry us too far to repeat; we shall find a proper place for the history of those princes, since deified by a great part of the world; for the present we shall only observe, that nothing is more likely than that their government was originally monarchical as ^e well as that of other nations, since we find it in the same form even in Cæsar's time, when they had spread themselves all over Europe. Only by that time they had so far altered the form of their government, if we may believe that historian, that instead of one monarch they were divided into several petty kingdoms, and did not yield the absolute command to any one, except when their territories were threatened with invasion from a common enemy ^b. This is further confirmed in part by another historian ^c, who tells us that the Cimmerians, or northern Gomerians, being invaded by the Scythians their neighbours, called a council of their kings and people, whose disagreement about defending or abandoning their country occasioned the loss of it, as well as the lives of those who resolved upon opposing the invaders. ^f It is indeed hard to conceive how so warlike a nation, extended over such large a tracks of ground, and in such a difference of climates, should continue long under one head, without splitting itself into several kingdoms; so that it is rather a wonder to find that they preserved so much of their ancient affinity and government in Cæsar's time, as to unite themselves under one head in cases of common danger.

WHAT their laws were, whether reduced into a body, or depending upon the will of their sovereign, we cannot find. We are indeed told by the antiquary above-mentioned, that Mercury did polish and give them laws, and by others ⁴, that Samothres, otherwise called Dis, and Diselta, a man of singular learning and wisdom, and the first founder of the Celtic monarchy, gave them a body of laws and discipline which he wrote in the Hebrew tongue, but in the Phœnician character; and b that the Greeks did borrow the latter from the Celtes when they re-entered Asia. The Their govern- mistake of these authors in affirming that he wrote in Hebrew, and retained that ment. tongue above all other nations, the descendants of Heber excepted, may be easily accounted for from the great affinity there is between the Celtic and it, of which we shall have further occasion to speak; and as to his using the Phœnician character, there is nothing extraordinary in it, since it was the most universal at that time, and is now allowed to have been the same with the Samaritan or ancient Hebrew. The reader may see what has been heretofore said upon that subject †. It is added that he was therefore called the Saturn of the Celtes, and that their learned men, such as their divines and philosophers, were called from him Samothrei. But if ever he wrote c such a body of laws, it is certain we have nothing left of them, neither can we find any footsteps of either his or any other's in any author, but what are too recent to be mentioned here. However as they very much deviated from the simplicity of their brethren the Scythians in their manner of life, they can no more be supposed to have been without some for the preservation of property, than their warlike genius could be without martial discipline.

THE Curetes of whom we shall speak by and by, were the interpreters of their laws, judged all causes whether criminal or civil, and their sentence was reckoned so sacred, that whoever refused to abide by it, was by them excluded from assisting at their sacred rites; after which no man dared converse with him, so that d this punishment was reckoned the most severe of all, even than death itself.

THEIR religion was very like that of the Scythians. They worshipped the same Religion. gods, as Jupiter under the name of Taran, which in the Celtic signifies thunder. Mercury, whom some authors call Heus or Hesus, probably from the Celtic Huad, which signifies a dog, and might be the Anubis latrans of the Egyptians. But Mars was held in the greatest veneration by the warlike, and Mercury by the trading part, as we shall shew in its proper place. It will not however be easy to reconcile the greatest part of these Celtic deities with what Pezron says of them with great probability, that they were originally kings of that nation, as we shall shew in the sequel. All that need be said at present on that head, is, that the Celtes after e having dwindled into idolatry, like other nations, did like them deify their kings and heroes after their deaths. Thus we find the Cretans at once worshipping of Jupiter, and shewing his sepulchre at the city of Gnoſſus; for which reason, whilst Calimachus calls them liars, for forging a tomb for that god, others, especially the christian fathers, justly blamed their folly for adoring him as a deity, whom they acknowledged to be interred among them. How these gods, or at least their names came to be adopted by other nations, will be shewn when we come to speak of the fabulous and heroic times; and it would be labour lost to inquire what gods or religion the Celtes had before they deified their Kings; but since then, we find them very much addicted to all kind of superstition, divination, astrology, magic, and f other kinds of witcheries. The care of religion was immediately under their Curetes, since known by the name of Druids and Bards (A). These were, as Cæsar

(1) The Curetes were among the Titanic Celtes whilst the Druids were afterwards among the Gauls, and were had in the same reverence and esteem, inasmuch that the education of Jupiter was committed to them, and Cres one of his sons was of their society. It is not easy to trace their origin; and Strabo, exact and learned as he was, doth not seem to be satisfied with all he has said about them (1). Their name of Curetes seems derived from the Celtic word Curo, to strike or beat one thing against another, whence the Greek κρου by the transposition of a letter, which signifies the same. And this seems to have tells us *, the performers of sacrifices, and all religious rites, and expounders of religion to the people. They also instructed youth in all kind of learning, such as philosophy, astronomy, astrology, the immortality, and transmigration of the soul from one body into another, which was both an incitement to virtue, and an antidote against the fear of death. These they taught their disciples by word of mouth, esteeming them to be too sacred to be committed to writing.

OTHER more common subjects, such as their hymns to their gods, the exploits of their princes and generals, and their exhortations to the people in time of war, and especially before a battle, all these were written in elegant verse, and recited, or rather sung by them, upon all proper occasions. Diodorus, speaking of the Celtes, tells us farther, that these poets used to accompany their songs with instrumental musick, such as that of organs, harps, and the like, and that they were had in such veneration, that if an army was engaged in battle, if one of these poets or Bards appeared, both sides immediately ceased fighting, so that their fury gave way to wisdom, and Mars to the muses. But the true reason was, that they were universally believed to be prophets, as well as poets, so that it was thought dangerous as well as injurious to disobey what they supposed came from their gods.

THESE prophetick philosophers kept academies, which were resorted unto by a great number not only of their own youth, but even of other countries, inso-much that Aristotle says, that their philosophy passed from thence into Greece, and not from Greece thither †. Other authors add many things in praise of their virtue and morality ‡. But a Roman historian § makes no scruple to call their religion an impious one, and as such to have been forbidden by Augustus, and abolished by Claudius. Lucan is no less severe against them; and this might indeed be partly attributed to the hatred which the Romans bore to them; yet it must be owned that they had some barbarous customs, such as sacrificing human victims to their gods, as more acceptable to them than those of any other animals †. And Diodorus tells us of another inhuman custom they used in their divinations, especially in great matters, which was done by killing a man with a scimeter, to draw their augury from the running of his blood from his mangled limbs.

BUT though they resembled the Scythians in some of their barbarous customs and warlike temper, yet they were far enough from imitating them in their pastoral life. They built large cities where-ever they came, they fortified and adorned them with spacious walls, towers, and sumptuous edifices. They were upbraided by the Romans with following the oldest law in the world, which ever leaves to the strongest what the weaker cannot defend ‡. And indeed so greedy were they of conquest and plunder, as well as of keeping what they had gained, that they ever fought with such strength and fury, that nothing could withstand them. And so sudden and violent were their onsets, that like fire and storm, they drove all before them. They seldom gave quarter to their enemies, which made them be looked upon as a cruel people †. As for the prisoners they took in war, they sold them to have been given them on account of their striking their shields with their javelins, which an ancient author tells us they did (2), when they kept young Jupiter concealed in a cave, that his jealous father might not hear his cries. But whether they went heretofore to the wars, and encouraged the combatants with this their noise and dances, or were exempt from that duty like the Druids, as some pretend (3), we will not determine. If the Druids were exempt from that duty, they must have been different from the Bards, who though in all other respects of the same order with them, yet were obliged to go and encourage the people to war with their poetic and musical compositions. Upon this account it is that these Bards are affirmed by Cæsar (4) to have been the inventors of musick and poetry, or rather to have received it from their king Bardus, whom Berosus affirms to have reigned over the Gauls and Britains, or Cymbri (5), from whom they were called Bards.

The Druids some think were so called from Berosus's Druys, the 4th king of the Celtes, a man of uncommon learning for those days (6); but we think with Camden that Pliny's is far more probable, who thinks that they were so called from the Celtic and Gresh word Dros or Drofs, an oak (7), which tree was held so sacred by the Celtes as well as Scythians, that they performed most of their religious rites near some large oaks, if not in oak groves, and offered no sacrifice without some leaves of that tree. As we shall shew more fully in their history.

- ^a their great men, who made slaves of them, and appointed and the most lightly of them for their retinue. Instead of the skins of their enemies worn as ornaments by the more savage Scythians, these chose to adorn themselves with their spoil. They wore gold rings and bracelets, and chains about their necks; and were very neat in their dress, as we have had occasion to hint a little higher.

- We have also observed that they were expert horsemen, so that considering their martial genius and discipline, their cavalry seldom failed of doing execution. They were no less famed for their armed chariots, and their dexterity in managing of them. In other respects we do not find that they had any thing but what was common to almost all other nations, and so shall not dwell longer upon them. Their other arms were bows and arrows, darts, javelins, and scimitars, daggers and bayonets; they had likewise shields and head-pieces, and as they were divided into petty kingdoms or tribes, they divided their armies in the same manner in time of war, that the valour and merit of every tribe might be the better known, and that every man might be thereby spurred to advance the honour of that to which he belonged. As a further encouragement to their bravery, it was the business of their poets to record the actions of those that signalized themselves in songs and stories which were afterwards sung at their games, and other solemnities, as well as when they went to engage an enemy; and this had such an effect upon them, that they chose to die with their weapons in their hands, rather than to be made prisoners. It was also their custom, before a battle, to observe the moon, and, if possible, to avoid fighting till after the full of it. And this was not so much with a view of having a longer time for execution, as from a superstitious belief that it would prove more fortunate; in this they were afterwards imitated by the Lacedæmonians. They used likewise like other nations, to consult their priests or augurs upon all emergencies, but especially before an engagement, and if the augury proved good, these priests used to march before them with songs and dances, and musical instruments, till the onset was begun; but if their augury proved otherwise they gave such heed to it that nothing but absolute necessity could prevail on them to fight.
- ^b Their martial laws used likewise to be written in verse, and set to some warlike tunes, which they were obliged to learn by heart, and to sing upon proper occasions, so that their very youth were versed in them, and knew the theory of military discipline, long before they were of age to bear arms. They seem in a word, to have omitted nothing that could inspire them with a desire of conquest and glory, and to cherish the warlike temper for which they have been so famous in history. How much their valour was dreaded both by the Romans and other European nations, will be seen in another chapter, and we shall shew in the sequel of this, that they signalized themselves no less in Asia both before and since their migration into Europe.

- ^c THEIR language, which we have already had occasion to speak of, was the old Celtic, or Gomerian, preserved still by the Welsh. This has been so fully proved by numberless antiquarians, that we shall content ourselves with referring our readers to them, without entering into so spacious and intricate a field^m. Those who are acquainted with it must readily own, that no tongue, either ancient or modern, carries greater marks of antiquity than this Gomroeg; and that though it must be supposed to have been very much blended with the Greek, Latin, and German in process of time, yet it retains still so much of the admirable simplicity of the Hebrew grammar and construction (B), that one would be apt to conclude them only dialects of the

(B) With respect to the Hebrew, we refer our readers to what has been said of it in the history of the Jews * and it would be endless to enumerate in how many instances the Gomroeg, now the Welsh, doth imitate it. We shall however give our reader some few instances of it by way of specimen, and refer him for further particulars to the authors quoted above.

1. The Gomroeg is so near akin to the Hebrew, that an antiquary (8) who was master of both, has given the learned world a specimen of a considerable number of phrases out of the Old Testament, which are so alike in both, that they seem to have been originally the same, and their difference to be only owing to distance of time and place, and other such like causes, by which a language is naturally altered. It distinguishes cases like the Hebrew, not by different terminations as the Greek and Latin, but by prepositional articles; 3. It often changes the radical or primitive letter of a word according to the preposition, adverb, pronoun, or article, it is affixed to, giving it sometimes a harder, sometimes a softer sound, more for the sake of melody than grammar. 4. It hath its aspirations and gutturals, which

same tongue from which the other languages above named, and even the Arabic, seem to have emanated (C). The only wonder in all this would be, that the Gomerians should be the only people that have preserved their own in such purity, whilst the Jews, and all other nations have suffered theirs to be corrupted, and blended with those of their neighbours, and especially of their conquerors. But may not this be owing to the formers having still preserved themselves from foreign conquests and bondage, chusing rather to leave their fertile abodes and retire into countries stronger by nature, and less tempting to a conqueror, than to submit to their yoke? and as this at once inspired them with an over-weening value of themselves, and natural hatred to other nations might not this be an effectual means of preserving them from suffering their original tongue to be corrupted by those of their neighbours.

Poetry.

It were labour lost to endeavour to find what their ancient poetry was, in which their Curetes and Druids recorded all the exploits of their heroes; and our only reason for mentioning it here, is to observe that these poets were their only historians, and their tongue abounded, like the Hebrew and other eastern ones, with bold allegories, and figures as we observed in the last note: this might probably enough administer matter sufficient for that variety of wonderful events, with which the fabulous and heroic times have been since stuffed, as we shall have further occasion to shew when we come to speak upon that head. As to their musick, of which we have already hinted something under a former head, they are supposed to have brought it from Crete, where having found an iron mine on mount Ila, they began to forge themselves tools, then arms and shields, and armour; hence sprang not only the trades of smiths and armourers, but even the first notions of music are said to have been taken from the sound of their hammers, the clattering of their armour, and the beating of their shields, especially when the Curetes were nursing up young Jupiter, of which we have spoken already". How far they have improved these, and what other arts they cultivated, must be only guessed at from their manner of life; for since their warlike disposition did neither hinder them from building cities and magnificent edifices, nor from affecting some grandeur in their equipages, dress, and household furniture, we may reasonably suppose all those arts and manufactures that tended to it, to have been likewise encouraged amongst them. To these we may add agriculture and feeding of numerous herds, which they committed to the care of their slaves and inferior sort of people. Whatever luxury they might be guilty of with respect to dress and equipage, we do not find that they used any in their food. Pulse of all sorts was their common diet, especially that which the Greeks called Elimos, which we take to be the same with Lim, which in the Celtic signifies millet, and is a very nourishing grain. Milk was also a considerable part of their diet; and as to flesh they eat very sparingly of it, if we except that of swine, called in the Celtic Souckh, whence perhaps the Greek Συκα or Σικα, and the word Sick, used by the country people, in several parts of Europe to call their hogs.

which are more or less dense like those of the Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, &c. 5. In verbs it retains the root in the third person singular, as Car, he loves; Cari thou lovest; Cara, I love; Carwn, we love; Caruch, ye love; Carant, they love.

With respect to its genius, it is strong, masculine, very poetical and figurative, and though, perhaps more thro' corruption than primitive orthography, it seems harsh in the pronunciation by reason of its vast number of consonants, yet when put into verse, and spoken with its genuine pronunciation, it is, like the Hebrew, very soft, melodious, and musical.

(C) This is indeed what a learned antiquary has endeavoured to prove from a great number of etymologies, and confirmed also by historical facts (9) But we dare not be so sanguine as he, in so delicate a point, lest we should be thought to write rather the panegyric than the history of that ancient nation and tongue.

Here however the reader may find the most rational account for that surprizing affinity which the learned have found between the Celtic, Greek, Latin, Arabic, Persian, High-Dutch, and some other European and Asiatic languages, which had never till then been tolerably accounted for by any other author, nor indeed could be, without having recourse to ancient history; in which it seems at least highly probable that all these were tribes or colonies of the Gomerians, and used the same language, till in process of time being parted from their brethren, and intermixed with Scythians and other nations, it split it self into that variety of dialects in which we find it, without losing the greatest part of their primitive words, which are still the same in them, as may be seen by the vocabulary at the end of our author's work, and by the history itself.

CONCERNING

- a CONCERNING their ancient traffick we have not much to say, only when Mercury the son of Jupiter had obtained the empire of the west, that is of Europe, as we shall see in its proper place; he is said to have polished them very much both by his laws and learning, and by the great improvements he made in trade and commerce (D), of which, after he was deified, he was worshipped as the patron and protector, and had every where statues reared to his honour, as Cæsar himself assures us †. Thus from a wandering, conquering, ravaging and barbarous people, like the Scythians their younger brethren; he so polished them by degrees, as to vie in most respects with all other nations in learning and politeness, as will further appear by what we have to say of that deity under the next section.

(D) Hence the name of Mercury seems to have been given him from the Celtic Mere, merchandise, and Ur, a man, as if he had been called by way of excellence the man, master, or founder of merchandising. That of Tentat, which he is supposed to have taken at his going or returning from Egypt seems likewise to be of Celtic extraction, Tent Tat, signifying the father of the people, such as he was upon this and many other accounts.

c The Chronology and History of the GOMERIANS or CELTES.

- IT must be owned that all that has been said concerning the time of their migration from Asia, as well as of their famous exploits in that part of the world, is built upon meer conjecture, not to say fancy; and that it would be a mad attempt to settle it upon a better foot. We are as much in the dark about these as we are about the Scythians, nothing being more confused than the history of those two nations. Sir Isaac Newton * thinks that these two nations had already spread themselves over lesser Asia and Europe, long before the year of the flood, 1220, that is about the latter end of the Israelitish judges. But before that time they had signalized themselves in Asia, under the names of Sacks and Titans, and had a succession of kings. The first of which was, according to the author whom we chuse to follow, cotemporary, if not before Terab, the father of Abraham, that is about the year of the flood 1070, according to the chronology of this history. The person we mean is the learned Pezron b, who has taken greater pains, and made more considerable discoveries concerning the Celtic nation, than any historian we know of. It were indeed to be wished he had built less upon conjectures, and yet we hope our readers will find that they are not without some solid testimonies from antiquity, and that his history of the Celtes carries a greater share of probability than any that has been attempted concerning this ancient and populous nation, under their various denominations, conquests, and settlements. We shall upon the close of this history make some kind of apology for preferring his notion, that, Uranus for instance, Saturn as well as their predecessors and successors, were Celtic princes reigning in Asia, about the times of Terab and Abraham, to that of bishop Cumberland, who supposes his Sanchoiabo's Chronus, or Saturn to have been Ham the Son of Noah and so on; because it will we hope fully appear by that time, how much more evidence his system carries from ancient writers, than that of our learned prelate. Here the reader will find a probable history at least of those heroes, and of the Celtic and Titanic nations f divested as much as possible from the fable, and that there is at least more reason to believe that there really were such men and nations, than to reject them as altogether fabulous.

BUT in order to open a way to their history, it will be necessary to mention what is previous to it, with respect to the migrations, and exploits of the Gomerians in the several parts of Asia, before their spreading into Europe. For though they are mentioned by ancient geographers and historians under other names, such as Titans, Sacks, Parthians, Celtes, and the like, yet it is plain they were really the same people, and the descendants of Gomer, and that these names had been given them by other nations, as we have hinted heretofore, whilst they not only preserved still that of their progenitor, but were even known by it to those very authors, a who mention them under their other names (A).

THUS then from Phrygia, the place of their first settlement, we find them under the name of Comarians, fixed along the river Jaxartes, beyond the Caspian sea, quite up to the province of Bactria^c; these Ptolemy expressly calls Sacks, Comarians and Curetes^d his words are, The Saccæ which inhabited along the Jaxartes, were the Comarians and Curetes. And as we find the Saccæ in the more fruitful plains of Armenia, Cappadocia, Gallagrecia, and all those provinces which lie along the Euxine sea, we may hence frame a kind of route how they spread themselves through all that part of Asia, 'till their course was stopt, (not by the Bactrians, who seem rather to have been of Celtic extraction, and are accordingly called Chomarians by Ptolemy† who makes Chomar to have been their metropolis,) but by the Sogdians, who being of Scythian race, had probably possessed themselves of that province long before the Chomarians reached that of Bactria, and had by that time spread themselves much farther northwards from Armenia, either for want of room, or through discord. Some of them probably passed over the vast mountains which lie on the south of the Margiana, and entered into the country of the Median Ariti, where having fixed themselves by main force, and being as it were divided from, or exiled by the rest, they were called in scorn Partians, which signifies in the Celtic, parted or divided from. This is affirmed by Jyslin^e, only with this difference, that he makes them of Scythian extraction, according to the vulgar error of the ancient Greek writers, who, as Strabo tells us^f, called all the nations towards the north of Asia, Scythians, and Celto-Scythians. This origin of the Partians is likewise confirmed by several other authors^g, though it doth not appear to us that the Persians were descended from them†.

THAT the Saccæ possessed themselves of at least the best part of Armenia, is expressly affirmed by Strabo^h, who adds, that they called that country by their name

^c MELA. lib. i. c. 2. ^d Geogr. lib. vi. c. 13. † Id. ibid. lib. ii. ^e lib. xii. c. i. ^f Geogr. l. xi. ^g Vid. ARRIAN. in Parthic. ap. PHOC. STEPH. BYZ. in voc. Parthy. JORDAN. de Reb. Getic. cap. 6. apud PEZRON. c. iv. † Vid. sup. vol. II. p. 26. and 57. ^h lib. xi.

(A) This really holds true with respect to all except the name of Titans, with this difference however, that they sometimes confounded them with the Scythians, as has been observed more than once, which was doubtless owing to their affinity in blood, manners, language, and such like, as well as to their regular progress, and spreading to the right and left of north Asia and Europe, so that there is no other way to distinguish them but by those countries through which each of them took its way towards Europe. Accordingly we find Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny and others speaking of them in those respective provinces of Asia under the name of Sacks, Celts, Celto-Scythians, Curetes, Comarians Chomarians, and Cymbrians. Thus Ptolemy tells us, that the Saccæ, who lived near the river Jaxartes were of the Curetes and Comarians (1). Pliny likewise seems to mean the same thing, when speaking of them, he says (2), Beyond are the Scythians, whom the Persians did in general call Sacks, from their next neighbouring nation, à proxima gente, &c. which nation could be no other than the Celtic, because, as Ptolemy observes elsewhere, the Chomarians in Bactriana, were a more civilized sort than the Scythians, had a capital city called by their name Chomer (3), whereas the Scythians were known to live in the open fields at large, as we shall shew in the sequel.

Thus then it is plain, that bating their confounding them with the Scythians, they were not ignorant of their primitive name of Gomerians, though they used in the main other appellatives by which they were better known to the world, which is what we observed in the first section had been done by Herodotus in his account of the Scythians. But as to the name of Titans, as it was both less known to the ancients, and consequently with less probability applicable to the Celtic nation, our author has taken a different way to prove it, but which we own is not altogether so clear as could be wished.

He first supposes that the Gomerians, or, as they had been since opprobriously called Sacks, or Robbers, exchanged that odious name for the more pompous one of Titans, which, as we have shewn, is of Celtic extraction, upon their removing farther into upper Phrygia. Here it seems they built a city which they called Acmona, from Acmon the son of Mannus the founder of it (4). Acmon being by the Greeks reckoned the father of Uranus, who is therefore called Acmonides; our author supposes him to be the same with Sanchoniatho's Eliou, or most high, because this first is there affirmed to be the father of Uranus; from whom he deduces his genealogy of the other Celtic Princes.

These conjectures he endeavours to corroborate with that passage in Judith, where the Titans are mentioned as synonymous with the Giants (5); and from another in Isaiab (6), which the septuagint renders Γίγαντες or ἀφ' αὐτῶν τῆς γῆς, the Giants who subdued the earth, which he thinks can be applied to none so well as to the Titans or Celts; but the misfortune is, that the Hebrews doth by no means support that version, any more than that version doth the universal rule of the Celtic over all other nations; so that the most that can be inferred from all this is, that the fable of the Titans seems to have been founded upon some ancient facts, and that these since deified heroes, being intermingled with themselves for their wonderful exploits in the many regions of which the Gomerians had made themselves

- a Saccacena (B). It likewise appears from the same author that they passed over the mountains, bordering upon Armenia, and penetrated into Cappadocia, that part especially which is upon the coasts of the *Euxine sea*¹. This expedition seems to have been made under the conduct of Acmon, the father of Uranus, and of his brother Dæas, where they gave their name the former to the capital city, called Acmonia, in which we are also told², was a grove dedicated to him after he was deified, and the latter to the spacious Dæan plains near the city of Themiscyra, along the river Thermodon (C). From the Euxine sea their progress towards the Palus Meotis is very obvious; and here we find their name given to the Cymbriam or Cimmerian Bosphorus, from which they needed but to cross the Tbanais, to enter into their European territories.

b We must now leave those colonies extending themselves toward Europe, and return into Pbrygia, whether Acmon is supposed either to have returned from *Cappadocia*³, or, which is more likely, where he continued after his ancestors. For here we find the like monuments both of him and his brother, namely another city called Acmona, and said by the same authors to have been founded by him; likewise another grove dedicated to him, and some spacious plains called Dæantes, from his brother *Dæas*⁴ (D). From which one may reasonably infer that he both reigned, and was afterwards worshipped here likewise; and consequently that it were absurd to suppose him a fabulous person, any more than his descendants Uranus, Saturn, and the rest of the Titan princes. And as for the Celtes being descended from them, we find it expressly affirmed by a very ancient author⁵, who was no friend to the Celtes or Gauls, and yet says that the κίχτοι were ἐκγονοὶ Τῑτάνος the descendants or late posterity of the Titans. If it be objected that the Druids in Cæsar's time did boast themselves to be descended from Dis or *Pluto*⁶, it will appear that he also was a Titan prince, who had the western part of the empire, that is Europe, to his share, whilst Jupiter kept the eastern part to himself; so that both Cæsar and Callimachus agree in the main point. Pluto being the great grandson of Acmon, the first prince of note of the Gomerian or Titanic race.

masters under the names of Sacks, since absorbed into that of Titans; it is much more probable that they were princes of that nation, than that they were altogether fabulous, or that they were of any other nation than the Celtic, especially considering that the greatest part of their names and surnames which were still retained by the Greeks and Latins, are plainly of Celtic extraction, as we shall see when we come to their history. To this may be added the tradition of the Cretans concerning the Titans and Curetes being cotemporary in that island, the sepulchre of Rhea, Saturn's sister and wife being shewn there, and their boasting that several of the gods were born there, all which have been preserved to us by Diodorus Siculus (7).

(B) Or rather perhaps Saccastena, as we find it more properly spelt by another author (8); from the Celtic Stan, which signifies region, and is still preserved by the Persian, as in Indostan, Chusistan, &c. which perhaps the Celtes softened afterwards into Tan, as in Aquitain the country of water, Britania the country of the Brits (9).

(C) That these two were brothers, our author (10) not only proves from the testimony of the authors above quoted, but adds that Themiscyra means no more than the city of Themis. Kir in the Hebrew and Ker in the Celtic signifying a city. As for Themis, whom the Greeks made goddess of justice he supposes her to have been the grand-daughter of Acmon, and a famous magician or prophetess; and that Dæas Acmon's brother was of the same profession; his name in the Celtic signifying a diviner from Dæa or Duoer, God.

(D) If any such monuments were really in two different provinces of Asia; the one in Pbrygia, as the authors above quoted expressly affirm, and the others in some other parts, for they do not name Cappadocia, it will only follow, that both had been under Acmon's government, and there will be no necessity to send him into the one, to bring him back into the other, since his colonies could easily achieve the conquest of the latter, and leave those monuments in honour of their prince.

But what induces our author to the contrary opinion is, that the name of Sacks is from that time wholly absorbed into that of Titans, from which he concludes that that warlike prince, at his return into Pbrygia, exchanged that reproachful name into the more glorious one of Titans; which either signifies sons of the sun, or of the earth, as we shewed else where †, whilst that of Sacks stuck only to those who went and dwelt in the more northern provinces of Asia. It is not easy to say when or why they assumed the name of Titans; but if we suppose with our author that word to signify sons of the earth which answers to that of Aborigines, it will be more reasonable to suppose that they began to aim at it much earlier in Pbrygia, because it was the original settlement of their progenitors, Gomer and his descendants, whilst those colonies, who were forced to leave their province, and to go and settle by main force into other provinces already inhabited, must be contented to quit it for that of Sacks or Robbers, which the losers gave to them.

† Vol. II. p. 243. Note B.

THIS prince was the son of Mon, Man, or Maneus, his name Acmon, or perhaps rather Ack-man, seems to imply as much. He is supposed by our author to have lived in the days of Terab, the father of Abrabam. So that including Maneus in the list, we have a succession of six Titan princes, whose government according to him, lasted about three hundred years[†], and are as follows,

Man or Maneus	Saturn
Acmon	Jupiter
Uranus .	Tbeutus .

WE have already mentioned how impossible it is to adjust the chronology of these princes, yet has our author at the latter end of his 12th chapter, found means to give some light to it out of some ancient writers; we shall give what he has there said in his own words.

I HAVE taken no small pains to find out what ancient authors have said on this head. I find that Jupiter began to reign when Isaac had attained the one half of his age, or some years after Abrabam's death, and this is what may be made out from ancient historians, such as Evemerus, Ennius, Thallus, and some others, who all agreed that Jupiter reigned in the time of Belus the first king of Assyria; which agrees exactly with the opinion of those who made the verses of the Sybits, which expressly say that Saturn with his Brother Titan and Japhet began to reign with the 10th generation after the deluge. They were those whom people called the children of heaven and earth, because they excelled all others in vertue and strength. Now the tenth generation from the deluge exactly answers to the time of Abrabam. Saturn must therefore begin his reign many years before Abrabam had been in the land of Canaan. Nay, his father Uranus must already have been very potent, both in Asia and also in Europe, in the time of Terab, Abrabam's father. All this seems plain to me upon examining those monuments of antiquity, which are still extant. But the chronicle of Eusebius which has been regulated from ancient histories, and especially those which related to the island of Crete, leaves us no room to doubt of this matter. We are there informed that about these times, Cres, one of the Curetes, who took care of Jupiter's education, reigned in Crete, and that the island received its name from him. Euse- bius by the words κατα τὴν ἡλικίαν, about these times, points out the years between the 50th and 60th of Abrabam's life. Now Jupiter, according to his calculation, must have begun his reign about the latter end of Terab's life. But I have many reasons to believe that Eusebius was mistaken in making him of such old standing; and that this Titan Prince ought not to be placed higher than the middle, that is, the 98th year of Isaac's Life, and that he could not precede Moses above 300 years.

THUS far Pezron; according to whose account it might be easy to conjecture the times when Jupiter's predecessors reigned, by tracing so many generations back; especially because we have the length of Jupiter's life recorded, as we shall see in its proper place, to have been 120 years, which, if it come short of the number of his contemporary Isaac, may be attributed to his living a quite different life from him.

Maneus.

WE have nothing recorded concerning Maneus, but that he is reported to have been the father of Acmon[‡].

Acmon.

CONCERNING Acmon, if he be the same with the Elion of Sanchroniatbo, as this author makes him the father of Uranus, who was therefore called Acmonides, or the son of Acmon; we have nothing particular, except that he had a son named Epigeus Autochton, called afterwards Ouranus, and that being killed by a wild beast, whom he too eagerly encountered, he was afterwards deified and worshipped by his descendants[§] (E).

ours presently after his death, we have here, as Pezron observes, one of the ancientest heathen deities in all antiquity. But we see no reason for departing from our former opinion, that the deifying of princes is of much later date[†]; those groves which were consecrated to him in Phrygia might be no other than monuments to his memory, not unlike perhaps to those of the Scythian kings, of whom we shall speak by-and-by, whilst the idolatrous

- a Uranus, according to the same ancient author, succeeded his father, and married Uranus. his own sister, Ge, or the earth (F), by whom he had four sons, the eldest of whom, called Ifus or Cronus, afterwards Saturn, also succeeded him. Sanctoniatho observes that he had two other names, and that that of Ouranus was not given him till afterwards, but tho' he knew not the reason of it, yet if we attend to the Celtic etymology, Ur or Our, a Man, and en heaven; it will appear highly probable that he was called Our-en a man of heaven, from his being very much addicted to the study of astronomy, and astrology. From this the Greeks might easily also call him Uranus or Ouranus, if not wholly derive that word from him. We pass
- b by many fabulous things, which have been invented of him by the Greeks, and other writers, and shall only add, that his new conquests in Asia and Europe seem rather to have been owing to his ambition than to his magic; to his policy, than to his skill in astrological predictions. How long he reigned we are not told, but after having enlarged his dominions, he had the misfortune to be bereaved of his kingdom and liberty, if not of his life, by his ambitious son and successor Saturn, who having intercepted him, put him into close confinement, where he either died with grief, or was dispatched by the order of that unnatural son.

- c Saturn, surnamed afterwards Cronos or Cronos, is said by Sanctoniatho to have been the eldest son of Uranus, whilst other authors affirm him to have been the youngest of all; and that his eldest brother, who was called Titan, did for a long while contest the crown with him, till being at length over-powered and forced to yield to him, Saturn is supposed to have been the first, who took upon him the regal dignity. For we are told*, that all his predecessors, down to Uranus, had contented themselves with the title of princes; and an ancient father tells us^u, upon the authority of Percydes, that he was the first that wore the diadem, whence he is supposed to have been surnamed Cronos, which in the Celtic signifies crowned (G). He likewise tells us in another place, that he much delighted in wearing a red cloak, or a short coat of the Gallatic dye, from which perhaps came also the royal purple, so much worn by kings, and persons of the highest rank (H).

- d Saturn, though he was no less politic and crafty^a than prone to ambition, could not so well conceal his treasonable designs, but that Uranus had some suspicion of them, and to be before-hand with him, dispatched his daughter Rhea to make away with him by some private means. But Saturn, who perhaps was apprized of it by his mother Titea, whose jealousy had so far transported her (I), as to worship of them was not introduced till many ages after.

These Titans of Sanctoniatho, whom the Greeks called αἰετῆς or wanderers, such as the Gomerians really were, are also supposed to have been of gigantic stature, like those we have mentioned in the history of Canaan; the fable indeed reckons them as such. The apocryphal book of Judith (11) mentions the Titans and giants as synonymous, as we hinted before; and the septuagint have translated the words the valley of Rephaim, or giants; the valley of Titans (12). The Greeks which called them Τῑτῆς and Τῑτῑνες, seem to have borrowed that word from the Celtic Gugg, which signifies proud, fierce, arrogant, such as we may reasonably suppose their monstrous stature might incline them to be, and such as we find those to have been, of whom mention is made in holy writ. And as the Titans, kings and priests as well as people, were extremely given to superstition, divination, magick, and all such like vile practices, an ancient father had reason to upbraid the heathen with placing giants, tyrants and magicians in the number of their kings, and afterwards of their gods (13).

(F) It is observable that the Greeks who have translated this name have also retained the ancient one of Titea, which is derived from the Celtic Tit, which signifies the same thing. We shall find many more such Greek names in the sequel, which are palpably of Celtic extraction.

(G) That of Saturn, which some have absurdly derived from the Hebrew שַׁטַר Satar, to hide, because he went and concealed himself in Italy from his son Jupiter, is more naturally deduced from the Phrygian Saturn, or rather Sadorn, which signifies strong and potent; for so he really was, till weakened by his sons unnatural rebellion, as the history will shew immediately. Sanctoniatho gives him the name of Il or Ilos, which may be properly enough derived from the Hebrew word יָסַר El, which signifies strong and mighty, and is in that tongue one of the names of God.

(H) Saturn being supposed to have dwelt in Phrygia, part of which was afterwards called Galatia; Pezron observes that this country being very famous for dying that colour, the Greek κεκρυς, and Latin Coccus, may naturally be derived from the Celtic Coch, which signifies red (14).

(I) This jealousy and resentment Sanctoniatho tells us, was occasioned not only by the number of other wives which Uranus took, but because though she had left him upon that account, yet he would come and lie with her by force. But what most of all enraged her was, that he endeavoured to destroy all the children he had by her, which, if it be true, did not a little extenuate her and her son's rebellion (15).

(11) Chap. xvi. 7. (12) 2 Sam. v. 18. (13) Eucl. pr. evang. l. ii. c. 5. (14) Chap. 10. & Isa. c. Cel. Latin. sub voc. Coccus. (15) Id. ibid.

encourage him, if not to inspire him with his first design of his unnatural rebellion, soon found a way not only to divert her from her enterprise, but to bring her over to his side. This caused an open rupture, in which Saturn, after a contest of several years, proving the stronger of the two, imprisoned his father, as we have seen above,⁷ and made himself absolute; after which it is supposed, that not being contented with the title of prince, he assumed that of king. And indeed if it be true, that he had enlarged his dominions, not only in Asia, but in Europe, as far as Spain, and gained also some provinces in Africa, a less title than this could not well suit his ambitious mind.

He had two notable counsellors, besides his mother, the one from his youth named Hermes Tresmegistus, a great philosopher and consummate politician; some add that he was also a great conjurer; the other was his Sister Rhea, whom he afterwards made his wife (K). These three did so far prevail upon the princes and grandees of the court, and especially with his other brothers, what with their address and munificence (L), that they all came into his party, so that it is no wonder if his dominions and conquests did vastly exceed those of his predecessors, and himself proved so successful both at home and abroad. But his happiness was soured many different ways: he was extremely mistrustful of his children: he had himself dethroned his own father, and could not be without fear, lest his crime should be punished in the same kind. This made him sacrifice them to his jealous guilt, as some think, or, as others believe, to the ghost of his father. He was extremely given to superstition and divinations, and it is not improbable that his diviners might increase his suspicions, by foretelling that he would be in danger of being dethroned by some of them, as he really was by Jupiter. he had still another private enemy to ward against, namely his brother Titan, who, though forced to yield to him, at least in appearance, might in time find means to try his fortune again. But perhaps his mind was so intent upon his children, that he wholly neglected him; and this gave him at length an opportunity of surprising him and his wife Rhea, whom he immediately conveyed into some province of Asia, and kept them in close confinement till his son Jupiter came with a considerable army of Cretans, and restored his captive parents to their liberty and kingdom (M).

WHAT we have observed concerning Saturn's jealous temper and cruelty to his children, must in all probability have been the cause why his wife Rhea took such pains to preserve her youngest son Jupiter, by concealing her pregnancy from him by being delivered of him in one place, and sending him privately to be educated in another (N). This action therefore of Jupiter, pious and generous as it was, did

(K) This custom of marrying of sisters had nothing extraordinary in those days; we have seen in a former volume that it was common to the Egyptians, Perfians, and many other great and polite nations. The name of Rhea is likewise of Celtic extraction, and signifies a lady, as Rhey signifies a lord (16).

(L) Among others of his brethren we find one called Japhet or Japet, a name preserved only among the descendants of his son Gomer, Sanchoniato likewise names Atlas, but he is more likely to have been his nephew, and the son of Japhet. It is very probable that Saturn, in recompence of their friendship to him, gave that part of his conquests in Mauritania to Atlas, and that the famous mountains of Africa received their name from him (17).

(M) This remarkable transaction has been preserved to us by an ancient father (18) upon the authority of Ennius, or rather of Evemerus, whose translator he was; and as he produced it to prove against the heathen, that the Gods they worshipped had been meer men, he introduces it with this singular preface. Aperiamus ea quæ veris literis continentur, ne poetarum ineptias in accusandis religionibus sequi aut probare videamur. It should seem by these words that he had read the fables of the poets, as well as the more authentick testimonies of historians, and knew full well how to distinguish the one from the other, and to urge nothing but what was acknowledged for truth.

We may add that many other fathers and apolo- gists have appealed to the like historical facts concerning Saturn, Jupiter, &c. which they would hardly have ventured to do if they had not been acknowledged as such by those against whom they wrote (19).

(N) Authors are not agreed about the place of Jupiter's birth. The Cretans did pretend that he was born in that island on mount Ida, and Callimachus (20), who gives them the title of liars for having forged his tomb there also, because such a god as he could not die, yet absurdly enough, owns him to have been born, and affirms the place to have been mount Lycaeus, in Arcadia. The latter may be the more probable of the two. The hymnist adds, that the place was since held so sacred that no women dared to approach it. It was also called by way of excellence the sacred top, and the Puerperium, or place of Rhea's lying-in. As for the Cretans, they might be easily led into the belief of his being born among them because he had been conveyed and brought up there with the utmost privacy a did rather increase than dispel his jealousy. His surprize to find himself overreached by his wife, and to see this son, whom he did not dream of, not only grown into years, but of courage and strength sufficient to overcome his enemies, made him fear lest he should in time deprive him with the same facility of his kingdom and life. Lactantius adds, upon the authority of Evemerus, that he went to consult the oracle and his diviners, who bid him beware of his son Jupiter, who would be likely in time to dethrone him. Upon this warning he lost no time to try to put it out of his power. He entered into Crete with an army, for his son was again retired thither after he had atchieved his deliverance; but he soon found that the Cretans were all in his son's interest, and that he was more likely to be intrapped than b obeyed by them. This obliged him to return into that part of Greece since called Peloponnesus, whither Jupiter, enraged at his cruel design against him, followed him with an army, and forced him to retire into Italy. Janus was then king of the Aborigines, whom we observed before; may either have been of Celtic extraction, or upon some other account friends to the Titans (O). However, that good old king gave him a kind reception, and as some affirmed admitted him into a kind of partnership with him in his kingdom^a; so that the region where Saturn reigned, and which is adjoining to the Tyber, was since called Saturnia from him. How long he lived there, and what became of him, is impossible to guess, except that his tomb being shewed in Sicily^a, may induce one to suppose that he went and ended his c days there.

Jupiter, or, as he was rightly called, You (P), because he was the youngest of Jupiter. Saturn's children; did not however enjoy his kingdom peaceably. His uncle Titan, or perhaps one of his sons, having probably found means to strengthen his party, whilst he was taken up against his father, raised a war against him, which continued full ten years, and was carried on with the utmost fury on both sides, both by sea and land, and did not end but with the total overthrow of Titan and his army.

THIS war seems to be the truest original of the fabulous war of the Giants or Titans against the gods, which the poets have so interlarded with their inventions, privacy from his very infancy. However that be, as is agreed that his education was committed to the care of the Carates, and these being men of great power and credit among the people, it is no wonder that they procured him so powerful an army to go to his father's rescue. And it is not improbable that they were the persons that inspired him with that pious design, which might probably cure the father of his unjust suspicion, and intitle the son to the succession of his kingdom.

The story of Saturn's cruelty in sacrificing so many of his children to his jealousy, may also have given birth to what the poets have related of his devouring of them, as Jupiter's depriving him at length of his kingdom, may have given occasion to their accusing him of castrating him.

(O) We have already taken notice that the Umbrians are affirmed by antient historians both to have been the oldest people in Italy, and to have been the descendants of the Celtes†; and it is hardly to be supposed that Saturn would have trusted himself, in his desperate circumstances, to any but a friendly nation; but whether these were the same with the Aborigines, or another colony incorporated with them in process of time, we will not decide. The reception which he met with from Janus scarce leaves room to doubt, of their being allied either by blood, or by some other tie.

Some critics have found fault with Julius Firmicus, for having affirmed (21), that this fugitive prince was concealed by the Spartans in Italy. Perron has taken some pains to prove that they were really in Italy before that time, and incorporated with other nations of that province; and that the Sabines were descended from them, and they from the Celtes or Gomerians. But if this should not seem altogether so plain, as it is impossible to grope into those dark and remote ages with any tolerable satisfaction, the words of Firmicus in Italia a Sparti absconditur, if there has no error crept into them, may be understood proleptically. The nation that received Saturn, whatever they were, might in time, if not by Jupiter himself, be drove out of Italy, and go and settle in Sparta, or upon some other account be thenceforth called Spartans. At least the author above-named has made it very probable, that they originally came from Italy; though it doth not appear that they were ever known by that name there.

(P) The irregular inflexion of his name into Jovis, &c. shews it plainly. It is therefore absurd to derive it, as Cicero doth, upon the authority of Varro, from Jovans Pater, which the inflexion will not admit of; when the Celtic You, or as we pronounced it Jee, which signifies young, is on all respects so much nearer to it; and Jupiter seems plainly to be the same with Jee-pater, which last was added to his former name of You, when he came to be worshipped as the greatest of the gods.

Accordingly we find that the antient Latini did not write his name Jupiter, but Jaopiter, Joupiter, and Japiter. But the Celtic has still preserved his antient name of You, and call Thursday, or the Dies Jovis of the Romans, Dix-jee, and Di-jee, the day of Jee (22). We shall have occasion by-and-by to speak of some of his other names.

that it is scarcely possibly to discover it through them (Q). This final overthrow was given them near the ancient city of Tartesa in Spain, a sea-port town a little to the north of Cadiz (R), whither it seems he went in person with a great fleet, and a puissant army, and having brought over some of their confederates to his side, and gained this signal victory, he reigned very peaceably to the end of his life.

Jupiter after the example of his predecessors married his own sister Juno (S). But as he was seldom without some amorous intrigues with other women, by whom he had a numerous issue, he was forced to bear with many rubs and mortifications from his jealous and revengeful queen. On the other hand he did not follow his pleasures so close, but he allowed himself proper seasons for the administration of justice throughout the many provinces of his kingdom, in rooting out robbers, and Bandits who sheltered themselves in the forests of Thessaly, Macedonia, and Illyria, where they committed the vilest outrages. But as he had made Mount Olympus, (T) one of the most delightful parts of Thessaly, his chief residence, he was under a kind of necessity to rid those countries of such vermin, that his subjects might have the freer access to his court.

BEFORE his death he is affirmed by the last quoted father, as a known truth, to have divided his kingdom, and to have given the western, or European part of it, to

(Q) We have deferred till now to observe how much this system of history, for we dare not to venture to give it a stronger name, doth clash with that of our learned Cumberland, who, as we have fully shewn in the beginning of this history*, makes his Sanchoiath's Uranus to have been Noah, Cronus Ham, Mizor Mizraim, Zadic Melchizedek, and so on; that our readers might see which of the two carries the greatest probability. They are both built upon conjectures, and both supported by some collateral kind of proofs, and upon a supposition, that this fragment we have left is the reliick of a fuller history, and that its author is not a fictitious, but a real, antient, and credible one. We shall not repeat what we have said elsewhere on this last head †, much less do we design to draw a parallel between these two systems, or their learned authors. Thus much, however, we hope we may say without partiality, concerning that of our Celtic antiquary, that it not only gives a great light to the dark and fabulous times, but that it is corroborated by a much greater number of antient authors, heathens as well as christians. But the latter, especially the apologists, seem plainly enough to have been generally of the same mind with him, and have made no difficulty to urge this genealogy of heathen deities abovementioned, against their stupid worshippers.

How far all this is further corroborated by numberless Celtic etymons, the greatest part of which are both easy and natural, and confirmed by historical facts, must be submitted to the reader's judgment. Of this number we beg leave to remind him of what has been said concerning the names of Uranus and Titan, Cronus or Saturn, and Rhea, Jou or Jupiter, Theutus, and others, besides a greater number which we have omitted, but which may be seen in our author, and some few which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel; all which put together, will, if not convince him, yet, at least, justify our giving it a place in this history, as we have that of our learned bishop in the former volume.

(R) This seems also confirmed by what Justin (23) adds, that the Curetes lived formerly in the forests about that city. Some of his commentators indeed have affirmed, after Vossius, that it ought to be read Cinetes, because the Curetes were a people of Creta. We have already shewn that the latter were the priests or soothsayers of the Titans and Celtes, and accompanied them in their wars. What wonder then that some of them who had followed Jupiter in this expedition, and delighted otherwise in a kind of ascetic life, should be induced to make those forests their abode? But we shall have occasion by-and-by to say something further concerning them, which may convince one of the probability of there being men of that name and profession in those parts of Spain.

(S) This name is not unlikely to be of Celtic extraction, and to be derived from Ghuin, which signifies fair white, and, by way of excellence, beautiful, such as Juno is said to have been to a great degree. Hence perhaps it is, that the antient Glossaries call her also Jolinta, a jolly or fine woman.

Thus Jupiter had some other names among the Greeks, which seem to flow from the same fountain, as Zeus, from which they irregularly made their Διὸς δις δις, &c. in the oblique cases. Now the Zeus, from which the Latins made Deus, seems more plainly derived from the Celtic Dheu, God, and the Dis and Dia from Di, bright. He was likewise surnamed Πικρος and Picus, from the bird of that name, which Pliny tells us was then much used in auguries (24), which bird seems to be so called from his being continually pecking of walls and trees, and is known among us by the name of Woodpecker. Pliny indeed pretends that he was called Picus, from a king of Latium of that name; but it seems more probable, that both he and many other princes were, like Jupiter, so surnamed from the bird, from which they received their auguries; for the Celtic word peck or beak, signifies a bird's bill; and hence it is likely our verb to peck is derived.

(T) Hence the last quoted father observes, that after his apotheosis, the place of his residence came to be called by his superstitious worshippers heaven, or to be synonymous to it (25).

a his uncle Dis or Pluto, surnamed also Agefilaus (U), whilst himself kept the Asiatic or eastern part of it⁴. We observed also before, that he gave some part of Africa to his nephew Atlas, but having afterwards either conceived jealousy of him, or detected him in some criminal design against him, he is reported to have caused him to be put to death.

THIS Atlas (W) had a daughter named Maia, or Floury, whose beauty Jupiter was not proof against, but he could not obtain her upon any other condition, than that of marriage. From her he had a son named Theutat, since Mercury, of whom we shall speak hereafter. This marriage failed not to enrage Juno, who was ever plotting something against him. We cannot guess whether Atlas had been unfortunately drawn into some rebellion by the jealous queen, but Jupiter is by some accused to have degenerated into a kind of tyrant, through the continual seditions which she raised against him, which yet he did find means to discover in good time⁵.

ON the other hand the Cretan historians extolled his virtues up to the skies. Diodorus Siculus, and Ennius, upon their authority, bestow the greatest encomiums on him for his strength, valour, prudence, justice, for his encouraging learning and virtue, and punishing injuries, violence and robberies, and for his many wholesome laws and regulations for the publick good⁶. He lived 120 years, of which having reigned 62⁷, this great, and since deified hero, resigned his breath c like other men, and was buried by the Curetes in the isle of Crete, and in the city of Gnoffus, where his sons erected a stately monument, which was shewn many ages after by the inhabitants⁸. The same author adds, that he divided his kingdom among his relations and friends. His son Cres or Cret (from whom that island of Crete is supposed to have had its name, Cret in Celtic signifying bold, and daring,) was then at the head of the Curetes, and performed the last devoirs to his father, after which he took the government of that island⁹ (X). How the rest of his kingdom was divided among the rest of his successors, is not to be guessed at, only we find that his son Theutat or Mercury, of whom we are going to speak, had the western part assigned to him, probably after the death of his uncle Dis or *Pluto*¹⁰.

d Mercury is allowed, by all antiquity, to have been the son of Jupiter by Maia, *Mercury*¹¹ as we have seen above. We have given already, in a former note, the etymon of those two names[†]. The Greeks did likewise call him Ερμης, Hermes (Y), and the Latins Faunus (Z). He was famed for his learning and wisdom, and especially for

(U) This last name, which signifies a leader of the people, or Ageleader, as it is found in other writers (26), and signifies a leader of men, might be given him on account of his leading his nephew's colonies into Europe, and perhaps as far as Spain, where we observed a little above, there had been both Titans and Curetes in the neighbourhood of the ancient city of Tartesa. Here likewise he is supposed to have found out some rich mines of gold and silver (27), by which he grew so rich, that he got the name of Pluto, in Greek ΠΛΟΥΤΗ, which signifies rich, and was afterwards made the god of riches, upon his being deified; and this probably induced Strabo to believe, that the Tartara, of the Greeks and Latins, came from the above-named Tartesa, a country situate in the utmost parts of Spain westward (28).

Hence likewise, Jupiter having the dominion of the east, or sun-rising, and Pluto of the west, or sun-setting, came also probably the fable of the former being the lord of heaven, and the latter of the infernal regions. Perhaps, likewise, might the mythologists of those fables think it very reasonable to assign the government of riches, and of the infernal regions to the same deity, to put men in mind that the former were the ready road to the latter.

(W) He was also called by the Greeks Talamon, from the Celtic Tall-men, or Man, on account of his high stature, and as he was also a great astronomer, thence came all the fables which the poets have since made of him.

(X) This is at least intimated by Lactantius's words, out of Ennius, Curetes filii sui (Tools) sunt curatores, for Cres was then a Curete, and probably the head or principal of that society. Eusebius seems also to confirm his having succeeded his father in the government of that isle, when he makes him the first king of Crete (29); that is, as we understand him after Pepon, he was the first who reigned in that only island, whereas his father's kingdom is said to have reached from Euphrates to Spain, besides some parts of Africa, which he had given to Atlas, as we have seen elsewhere.

(Y) Which name comes probably from the Celtic Armes, which signifies divination. For Mercury seems to have out-done all his ancestors in the knowledge and constant practice of that art, as we shall see by-and-by.

(Z) This is the only name for which no proper etymon can be found in the Celtic; nor can we guess upon what account it was given. But the chronicle above quoted calls him by both names of Faunus and for his skill in auguries, magick and philosophy. He was active, courageous and eloquent; and so prudent that he always kept close to his father's interest. For all these good qualities he became his chief favourite and counsellor, and was also by the fabulous writers affirmed to be the interpreter of the gods. An antient father tells us that he went down into Egypt to penetrate further into their mysterious arts and sciences, and that at his return he assumed the name of Tentat ¹ (A). It was probably from the Egyptians that he learned the art of melting, refining, casting, and working of metals, which art he is said to have first brought into Europe, whence it again dimanated itself into Asia, as was shewn under another head.

He not only taught them the metallick trades, but how to make an advantageous traffick of them into other countries, for which he had the surname of Merk-ur ^b or Mercury. This great improvement, which could not but endear him to his subjects, gave him an opportunity of polishing that rude and cruel nation, which till then seems to have made the trade of war, and plunder their chief study and delight. He gave them a body of laws, encouraged the liberal arts and sciences, and caressed the foreigners, who flocked into his dominions, especially those who brought any curious arts with them. Thus by his address and powerful eloquence he did so civilize and improve his subjects, that his merit was still dear to them in Cæsar's time, who tells us that he was held in veneration above all other gods, and had statues and altars reared to his honour in every town and village ^c.

SOME attribute the invention of the olympick games to him, others to Hercules, ^c but if Pausanius be right, they must have been much older, since he tells us that Saturn and Jupiter had wrestled together at them ^d. They may however be supposed to have made some considerable improvement to them, each according to his particular talent, and thereby eclipsed the memory of their first inventor. He reigned, according to the Alexandrian chronicle, 34 years; but whether or not his life ended with his reign, is not easy to say. Suidas ^e and the above-mentioned chronicle say, that his brothers being grown jealous of his superior power and merit, formed such a conspiracy against his life, that he found himself under a necessity of packing up all his treasure, and to retire into Egypt, where he spent the remainder of his days in peace. On the other hand Livy acquaints us ^d that there was a large tomb near New Carthage, in the time of Scipio and Hanibal, which was called the tomb of Mercury Tentat; and this would incline one to believe that he died in his own dominions. We are no less in the dark, about the condition of his kingdom from his death to its conquest by the Romans, except that the unweildiness of so vast an empire, did probably cause it to split itself into many petty kingdoms, under some of his successors. This was at least the case in which the Roman conqueror found them, when he invaded the Celtic territories, as we have hinted before. As for the changes which it received after it became a part of the Roman empire, this is not a proper place to speak of them; they will be the subject of another volume, in which the history of the European kingdoms will be ^e resumed.

and Mercury; so that this Fænus must not be confounded with another of the name, who reigned many ages afterwards in Italy, especially with Fænus, the father of Latinius, in whose time Æneas came into that kingdom. Whereas our Mercury, according to this chronology of Titanic princes, must have lived at furthest about the time of Japhet's being in Egypt (30).

(A) That father adds that he took up that name in imitation of the antient Egyptian Mercury or Thout, who, as we have seen in the former volume ^a, was worshipped by the Egyptians for his great learning, wisdom, and eloquence. So that by only altering the name by a letter or two, he made himself a more honourable one in the Celtic, Then-tat, as we observed before, signifying the father of his people, such as he really was, if what we read of him be true.

This is not a proper place to enquire how these Gods, or at least their names, came to be adopted by other nations. Such a curious subject doth well deserve to be treated of in a treatise by itself, and we hope, if we have not quite cleared that point thro' the former parts of this history, we have at least furnished the world with some considerable materials towards such an enquiry, which is all that could be expected from such a design as this.

A THESE intestine divisions having once weakened the strength of this large empire, not only the maritime parts did easily become a prey to their warlike neighbours, but their frontier provinces likewise. Among the first, Iberia or Spain was dismembered from it by the Cartaginians, from whom it passed to the Romans, together with the southern provinces, since called Gallia Narbonensis, and the provinces on the other side the Alps. The Scythians, it is likely, did also inroach upon them on the north side, and very probably seized upon that part of their territories, which was afterwards called Scythia in Europe, and drove them quite to the higher side of the Danube. For it seems most natural, that in their first migrations, the same boundaries which parted Europe from Asia, did also part the Celtic and Scythian dominions. However that be, and whether through the conquering sword of their neighbours *, or through their intestine wars, or want of elbow-room, or whatever other motive might occasion it; sure it is, that several powerful colonies of these Celtes or Gauls returned into lesser Asia, where finding almost every where some antient monuments of their progenitors, they settled themselves in several parts of it by main force, and gave some of their new-gotten names to them; such as that of Galatia, Partbia, and some others, without which it would be impossible to distinguish these latter excursions and exploits, from those by which they had signalized themselves before their migrations into Europe. The first of those, as far as it can be disentangled from the latter, will be best seen in some of the following histories, either of those nations, whom they there conquered, or of those by whom they were driven out of their conquests.

B As for those whom we have seen in Europe, we hope our readers are satisfied by this time, that if we have chosen to follow a new guide through those dark and remote ages, he has at least conducted us not only more agreeably, but with greater appearance of truth than any other we could have followed, and that the proofs he has taken the pains to extract out of all that we have left of antient records, concerning that populous and warlike nation, joined to such a vast number of Celtic etymologies, do at least carry a much greater degree of probability, than we could meet with any where else; and we may add, than we ourselves could ever have attained, by all the antient monuments extant of that nation, without the help of the Celtic language. These etymologies, which seem to strike a light to every passage quoted from antient authors, and which we can assure our readers we did not take upon trust, will, we hope, sufficiently justify likewise our preferring our learned author's genealogy of the heathen gods to that of Sanckoniatho, which is at best but a confused medley of some dark and imperfect hints stolen out of the writings of Moses, and jumbled with the history and fables of other nations, in honour of his own (B).

C We submit however to our reader's judgment, whether this genealogy of the heathen deities be not more probable, and more agreeable to the testimony of antient authors, than that which our learned bishop Cumberland has endeavoured to give us out of his Phœnician historian. As for ourselves, we wish we could meet with such another guide to conduct us through the next, but more dark and intricate history, that of the Scythians. But here we must be contented to grope in the dark, as all have done before us, who have written of that antient and remote nation, and to make the best of those few fragments which antiquity has left us concerning them.

(B) Though we cannot by any means give into the notion of many learned men, who have supposed his history to have been a forgery writ on purpose to invalidate the authority of Moses, as if he had stolen his account of the creation out of the Phœnician records*, yet we cannot but think it manifest that he has copied that sacred historian, and that very bunglingly too, besides his blending and adjusting his cosmogony and theology, with the history and fables of his time.

What else can we think of his dark and universal Chaos? his vehement wind-engendering Mot or Motion (for that is the Hebrew meaning of the word) which produced the seeds of all things animate and inanimate? the sun, moon, stars, and Sophotimmim, or speculators of the heavens? what means his Calphas, but the Almighty word, which spoke all things into being, his Bau or Baw; but the Tebu and Bobu of Moses?

Whoever compares also the history he gives us of the second and third line, with what we read in Genesis, and with what has been quoted in the last section out of antient authors, concerning Elion, Chronos, &c. will easily see that it is a nicer confused mixture of sacred and profane history, interlarded with fable, and that if Jerumbaal, priest of Jahvob, from whom Porphyry pretends he received his information, be the Gideon of the Jews, who was surnamed Jerubaal (31), and might have been mistaken for a priest of Jahvob, because he is recorded to have set up an altar and an ephod to him (32); it is plain that he made no other use of those Phœnician memoirs, than to put them in a phantastical Phœnician dress, such as best suited the theology of the heathen world, and was most likely to challenge an antiquity and authority to the Phœnician records beyond all others, even beyond those of the sacred penmen, from whom he had his materials.

S E C T. V.

The Geography of Scythia.

HOW this prodigious tract of land came at first by the name of Scythia, is not easy ^a to determine. We have but two tolerable conjectures to offer concerning it, besides that monstrous one, which Herodotus gives us from the fabulous Greeks, and which we shall for that reason throw into the margin (A). The first is that which derives that name from the Greek σκολιόται, which expresses the fierceness of their countenance, and natural temper; and the other, which derives it from the Teutonic word Scheten or Schuten, to shoot, at which art this nation is affirmed by Herodotus, Lucian, and others^b, to have been so singularly expert, that this name is supposed to have been emphatically given them on that account; so that according to this supposition the word Scythian did properly signify a great Shooter or Archer. We have however observed heretofore, that the Tartars and Muscovites called themselves ^b Mogli, which we suppose only an abbreviation of Magogly, the sons of Magog. That of Scythien might be either given to them by other nations, or perhaps by the Celtes, whose language, as was before observed, did not originally differ much either from the Scythian or Teutonic.

THIS vast territory which extended itself from the Ister or Danube the boundary of the Celtes, that is from about the 25th to almost the 110th degree of east longitude, was therefore divided into Scythia in Europe, and Scythia in Asia, including however the two Sarmatias, or, as they are called by the Greeks, Sauromatias, now the Circassian Tartary, which did lie between, and sever the two Scythias from each other. Sauromatia was also distinguished into European and Asiatic, and was divided ^c from the European Scythia by the river Don or Tanais, which falls into the Palus Meotis, and from the Asiatic by the Rba, now Volga, which empties itself into the Caspian sea^d. But the Sarmatians differed so little from the Scythians in their language, religion and customs, if we may believe Herodotus^e, that we may reasonably suppose them to have been originally a branch of them, if not their very descendants by the Amazons, with whom that author tells us, they having intermarried, they begot the Sarmatian offspring. But the former seems to us the most probable, when we consider how easy, short, and regular, their migration into that country was, from the place of their first setting out, and that we find in the very center between Armenia and Sarmatia, a large province called Iberia, which is much more likely to ^d be that which Josephus tells us was peopled by Tubal, the brother of Gomer and Magog, than the Celtiberia of Spain. We shall not repeat here what we have so lately urged against this last opinion[†].

UPON the whole then we may safely venture to say, that the two Scythias were only parted by the boundaries of Europe and Asia, that is by the river Tanais, descending, as is supposed, from the Riphean mountains (B) into the Palus Meotis.

For

(A) That author tells, upon the credit of the pontic Greeks, that Hercules being got into Scythia, then uninhabited, and the mares which drew his chariot, having straggled out of the way, whilst he refreshed himself with sleep, as he was in search of them, he met with a monster, half woman, and half serpent, who promised to help him to them upon condition he would lie with her. The hero having performed the bargain, and staid with her till she was tired, she asked him at parting how he would have her dispose of the three sons she had now got by him; whereupon he left her one of his bows, and his belt, which had a golden cup hanging at the lowest seam, and bid her, when the boys were come to age, to retain him with her, that could draw his bow, and send the other two away. She followed his orders, and Scythia, who was the youngest, and proved the strongest of the three, became the first monarch of that country. And from him all the kings of Scythia bore that name, and wore a cup hanging at their belt (1).

(B) Some modern geographers (2), who prove plainly enough that these could not be those of Siberia, which are at the distance of near ten degrees from the Tanais, are therefore of opinion that they were imaginary, and supplied by the fertile fancy of the antients to furnish a head to that river. The case is hardly worth disputing: and yet since we find that Riphat was Gomer's second son (3), whose migration may have been probably through this region, and along this river; it seems more reasonable to think, he might leave his name to those mountains S. E. of Moscow, from which the Don takes its source, as most other geographers have supposed

a For beyond these mountains northward, we find not that the Scythians advanced into any of those remote regions, so that these were the proper confines of the Asiatic Scythia on the west. The northern ones reached to the Hyperborean or Frozen sea, called also by the antients, the Scythian sea, the Cronian, Amalchian, or Almachian, the Dead Sea, and by some other names which expressed its extreme coldness and frozenness. On the east they are supposed to have extended to the promontory of Tabis, and to have been bounded by the Cassian mountains, which parted Scythia from the kingdom of Seres, now Cattai or northern China; and on the south by the Eoum or Indian sea, and by mount Caucasus, and the Caspian sea^a.

b As to the modern parts of Scythia, its extreme coldness made it uninhabitable, by any but wolves, bears, and other such-like northern wild-beasts; and this is probably the reason why they seem to have been unknown to the antients beyond the 50th degree north. All that reached farther than this was called terra incognita, and their notion of its being surrounded by the Hyperborean, or northern ocean, they seem rather to have had from conjecture, than from experience. But the southern regions, with which they were better acquainted, they divided into three parts; namely Scythia within, and Scythia without, or beyond Imaus, and Sarmatia, which lay between the former, and the European Scythia, which, as we observed before, was either a branch of the Scythian nation, or had been by some means so blended with it, that it differed in little or nothing from it except the name.

c THE Asiatic Scythia did therefore comprehend in general great Tartary, and Russia in Asia, and in particular the Scythia beyond, or without Imaus, contained the regions of Bogdoi or Ostiacoi, and Tanguti. That within or on this side Imaus had Turkestan and Mongal, the Usbek, or Zagatai, Kalmuc and Nagaian Tartars, besides Siberia, the land of the Samoiedes, and the Nova Zembla. These three last being then inhabited, as we supposed, were wholly unknown to the antients, and the former were peopled by the Baltrians, Sogdians, Gandari, Sacks and Mossagetes. As for Sarmatia, it contained Albania, Iberia, and Colchis, which make now the Circassian Tartary, and the province of Georgia.

OTHER seas, besides the Frozen and Indian ocean, were the Caspian (C), and the Euxine, or Black Sea, and the Palus Meotis. Mountains of note were Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: the first, beginning in the province of Asia Minor, called Pamphilia, runs eastward through Asia, and divides it into two parts, the northern and southern. The second lies in Scythia, or the greater Tartary: and the third is between the Caspian and the Euxine sea^b. Its rivers, besides those we have occasionally mentioned, namely the Rba or Volga, and Tanaïs or Don, are the Oby, Lena, Amur, and Helum; the latter of which is supposed to be the Quentung or Shengal; all these are in great Tartary. To these we may add the Jaxartes, now Jacick, and the Oxus, these empty themselves into the Caspian sea: in this sea there were likewise some islands, not distinguished by any particular names, but commonly called by that of the Scythian islands.

NATURAL rarities we cannot expect in this country, if we except what Herodotus tells us, that those northern regions are altogether invisible and impassable by reason of the vast quantity of feathers which fill the air, and cover the ground, as he was informed by those who inhabited the more southern parts of it, who, as he tells us in another place, did doubtless mistake the large flakes of snow, which fall in abundance in those cold and mountainous climates, for feathers. It were still more absurd to seek for artificial rarities here among a people who were strangers to every thing but the art of war, and of feeding their cattle, as we shall shew in its proper place.

f 2. Scythia in Europe, whose confines we have already fixed eastward from the Tanaïs, reached towards the south-west to the Po and the Alps, by which it was divided from the Celtes, or Celto-Gallia, and by the Rhine northward. It was bounded on the south by the Ister or Danube, and the Euxine sea. As to its northern limits, though it is not easy to guess at them, they have been supposed to stretch to the

he did, than to believe that those antients, who could know nothing either of Riphat or his migrations, should yet so luckily hit upon this fictitious name.

(C) Mistaken by some antients for a gulph; but as it has no visible communication with the ocean, it may be rather called a great lake, if sea be thought too big a name for it.

* See before, Vol. II. p. 4. c.

spring heads of the Borysthenes or Nieper, and the Rha or Volga, and so to that of a the Tanais (D) ^a.

THE antients divided this country into Scythia Arimaspea, which lay eastward, joining to Scythia in Asia, and Sarmatia Europæa, on the west; these two were contiguous to each other, and stretched some length from north to south, but what divided them asunder is not easy to find out. In Scythia, properly so called, were the Arimaspæi on the north, the Gætæ, or Dacians along the Danube, on the south, and the Neuri between those two. So that it contained the European Russia, or Muscovy, and the lesser Crim Tartary eastward, and on the west Lithuania, Poland, part of Hungary, Transylvania, Valachia, Bulgaria, and Moldavia. Sarmatia is supposed to have reached northward, to that part of Swedeland, called Fennia, ^b now Finland, in which they placed the Oænes, Panoti, and Hippopodes (E), this part they divided from northern Germany, now the west part of Sweden and Norway, by the Mare Sarmaticum or Scythicum, which they supposed ran up into the northern ocean, and divided Lapland into two parts, made the western part of Sweden, with Norway, into an island, and Finland into another; supposing this also to be cut off from the continent, by the Gulph of that name.

THIS Scythia had no other Sea than the Sarmatian mentioned before, now called the Baltic, with the Gulphs of Bothnia and Finland, and the white sea joining to the northern ocean, all unknown to the antients, if we except the Euxine, and Palus Meotis, which bounded it on the South. Lakes of any consideration we ^c find not, except those of Ladoga, and Onega, in Finland, which were therefore unknown to the antient Sarmatians. Their chief rivers were on the south, the Donetz, or little Tanais, Borysthenes, or Nieper, Bog, Tyras, or Niefter, and the Ister or Danube, all which emptied themselves into the Euxine, and on the north east the great and little Dwina which empty themselves, the first into the white sea, and the other into the Gulph of Finland, and therefore not known to the antients; and the Vistula on the west, which runs into the Scythian sea, and divided Sarmatia from Germany (F).

THE whole extent therefore of both Scythias, including the two Sarmatias, reached in longitude from the 20th to the 85th degree, or even beyond, and from ^d the Alps to the promontory of Tabis, and streight of Anian, and in latitude from Caucasus to the arctic circle, above 28 degrees. Herodotus indeed tells us, that the

(D) This is upon the supposition, hinted before, that the first planters of the world did spread themselves along the rivers for the sake of pasturage and correspondence; but it is plain all these northern parts were so unknown to the antients, that all we can say concerning these boundaries, is merely conjecture. It even appears by what we quoted a little above out of Herodotus, that they could not be inhabited very far north, since they were so afraid of, and so little acquainted with snow.

Mela adds, that about the Riphean mountains, which are placed but between 52 and 55 degrees of north-latitude; the snows fell in such abundance, that those parts were uninhabited, and unpallable by any but wild beasts (4).

(E) These Oæniæ, were so called for living mostly upon the eggs of their sea fowl, which they eat with oaten cakes. The Hippopodes, were supposed to be so called from their having feet like horses, or from their going barefoot, and hardening their feet like horses' hoofs. The Panoti were so called from the largeness of their ears, which was such that they could cover their whole body with them instead of other raiment (5). Some other monstrous people and creatures are also mentioned by Herodotus; of the first sort are the Arimaspæans, so called from the Scythian Arima, one, and Spon, eye; not because they had but one eye, as was absurdly believed by some of the antients, but rather, as Boschart justly conjectures, because they were such excellent archers, at which exercise it is necessary to shut one eye, that the nick-name of one-eyed was given them upon that account. To these we may add the mountaineers, who are affirmed to have been haid from their infancy; and another sort which had goats feet, not unlike the fabulous satyrs, besides some monstrous animals, among which were reckoned the griffins, who digged up, and guarded the golden oar or dust (6), all which shews how little was known of these regions at that time.

(F) The same author mentions several other rivers, of which he gives a curious description, as well as of those southern ones which we have mentioned above; but we shall refer the reader to our author for those particulars, as well as for the rivers we have omitted, because they are either not taken notice of by our modern geographers, or at least are not reckoned of such great note and usefulness.

We shall however take notice of what he says of the Borysthenes, which he compares to the Nile in Egypt, and the next in greatness to the Danube. This noble river, says he, besides the beauty and fertility which it gives to the adjoining lands, abounds with variety of excellent fish, and pleasant water, and doth breed a sort of whale, without spinous bones, which the Scythians used to salt for food. They called it Antarchæus; he adds that towards the mouth of it, that river yields abundance of salt, which is incessantly made by the hand of nature.

(4) lib. ii. c. 1. (5) Vid. Mel. lib. iii. c. 8. (6) Herodot. lib. iv.

- a Hyperboreans were not of Scythian race, but another kind of people, one sort of which were Andropagi, or Men-eaters, fierce and cruel, and another, namely the Baldheads or Argippeans, a wise and peaceable people, esteemed sacred by all their neighbours^b, but he speaks of all those remote nations only by report, and with such diffidence, that he rather confirms what we said before, that those regions were most likely unknown, if not uninhabited.

- CITIES we find none in neither Scythia, nor not even a metropolis, though Herodotus mentions a branch of Scythians, called royal Scythians, whom he places along the banks of Tanais, which river divides them, he says, from the Asiatic Sarmatians^c. These, as should seem from the sequel of that author, were the only ones who had
 b real kings among them, as we shall see in the next section, but such was their ways of living, that they never chose to dwell in cities, or fortified places, but to range about as their convenience or safety required. So that we have not much further to add concerning their natural or artificial curiosities. Two things however are worth taking notice of under this head, the one was a large stone lying by the river Tyres, in which was to be seen the print of Hercules's foot, said to have been two cubits long. The other was a brazen bowl of an extraordinary capacity, being six inches thick, and containing full six hundred amphoras, or fifty hogheads^d. The occasion of casting this monstrous vessel we shall have occasion to mention in its proper place.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, learning, arts, and trades of the ancient Scythians.

- c ALL that can be met with concerning the antiquity and origine of this nation, Governm.
 hath been already mentioned in the first section of this chapter. How soon they began to settle themselves into a regular government, is as impossible to guess, as of what kind it was. It appears however from what we have already hinted out of Herodotus, that one or two tribes at least, that is the royal and free Scythians were under a monarchical one, and that these two made a much greater figure than all the rest. But whether the former was the eldest branch, whether it governed immediately over all the rest, whether it appointed viceroys over the other provinces of that vast country, or whether every tribe had their own princes, as the Philistines, whether their succession was hereditary or elective, whether despotic, or subject to the laws, we are wholly in the dark. What seems most probable to us from the little d remains we have left of their history is, that the royal dignity, which was confined to one tribe, might still have a kind of authority over some of the rest, whilst those, who were most remote from the center, had lords, laws and customs of their own, especially those who inhabited the farther parts of it eastward and northward; and this may be the reason of that variety of names and characters, which we find in those few ancient writings we have left concerning them. Thus Herodotus tells us, that in process of time, when the Scythians were like to be invaded by Darius, the king finding himself unable to make head against the invader, invited all the Scythian princes, namely those of the Taurians, Agathyrsians, Neurians, Andropages, Melanclenians, Budians and Sarmatians, to come to his assistance; all these seem to have been different branches of the same stock, and only degenerated from the royal one by distance of time and place. So that by this time they differed much in their manners and customs, as the same author there tells us[†]. The result of this summons was, that the three last named nations joined with the king of Scythia, but the others refused to assist him, under pretence that he was the first aggressor. Hence we conclude, that they had shaken off the yoke of the royal Scythians some considerable time before, though they might all have been originally under it. We shall speak more particularly of these eight tribes or nations in another place; at present we confine ourselves to the two most considerable, the royal and free Scythians, as ^a being the most considerable, and the best known of all the rest.

Laws.

WHAT their laws were, we can only guess from the excellent character that is given to that nation by ancient historians. Such indeed seems to have been their justice, temperance, contempt of riches and luxury, and so simple and primitive their way of living, that they could not stand in need of a great number of them. Justin^a sums up their character in words to this effect: The Scythians were a nation, which, though inured to labours, fierce in war, and of prodigious strength, yet could so well master their affections, that they made no other use of their victories, than to increase their fame. Theft among them was reckoned so great a crime, and was so severely punished, that they could let their numerous flocks wander ^b from place to place without danger of losing them. These they esteemed their greatest wealth, living upon their milk, and cloathing themselves with their skins. Instead of houses, they used to convey their wives and children about in covered waggons, drawn either by horses or oxen, and made capacious enough to carry all their other furniture for bedding, and for the kitchen. Gold and silver were as much despised by them, as they were esteemed by other nations, so that they could not cover that which was of no use to them. Did the same moderation and disinterestedness reign among other nations, it would soon put an end to our destructive wars. What is still more wonderful, these virtues which the Greeks did in vain endeavour to attain by learning and philosophy, were natural to them, and they ^c reaped those advantages from their ignorance of vice, which the others could not from their knowledge of virtue (A). A nation of this character and way of life could therefore want but few laws to secure their property, some others they had with relation to religion, customs, and polity, which forbade, under pain of death, any alteration being made in either, which excluded their women the benefit of marriage, and the men that of assisting at their royal feast, till they had killed an enemy (B). Some other of their laws we omit here, because we shall have occasion to mention them in the course of this history; upon the whole, what appears of them seems wholly calculated to prevent luxury, fraud, and covetousness, and to cherish that martial spirit, for which they are so justly famed in history. ^d

It ought not to be objected here, that some of the Scythian tribes bear a quite different character, some of them being of such fierce and cruel disposition, as even to eat the flesh of their enemies. Those as was hinted before, were, if under the same government, at such great distance from the center of it, as to be out of the reach of its laws. Add to it, that as the inclemency of the air in those remote regions might probably incline them to cruelty; so the distance and barrenness of their country might make them less heeded, and probably more incapable of being restrained by the common laws. However, it must be owned, with respect to the warlike temper even of the true Scythians, that it was not without mixture of cruelty, if the Greek historians have not wilfully misrepresented them, as we shall see by-and-by.

(1) This excellent character of the Scythians, how exaggerated soever it may seem in their praise, is nevertheless confirmed by several ancient historians and poets; and if a late author (1) had but read the testimonies which the learned Fachart has brought to confirm it (2), he would not have so lightly accused Justin of flattering that noble nation at the expense of truth.

(2) With respect to the former, Herodotus tells us (3) that Aracharhis, a Scythian of no small consideration, having in his travels assailed at a festival, which the Cizicians celebrated to the mother of the gods, made a vow that if he got safe back to Scythia, he would introduce the same worship there. Accordingly after his return, he retired privately into some woody part of the country, where he performed his vow; but he could not do it so secretly, but a Scythian, who saw him at it, acquainted the king with it, who came immediately, and shot him with an arrow upon the spot. And even one of their kings lost his crown and life for barely attempting to introduce some of the Grecian rites and dress, as we shall see in its proper place.

With respect to the second particular, the same author tells us, that it often happened that some women, not having the good fortune to kill an enemy were forced to pine away in a shameful celibacy (4). As to the men, he tells us, that every governor of a province, was obliged to make a yearly wine-feast to all those who had killed one or more of their enemies, in which they were allowed to carouse in cups made of the skulls of the slain, and in proportion to the number of them; whilst those, who had not as yet signalized themselves like them, were forced to stand at a distance, beholding the feast, and excluded from tasting of it.

a If we may guess by some few successions we find mentioned in history, it seems their crown was hereditary, and yet their kings not so despotic as not to be deposed, or even put to death, for the violation of their laws. This is plain from the instance we hinted at in the last note, where Scyles having been found celebrating the Bacchanalia of the Greeks; his subjects revolted from him, and elected his brother Ostomafades, who soon after took off his head. In all other cases their kings seem to have been in high esteem with the people, as we may guess from the following circumstance out of Herodotus.

b WHEN any of their monarchs fell sick, they sent immediately for three of their most famous prophets (C), who commonly told him that some Scythian whom they named had perjured himself by swearing by the royal throne, which it seems was their most solemn oath. The accused person was thereupon seized, and accused before the king of having brought this distemper upon him by his perjury. If he denied the fact, more prophets were sent for; if they confirmed the evidence, the man was immediately beheaded, and his goods were divided among the three first accusers. But if they acquitted him, a new supply of them was to be sent for; and if the majority of them did absolve him, then the first accusers were tied hand and feet, and set in a cart loaded with faggots, and drawn by oxen. And after they had stopp'd the false prophets' mouths, as they then called him, they set fire to the wood, which consumed the cart and man, and seldom failed burning the oxen to death. Our author adds, that the male-children of those whom the king condemned to death seldom escaped the same fate.

c ANOTHER instance of their great respect to their monarchs is the pompous solemnity of their funerals, which was performed as follows: the embalmers received the body covered with wax, they opened and cleansed the belly, and having filled it with bruised cypress, incense, parsley and anise-seeds; they sewed it up again, and placed the corpse on a chariot, and conveyed it from one tribe to another through all the provinces of his kingdom. Every province, where they received the funeral procession, was obliged to imitate the royal Scythians in their mournful ceremonies, which consisted in cutting off one part of their ear, shaving their heads, wounding themselves in their forehead, nose and arm, and piercing their left hand with an arrow; and in this guise, they accompanied the hearse to the next province, till it came at length to that of the Gerrians, which was the remotest in the kingdom, and was situate along that part of the Borysthenes, where it begins to be navigable. Here the corpse was deposited into a large square hole made in the earth, upon a bed incompassed round with spears, which they covered with timber; and spread a canopy over the whole monument. In the vacant places of it, they placed one of his concubines, a cook, a groom, a waiter, a messenger, some horses, all strangled, and a number of necessary utensils, and among others some golden cups. This being done they threw the earth upon it, endeavouring to raise the mound as high as they could. As soon as the year was expired, they chose fifty young men of the king's officers, who were always to be Scythians, those monarchs having the power of chusing whom they pleased to their service, and never being attended by slaves. These young men, with an equal number of horses, were strangled, their bowels were taken out, and their bellies stuffed with straw. The bodies of the young men were set astride upon the horses, and fastened to them by an iron stake. The horses thus mounted were set upon semicircular boards supported by four pieces of timber, and placed at a convenient distance from each other round the monument, the horses having a loose rein fastened to another post set up for that purpose^b.

(C) These were only a kind of pretended conjurers, who consulted certain omens, and divined or made a shew of divining, by willow sticks, gathered up into bundles, which they loosened and spread upon the ground, and then taking and bundling them up again, uttering all the while some conjuring words. It was by this art that they pretended to dive into hidden causes, and to pry into futurity. The Scythians seem to have been very much addicted to this kind of superstition by the great number of these sham diviners, which they had amongst them. Nor was this trade confined to the men: the women had much the larger share of it; and as they did not pretend to prognosticate by means of those wands, or any other conjuring tricks, but rather by an immediate inspiration from some of their deities, they were held in the greatest veneration, and their oracles, which were consulted upon all emergencies, were received as the infallible answers or commands of the gods, and obeyed with the same readiness†.

Deities.

Mars.

Altars.

THE Scythians worshipped a plurality of gods and goddesses, but that which they reckoned their principal deity was Vesta, whom they called Tabiti. The two next were Jupiter, whom they called Papeus, and Apia, or the earth, which they esteemed his wife. Jupiter, it seems, they challenged as their progenitor, and Vesta for their queen, as appears by the answer which one of their kings sent to Darius, when he came to subdue them to his empire *; besides these they worshipped Apel'o, the celestial Venus and Neptune, under the names Ætiosrus, Artimpasa and Tbamimafades. But their favourite god seems to have been that of war, to whom alone they dedicated temples, altars, and images. How his temples were built, which Herodotus speaks of, he doth not tell us: neither is it easy for us to guess. It doth not even appear from any other ancient authors, or from any other monuments, that ever they built any properly so called. Groves indeed, and very sumptuous ones too, they were famous for erecting to this deity. In these they affected to have one or more oaks of a monstrous size, which were accounted so sacred, that it was sacrilege, and was punished with the severest death, to lop so much as a branch or sprig, or even to wound the bark. These they never failed to sprinkle plentifully with the blood of their victims, insomuch that the rind of some of the oldest of them was covered, or even incrustate with it †. We are therefore inclined to believe, that Herodotus, who learned these things by word of mouth, and had never seen them himself, might, for want of a good interpreter, mistake them for temples, and suppose them to be but like those of other nations.

How spacious these groves must have been, may be seen in the last quoted antiquarian, or be guessed at by the vast extent of the altars, which Herodotus tells us they erected in them to that favourite deity, one of which at least they were obliged to have in every precinct. It was to be made of small wood tied up into bundles, and to cover three stades of land in length and breadth, though it was not proportionable in its height. The top of it, which was quadrangular, had three sides perpendicular, and the fourth had a gradual declivity, to render the top of it easy of access. One hundred and fifty loads of faggots were to be brought yearly to each altar, to supply those which had been putrified by the inclemency of the winter. On the top of each of these heaps was erected an old iron scymetar, which stood there as the image, or rather emblem of the deity. To him, besides all other cattle, in common with their other gods, and in much greater number, they sacrificed horses, which were a martial creature; and what was more shocking, every hundredth man they took prisoner from their enemies. This last bloody offering was made by pouring a libation of wine upon the captive's head, after which they cut his throat, and received his blood into a bowl, with which ascending to the top of the altar, they went and washed the deity's sword. As to the victim, they only cut off his right arm close to the shoulder, and throwing it up into the air, they left it exposed in the place where it fell, and the rest of the body in that where it was killed.

As to their other victims, which they sacrificed either to Mars or to any other deity, they observed the same rites every where, without variation; they brought the beast and tied its four feet together with a slip knot, and he who officiated as priest came behind, and at once loosed the cord, and knocked the victim down. Whilst it was falling, he called upon the deity to whom it was offered, and then strangled it with a cord, which he twisted with a stick; and as soon as it was dead, he set about flaying and dressing it without any previous libation or ceremony. The flesh was put into pots, and whenever these were not ready at hand, into the paunch of the creature, mixing with it a proportionable quantity of water; and if wood could not be had, they burnt the bones instead of it. When the flesh was sufficiently boiled, the priest made an offering of part of the meat and intestines to the deity, by throwing it before its altar, and the rest was, we may suppose, bestowed to feast the priest and votaries. Thus in cases of necessity, as when they went out to war, and the like, they made the victim furnish them with all things necessary for the sacrifice. Of all beasts the horse was esteemed the noblest, and consequently the most acceptable victim. As for swine, they detested it, not only as unfit to eat, but even to be suffered to live among them. They took care also to offer to their gods the first-fruits of their cattle, ground, and of the spoil they took in war. Some considerable part of the latter they were wont to send to the delphic

- a Apollo: it was usually conveyed thither by a number of their most honourable virgins, and under a sufficient escort. But the length and difficulty of the way, and the dangers, and other obstacles of the journey, our author tells us † obliged them to discontinue it. This is all that we find remarkable concerning their religion.

But before we come to speak of their manners, customs, and such other particulars, it will be necessary to caution our readers once for all, that as we receive a great part of our intelligence from Herodotus, Homer, and other Greek authors, who cannot be supposed to have been well affected to the Scythians, by whom their country had been so often invaded, plundered, ravaged, and sometimes almost destroyed; we must not give too implicate a credit to many things which they relate, very much to the dishonour of that ancient and warlike nation. Some of them we shall have occasion to confute in the sequel of this history, and others are of so horrid a nature as to exceed our belief, especially when we compare them with the character which Justin gives of them, and as it has been learnedly vindicated by Bocbart, as we have lately shewn; this caution once premised, we hope our readers will the better judge of what we are now going to give out of those authors concerning the customs of this nation which are not to be found in any of them without some mixture of barbarity.

Thus we are told that their alliances and contracts were ratified with the following ceremonies: they poured some wine into an earthen vessel, into which the contracting parties were to mingle some of their own blood, which they drew by a slight incision made in some part of their body. They then dipped into the mixture the prints of some warlike weapons, such as a simitar, arrow, dart, javelin, or battle-ax. The parties then uttered some dire imprecations on the first breaker of the covenant, and having took each of them a draught of the liquor, they desired some of the most considerable among the by-standers to pledge them, and to be witnesses of the contract, which being usually complied with by them, the bargain was reckoned so sacred, that they thought no punishment severe enough either in this life or in the next for the breaker of it. Contrasts.

d THEIR warlike temper and exploits were sufficiently known to the ancients; scarce is there any nation to be met with in history so famous for conquering where-ever they carried their arms, even as auxiliaries, and themselves remaining still unconquered. Their frugal and simple manner of life may indeed be supposed to have been a great preservative against such invasions, as other more opulent and luxurious nations were exposed to. But 'tis plain, this was not always the case, since we find they were once invaded by the king of Persia at the head of a most puissant army, from the power of which nothing but their valour and policy could have delivered them: but of this in its proper place, as well as of their conquest of greater Asia, which could not be wrested out of their hands, but by the blackest treachery. But upon the whole, such was their strength and courage whenever they entered into an offensive or defensive war, that as Theucydides himself tells us, no nation either in Europe or Asia could equal them either for strength, valour, or conduct; nor indeed any thing resist their power, provided they were but unanimous among themselves. Valours

SUCH care they took to cultivate this martial genius among them, that even their women were inured to it betimes, insomuch that they could not be admitted into matrimony till they had killed at least one enemy with their own hands*, as we have hinted already. As for their youth, they were not without some considerable encouragements to inspire them with martial valour, or indeed rather ferocity, f if Herodotus doth not bely them: for he tells us that they were wont to drink the blood of the first prisoner they took, and to present the heads of all the men they killed in fight to their monarch; these were either returned or registered, and intitled the person to several privileges, such as being present at some publick feasts, sharing the spoil of their enemies, and such like; to which no man was to pretend to till he had killed at least one enemy. As therefore the worth and merit of a man did rise in proportion to the number of heads he had knocked off, they used to take the skins of the slain, to stretch, dry, and tan them, and then hang them at their horses' bridles, where they served both for trophies and napkins to the owner; he being always most esteemed, who wore the greatest number of them. Their pride, or rather barbarity, if we may believe our author, went so far with some of them, that they took off and dressed the whole skins of the slain, and covered both their quivers and horses, and sometimes decked their own bodies with them *.

HAD they only exercised this kind of savage pride against those who came to invade them, it might indeed admit of some mitigation, as it would have been done not only in defence of their country, and in determent to all invaders of it; but as they might naturally enough think such men deserved no better fate, who attempted the conquest of a country, which had nothing to tempt or satisfy the avarice or ambition of the conqueror (E). But it doth not appear from our author, that they gave much better quarters to those whose territories they did invade. And it would have been cruel and impolitic in them to have condemned their young women to celibacy, till they were able to produce some such trophies of their martial prowess, if they were not to be gained in any but a defensive war, which their poverty joined to their known valour will not permit us to suppose to have been frequent enough for that end. It is then more likely from what we quoted above out of Theucydides, that as they are affirmed to have lived mostly upon plunder, instead of going out of their vast territories, they made mutual incursions one tribe against another, which they again retaliated upon the first opportunity, without forgetting however their affinity so far, as not to joyn their forces against a common enemy or invader, whenever necessity required it.

How populous the Scythians were is not agreed. If it be allowed that they made such frequent and bloody inroads one upon another, we cannot but suppose that it must have thinned them exceedingly. On the other hand if we consider their plain and laborious way of living, their climate, constant exercise, hardiness and other such-like advantageous circumstances, which rendered them lusty and strong, prolific and long-lived, one can hardly conceive they could be other than a populous nation: for we are told that very few died of sickness, but all in general lived to a good old age, inasmuch that many of them being weary of the world, before death took them out of it; it was usual with such to hasten their exit by throwing themselves from some eminence into the sea, or into some river^d. Herodotus however, who seems in doubt whether they were indeed so populous as some, or so thin as other reports represent them, gives us an authentic instance and monument in favour of the former, which is as follows: they had it seems a custom not uncommon to other nations^e; at their first taking of the field to muster their fighting men, and to make every man cast an arrow, and according to our author, the head or point of one, into a proper receptacle, which at their return from the expedition was again taken up. By this they could easily compute not only the number of their men, but also that of their slain, or of those who either ran away, or absented themselves from the war. It was at some such muster as this that one of their kings, whom Herodotus names Ariantes^e, being present, and observing these heads of arrows to amount to an immense bulk and weight, as he had indeed a prodigious army under him, ordered them to be melted and cast, or made into that large capacious vessel we have lately spoken of, and which our author tells us was still extant in his time, and though full six inches thick, yet was large enough to hold 600 amphoras, that is about 50 hogheads, and remained still a monument of this prodigious army. There is indeed no making an exact estimate from this story, supposing it

(E) This was the argument which Justin tells us (5), they made use of to dissuade the king of Egypt from attempting a war against them, for said they to his heralds, it were madness for the opulent Egyptians to invade so poor a nation as ours, where they could get nothing but death and wounds; whereas the Scythians would fall upon them with utmost fierceness at the sight of so rich plunder as victory would invite them to. Such a message they sent afterwards to Darius when he had entered Scythia, that as they had neither cities, houses, fields, vineyards, nor indeed any other valuable treasures in their country, except their families, and the sepulchres of their ancestors, for which however they were always known to fight with uncommon bravery; the invader ran a much greater risk than they (6).

- a literally true: but might not this unwieldy vessel have been at first designed only to keep the arrows which every soldier threw in, and the other part of the story have been foisted in, in process of time. However supposing the fact as related, and that it must have been a prodigious army that could furnish metal enough for such a monstrous vessel, yet might it not therefore necessarily follow that the Scythian nation was more populous than its neighbours, considering the vast extent of it. But what seems to be a stronger argument for it, is, the colonies which they were continually sending out, chiefly towards the southern parts of the world, of which we shall have further occasion to speak in the sequel.
- b As they cultivated no arts nor sciences except that of war, nor scarcely any trade or commerce except pasturage, the reader must expect us to be very barren on these Arts and sciences. two heads. Theucydides in the place above quoted seems indeed to commend their industry and sagacity in procuring all things necessary for life, in such a manner, as would incline one to believe them to have been great encouragers of industry and manufacture: and another Greek author speaks much of the trade and commerce which they carried on with all the sea-coasts of the Hellepont *. But as to the latter we are much inclined to believe that, like some of his predecessors, he has mistook them for the Celtes, who as we have observed in a former section, were become great merchants both by sea and land under their king Mercury. For as for the Scythians, their way of living was altogether incompatible with it, as will appear by and by. They do not so much as seem to have known any thing of writing, till they brought it with them from Asia, after their twenty-eight years invasion of it: neither do we find any footsteps of their having had such poetic historians as were the Curetes among the Celtes or the Bards and Druids among the Gauls. Herodotus, who has wrote so much concerning them, doth not so much as hint his having received his intelligence from any of their records, but barely from tradition; and that is one reason why we omit many fabulous things he has said of them from the common report of their neighbours; since it is hardly to be expected they either could or would give a true character of a nation, with whom they had no commerce
- d except in a hostile way.

Their language is still more unknown to us, whatever discoveries some modern Language. antiquarians may fancy to have made about it. The vast extent of their territories, together with their intermingling with other nations, could not but cause it to split itself into a vast number of dialects, from which most probably have sprung the Muscovitish, Slavonick, Polish, Danish, Sweedish, Saxon, and many others; between which, one can but barely discover affinity enough to make us believe them sprung from the same mother. This we may however venture to affirm, as more than a probable conjecture from a visible vein of the Celtic still preserved, as we have seen to this day among us, and which runs through all those various languages; that they did not anciently differ much more from it, than the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac.

e Neither is it so much to be wondered at that they should have branched out into such a vast variety, as that they should still preserve so much of their pristine affinity as we find they do. We have in a former section endeavoured to account for the great number of words and phrases that are found not only in those northern languages, but also in the Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Persic, which shew them to have been so many dialects of the old Celtic; if those few relicks of the Scythian which we have left in the names of their kings, tribes, and districts, do not so plainly appear to be of f Celtic extraction, we must remember they have past through so many different hands, and have so often changed their dress, especially among the Greeks, that they may be easily supposed to have quite lost their ancient form. We may add that some of them are perfectly Greek, or translated from the Scythian into that language (F).

Their chief manufactures seem to have consisted mostly in building their wag- Manufactures. gons for their families and baggage, which being covered with the skins of beasts, they must have had some notion of tanning of them, as well as those with which they covered their own bodies. We may likewise reasonably suppose that they fabricated

(F) Of this kind is, the name of the Qagur, a Scythian tribe, so called in Herodotus from their living upon the eggs of wild fowl, and comes from the Greek word The Nomades were so called from their pasture. Of the same extraction, were the Alpipedes, Almopagi, and several others, which we need not point out to the reader.

their own weapons, which were simitars, javelins, axes, but especially bows and arrows, at which they are said to have been so expert, that their very children were trained to shoot at a mark even as they rode on horseback; insomuch that it became a common proverb, That the Scythians were as dextrous at their bows as the Greeks were at their lyre. Hence Cyaxares, king of Media, is reported to have sent his son to be brought up under them, to learn the use of the bow. They were no less expert horsemen^f (G), insomuch that we find them called ιστοροται by Herodotus and Lucian. And their very women are affirmed to have been so well inured to riding and shooting, that they did not come one jot behind the men. The ancients observe that they had neither mules nor asses; and the reason they give is that the country was too cold for those creatures. Experience has since shewn the contrary, at least with respect to the latter; but the true reason seems to be that the horses, which they bred in great quantities, could answer all the purposes of the other two, and at the same time be more swift and expeditious than they, whenever occasion required it.

As for agriculture, it doth not appear that they had any. Herodotus indeed tells us of one province of them, whose inhabitants called themselves Olbiopolitans, and the Greeks Borysthenians, as they lived on the north side of that river; and these he likewise called husbandmen, because they sowed grain, not for food, but for sale^h. But the rest of the Scythians wholly neglected it, chusing rather to roam where they found the best pasture for their cattle, and contenting themselves with the spontaneous product of the earth, without being at the trouble of manuring it. And this is in all likelihood the cause why we read of so many deserts, vast forests, and large uninhabited tracts of land between tribe and tribe, in the writings of ancient historians and geographers. What they did with the wool of their flocks we read not, but by their cloathing themselves with the skins of wild or tame beastsⁱ, as we are told they did, one may conclude they did not manufacture it. And as those skins were of their own dressing, they wanted still less the help of foreign manufactures. Smiths they must have had, both for their various arms, making their waggons, and other necessary tools; and as to their arrows, darts, javelins, and such like weapons, if their heads were made of copper, as it is probable they were, if the story we have related above of a large copper vessel that was made of them be literally true, there was still less art required in making them, since they might easily cast them in a mould. Their bows might also be made of the same metal like those of other ancient nations, though it is not improbable they might also have some smiths to forge iron and steel weapons, besides those they might take from their enemies. It is indeed hardly to be supposed they could make their waggons without the help of such artists, though upon the whole it doth appear that they wanted as few trades as any nation, and used none they could possibly do without.

THEIR chief riches and food consisting in their numerous herds, they entrusted the care of them to Shepherds, who were a lower rank of Scythians below the martial men, and had slaves and captives under them. They used to move from pasture to pasture, with the persons and families, which were unfit to go to the wars. These did chiefly live upon honey and milk, especially that of their mares, from which creature, if Herodotus was rightly informed, they had a strange way of forcing plenty of it by blowing wind into their privities. What provisions the warlike sort made, when they were absent from their flocks, we cannot guess, and it is likely when they came into an enemies country, they took care to seize upon all the cattle they could meet with.

FROM an instance or two we read of their kings, it seems as if they allowed of polygamy, and were not over strict in their marriages. Some we find took wives a from other nations, and one of them we read of who married his own father's widow, but whether the same liberty was allowed to private men we cannot affirm. The reason the Scythians gave for abhorring the bacchanalian feasts of the Greeks, namely, that it was unreasonable to suppose that a god should drive men into all the violent transports of madness, seems to shew that drunkenness was not common among them. And indeed we do not find that they were much given to feasting. Feasting. One wine feast they had however once a year in every district, for those who, as we hinted before, had signalized themselves by killing one or more of their enemies. Another we read of which was used at funerals, and with which we shall close this article, since we have no more to say concerning their other customs.

b We have already spoken of the funeral obsequies which they paid to their monarchs. When any other person died, his nearest relations caused his embalmed body to be carried in a chariot from house to house among his friends and acquaintance, who received and feasted them in their turn, setting part of the same things before the deceased, which they did to their guests. This was continued forty days, Funeral obsequies. after which the person was buried, and his attendants went and purified themselves, not by any ablution, but by the smoke of some hemp-seed peculiar to the country, which being thrown upon some burning stones, emitted a much more agreeable perfume than the frankincense used in Greece, and so transported the company as to set them a howling aloud. This served instead of washing, which the Scythians, our author tells us, never practised. Not even the women, who used, instead of it, to How their women perfume their beauty. anoint their bodies and face with a paste, which they made with cypress, cedar, and frankincense, ground upon a rough stone, and soaked in water, which paste being taken off the next day, rendered their skins clean, shining and sweet.

There remains that we should say a word or two of those other petty kingdoms of Scythia, and of some particularities, wherein they differed from the royal Scythians. For whether they were all really descended from the same stock, as we supposed it in the beginning, or whether they did spring from some other of Magog's brethren, yet since they inhabited so considerable a part of Scythia, and made such figure in the history of their wars in conjunction with the royal tribes, we cannot d well omit, at least those of the greatest note.

The Sarmatians we have already hinted, are affirmed by Herodotus to have been Sarmatians. the offspring of the Scythians (H) and Amazons. These warlike women, or, as their Scythian name Aior Patta imports, Man-slayers, in their flight from the Grecians, having landed near the precipices of the Palus Meotis belonging to the free Scythians, and having been persuaded to be married to them, did in their turn prevail upon them to leave that part of Scythia, where they pretended they could not conveniently live with them, and to pass into the province of Sarmatia on the other side the Tanais. Hence our author says the Sarmatian women retained still the Amazonian temper and way of life, being more warlike than the rest of the Scythian females, and the e language of the country became a corrupt Scythian, because the Amazons never could perfectly learn that language, but taught it their offspring, corrupt as themselves spake it. Here it chiefly was that virgins were unqualified for matrimony till they had dispatched an enemy in the field.

The Taurians had this inhuman custom, that they sacrificed to a virgin all that Taurians. were shipwrecked, and all the Grecians which they caught upon their coasts. This bloody offering was performed by knocking the person on the head with a club,

(H) Some authors however, from a passage in Pliny (8), where he tells us, that they were reported to be descended from the Medes; and another out of Justin, who tells us that the language of the Parthians was a mixture of Scythic and Medic (9), have supposed that the Sarmatians, who most resemble the Parthians, were the offspring of the Medes; and that the name of Sarmatian was only a corruption of the Chalde שַׂרְמַתַּי Sheer Madai (10), a residue or sprout of the Medes. We can affirm nothing certain about it, but yet we think Herodotus may be more relied upon than the other two, who spoke at a much greater distance of time and place than he. However, if what they say be true, it proves what we observed before, that the descendants of Gomer, and his brothers, did make their migrations as it were in columns, and only separated by degree from each other.

As to the Parthians, though their name in the Scythic and Celtic signifies separated, it seems probable that they were rather Germans or Celts driven out by their own countrymen, who having forced them into a country of the Medes, were by them called Parthians, or banished (11).

after many dire imprecations, and flinging his carcass down the hill on which their a temple was built, or as others told our author, by burying the body, and reserving only the head to be stuck on a pole. These Taurians pretended that the virgin Demon whom they thus worshipped was Iphigenia Agamemnon's daughter. They lived chiefly by war and rapine, and were very cruel to those that fell into their hands.

Agathyrsians. The Agathyrsians are said to have had their women in common in order to link the men more strictly together, and to prevent jealousies and other ill effects of matrimony. The Neurian province being infested with dangerous serpents, they were at length forced to leave it for that of the Budians. They observed the customs of Scythia in most particulars, only pretended to greater skill in magic than they, and were reported to be transformed into wolves for a few days, after which they resumed b their own shape¹.

Budians or Androphagi. THE worst of all were the Androphagi or men-eaters, who observed neither law nor justice, and had nothing in common with the rest, but their dress, and breeding of cattle. The Melanchanians were so called for affecting to go always in black: they followed the Scythian customs, except that they fed upon human flesh, which the free Scythians did not, nor indeed any other tribes, at least as common food, but only on some particular occasions, such as we shall have occasion to mention by-and-by. The Budians were a populous nation famed for blue eyes and red hair: in this province above all the rest did they build them a city, and called it Gelonus, whose houses and high walls were of timber, and each side of the walls was three hundred stades c in length: it had temples and chapels dedicated to the Grecian gods; and here they celebrated the Bacchanalia triennially. The people of the province differed from that of the city, in that the former applied themselves to the keeping of cattle, and these to till their land, plant gardens, and live upon the product of them and of their corn fields; in a word, these Gelonians had so much better minds than the Budians, that they seemed, and in our author's opinion really were, another people. This province yielded otters, beavers, and other such animals: their skins sewed together were used for garments, and the testicles against hysteric diseases. The Owones Panoti Arimaspæi in Scythia Europæa we have spoken of in a former note, and have nothing more to add to it here, except that they did more resemble the d royal Scythians than any others, in most particulars, especially in their warlike genius, and simplicity of living.

Scythian Nomades. THE last two nations or tribes of Scythians worth our notice were the Scythian Nomades, inhabiting as we have seen upon the north-west of the Caspian sea, and the Massagetes on the east. As for the Amazons, as they are accounted somewhat fabulous, we shall speak of them in a separate note (I). The Nomades differed so little

(I) Concerning these so famed, and so much questioned female warriors, it were endless to trouble ourselves with all that has been written on either side; those seem to come nearest the truth, who neither altogether reject what has been said of them by the ancients, nor altogether credit all the wonders that are recorded of them. If we compare the warlike genius of the Scythian women in general, and more particularly that of the Sarmatians, in whose neighbourhood lived these Amazons, if they were not originally of the same blood; with the occasion which gave birth to this strange kind of government, namely, the treacherous murder of their husbands, and their being in danger of becoming a prey to their murderers, and in a strange country; if, I say, we consider all these circumstances, there will be nothing so improbable in the brave and masculine method they took to save themselves from slavery, and to revenge the slaughter of their husbands. We may add, that the Scythian as well as Celtic women, were anciently held in great authority and veneration for their skill in divination above the men, inasmuch that the latter are even upbraided by ancient authors (12) for suffering them to assist at and steer their councils as they pleased, and to have even presided in all courts of judicature, and other assemblies; in which their judgment was generally reckoned decisive, because they were supposed to be divinely inspired (13). Being therefore thus inured to council, execution, and warlike exploits, exasperated by the treacherous butchery of their husbands, and become, as it were, desperate at the prospect of their impending slavery; we need not wonder that they so soon fell upon the most effectual means of making a noble defence, and, like so many heroines, having chosen one or two of the wisest and stoutest among them, to lead them to an offensive war against their enemies, they carried it on with such courage and constancy, and with such surprising success. And if their warlike temper, their government, customs, valour, conduct, and achievements, have been exaggerated beyond credibility, it is no more than hath been done with respect to other nations, governments, kingdoms, and conquerors, whom it were nevertheless absurd to censure as fabulous upon that account. It is certainly more equitable to make the same allowance in both cases, than to suppose that so many historians, who have written of either a little from the royal Scythians, except in this appellative, that we shall need say no more about them, than that they did, like them, follow a wandering life, living no longer in one place than they found plenty of pasture for their cattle; after which they removed to fresh grounds, and when called to the wars, left their families and flocks with their shepherds till their return.

The occasion of this new female government was as follows: Two noble Scythian youths, whom our author calls Hylines and Scolopisus (15), having been forced to yield to a contrary faction, about the time of the first irruptions of the Scythians into Asia, and in the reign of Sesostris king of Egypt, retired into part of Cappadocia, with their wives and families. They brought with them also a very considerable number of warlike youths, by whose assistance they got possession of the region of Thermosiria on the river Thermodon, from which they used to make frequent incursions into the neighbouring countries for several years, till they were at length all treacherously murdered by those nations. Their wives were no sooner apprised of it, than, partly through fear of slavery, and partly through desire of revenge, they put themselves under the conduct of some of their greatest heroines, and prepared for a bloody war against the murderers. That nothing might obstruct their fury, they renounced all future marriages with mankind, calling it an unworthy kind of slavery, and destroyed the residue of their husbands, who had escaped the slaughter, that so being all upon the same foot, they might pursue their designs with equal ardour and courage. The consequence was, that they fell upon the conquerors with such bravery and success, that they totally overthrew them, greatly enlarged their own dominions, and made their neighbours sue to them for peace. One of their conditions was, that they should yearly have a month's intercourse with each other, in order to keep up the breed, after which they brought up all their girls in their own way, cutting off their right breasts, that they might be no obstruction to their shooting, whence they came to be called Amazons; and as for the boys that were born to them, they either killed them, according to our author, or sent them back to their fathers according to Herodotus (15).

These surprising exploits were achieved under the government and conduct of two famous queens Lampeto or Lampeto, and Martesia or Marpesia, who boasted themselves to be the daughters of Mars; and having carried their conquests into Asia, and built some cities there, this last, who had been left there with an army to secure their conquest, whilst the former returned home laden with spoils, was afterwards surprised, and cut off with the rest of her female warriors by some bands of barbarians.

She was succeeded by her daughter Ortara or Orthya, whose valour, added to her living in perpetual virginity, did not a little raise the glory of the Amazonian name. To this succeeded Antiotha, whose sisters Hyspita and Menalippe, are reported to have challenged Hercules and Theseus, and to have been with great difficulty overcome by those two heroes. 4. Penthesilea was another famous Amazonian queen, who is said to have come at the head of an army of her viragos to the assistance of Priamus king of Troy. 'Tis added, that she was the inventor of the battle-ax, and was at length killed by Pyrrius, the son of Achilles. Some other particulars related of those heroines smell so much of the fable, that we shall dwell no longer upon them (16).

The bloody re-encounter between Thomiris, another of their warlike queens, and Cyrus king of Persia, has been taken notice of in another chapter; and the amorous one between Alexander the Great, and the famous queen Thalestris, shall be spoken of in its proper place. It is under this last that the Amazonian race and kingdom is said to have received its final period.

We must not omit some other memorable occurrences concerning a colony of these female warriors, which happened in the reign of some of the foregoing queens; it is not easy to guess which; and which are mentioned by another author (17) in his history of the Scythians.

The Greeks, who had obtained a signal victory over the Amazons, near the river Thermodon, were carrying off the residue that had escaped the slaughter, in three ships, to their own country. While they were at sea, the Amazons conceived against them, and killed all the men they had on board with them; but being altogether unacquainted with navigation, even with the use of the rudder, sails, and oars, they were driven by the wind and tide, to the precincts of the Palus Meotis, in the territories of the free Scythians. Here they got ashore, and turning up into the country, they seized upon the best sort of horses they could come at, and began to plunder the inhabitants. The Scythians, unacquainted with their language, sex, and dress, could not tell what to make of these invaders: they took them at first to be youths, but after a firmish or two, in which some of them were taken prisoners, had convinced them of the contrary; they resolved not to kill them, but to send a party of youths to watch their motions, with orders, that if they were attacked by them, they should flee from them; and as soon as they ceased their pursuit, encamp at the nearest distance they could, resolved if possible to have some children by these brave women. These observing that the Scythian youths did not come with any hostile design, suffered them to continue in their neighbouring station, whilst they, having nothing but their bows and arrows, lived in their old manner by hunting and plunder. It was their custom to withdraw themselves from the rest about noon, either single or by couples to comply with the necessities of nature, which when the Scythians observed, they did so likewise by the means one of these walking alone met with a single Amazon, and though they could not speak to each other, yet she found a way to let him understand that if he would meet her there on the next day, accompanied with another Scythian, she would be willing to be a companion with her. The upshot was, that both the camps were presently joined into one, and every Scythian took to wife the Amazon, whom chance threw in his way. The women had no sooner got a smattering of the Scythian language, than they were given to understand by their new husbands, that they had their parents and possessions in the neighbourhood, to whom they had a care to return, having the women to follow them thither. But these replied, that as they had ever been used to draw the bow, dart a javelin, mount a horse, and all such warlike exercises, to which they supposed the Scythian women altogether unaccustomed; they could

THE Massagetes did likewise imitate the free Scythians in their habit, manner of a living, arms and warlike genius; but they used, besides bows and arrows, for which those were so famed, javelins and scymeters. Brass served them instead of steel for making their offensive weapons, and as to their defensive ones, they added some ornaments made of gold, especially in their helmets, belts, and armour. Their horses were likewise fenced with a breast-plate of brass, whilst their bridles, and other furniture, was adorned with gold; for silver and iron were not used by them, because their country did not produce them. Though every man was obliged to marry a wife, yet they held them all in common; so that when a man met with a woman to his liking, he took her into his chariot or waggon, and lay with her without any further ceremony, than the hanging up of his quiver at the head of it. This custom, Herodotus tells us, was unjustly attributed to all the Scythians by the Greeks, whereas it was peculiar to the Massagetes only^a. A more inhuman custom than this the same author tells us they had, that when a man had once attained to old age, which was not so much limited by law as inferred from concurring symptoms; all his relations met, and sacrificed him, together with a number of cattle of several kinds, and having boiled the flesh all together, they sat down to it as to a feast. This kind of death was accounted by them the most happy, as that of dying by sickness was reckoned unfortunate, because these last were to be buried, instead of coming to the honour of being sacrificed to their gods, and feasted upon by their nearest relations, and intimate friends. The sun was the only deity they worshipped, and to him c. they sacrificed horses, which being reckoned the noblest and swiftest of all creatures, they thought most proper to be offered to the noblest and swiftest of all the gods. They neither sowed nor planted, but contented themselves with the milk and flesh of their cattle, and with fish, of which the Iaxartes did yield them a very great plenty^r. In a word, the two forementioned customs excepted, they were esteemed the noblest of all the Scythians^s, being equal to the royal tribe in valour and prowess, and exceeding them in opulence.

The history of the SCYTHIAN kings.

Scythian chronology not to be attained.

WHAT has been observed in some of the foregoing sections concerning the barrenness of Scythian records, and of other historians concerning that nation, will easily convince our readers, that it would be a vain attempt to give any light to the chronology of it, or even to a regular history of their kings, whose names and exploits lie occasionally scattered in Herodotus, and other more recent historians without any order of time, or any indice, whereby one may give the least guess into it, at least till their invasion of Asia, and engaging into wars with some of the Asiatic monarchs. Till then, it is probable, they confined their conquests to Europe, and made their incursions only against their neighbours, which though perhaps originally descended from the same stock, yet, like a great many other nations, such as the Ammonites and Moabites, Edomites and Israelites, and many more, had either quite obliterated, or were become regardless of their former affinity. And this could not bear the thoughts of going to live among them, and exchange their warlike way of living for their indolent one. They therefore exhorted them, if they retained still the same conjugal affection for them, to go and receive their several portions of wealth from their parents, and to return to them, which they readily complied with. At their return, their wives acquainted them farther, that since they had deprived them of their parents, and committed several depredations in that country, they thought it much safer to go and fix their habitation on the other side the Tanais. This was likewise agreed to, and having crossed that river, after three days march eastward of that river, and three more northward from the lake Meotis, they arrived and settled in the country of Sarmatia, where they continued still in our author's time. Hence it is that the Sarmatian women are by far the greatest warriors of all the Scythians; and hence proceeds the corruption of their language; for the Amazons not having been able to learn, and consequently to teach their children the true Scythic, the Sarmatian became a mixture of that and of the Amazonic. Thus came the fame of those female warriors to spread itself into Europe and Asia as for those of America, they shall be spoken of in their proper place.

a seems to have been most probably their case, because they cultivated no arts, but that of war and plunder, without troubling themselves about recording their acts and genealogies. The Celtes indeed had their Curetes; and other European nations their Bards and Druids, who celebrated their exploits in verse, as we have shewn in a former section; but we do not find any footsteps of the Scythians having had any such persons among them; so that tradition, such as it could be got, seems to have been the only fountain from which our antient historians have drawn all their intelligence concerning that nation, and which they have been forced to convey to us in as confused and irregular a manner as they had received it.

b THE following is a list of Scythian kings, as we find them mentioned by Herodotus, Justin, Diodorus, Strabo, and Mela; but without any note of time, either about the beginning, length, or end of their reigns. Neither can we affirm, that they succeeded one another in the order we have set them down, or even whether they all reigned over the same nations, or some of them over one or more tribes, and others over other tribes. However we shall to the list of their names subjoin such particular facts as we have recorded of any of them, and with which we shall be forced to close this history.

Scythes is that fabulous son of Hercules, begotten on a monster, of whom we have Scythes spoken in a former note, and from whom the Scythian nation was affirmed by the d fabulous Greeks to have taken their name, if not to be descended^a. This history seems to have been invented by the Greeks for no other end than to fally the origin of the noble and warlike Scythians, to whom they were no doubt vastly inferior in power, courage, virtue, and other accomplishments, as the reader will easily see by comparing the history of these, with what we shall relate in a subsequent chapter of the more obscure and barbarous beginnings of the Grecian nation.

Sagillus is said to have sent his son Panaxagorus, who is perhaps the same with Sagillus. Protothyas, the father of Madyes, with an army of horse, to the assistance of Orithya, queen of the Amazons, against Theseus king of Athens. To persuade him to it, she let him know that the Amazons were of Scythian race, that it was mere e necessity that had obliged them to dispatch their surviving husbands, and to erect themselves into a female monarchy, and to engage in this war. In a word, she used all the arguments that could induce the Scythian king to her assistance: his son came accordingly with a large army of horse, but presently after his arrival, upon some disgust which that prince took at those brave heroines, he left them to the mercy of their enemies, who soon after gained the victory over them^b.

Madyes, of whom we have spoken in a former chapter^c, and supposed to be the same with the Indatyrfus of Strabo, though different from that of Herodotus, was the son of Protothyas, and a warlike prince. Under his conduct it was that the Scythians, having drove the Cymmerians or northern Celtes out of Europe, and pursued f them in Asia, invaded the country of the Medes, and held the greater part of upper Asia in subjection twenty-eight years. The occasion of their quarrel with the Cymmerians, and of this Asiatic irruption, is indeed no where to be found; but may however be easily guessed at. Scythia, we observed, was more fruitful of men than of food and sustenance: it was hemmed on the north by intolerable frosts and snows: where should they then discharge their over-swelling multitudes, but towards the more inviting regions of the south, where the inhabitants being probably as much accustomed to an easy and delicate life, as those were to a hardy and warlike one, were most likely to yield them if not their country, yet at least a free passage through it, and assist them with all necessaries of life, that they might be the sooner a rid of them: hence it is that they so swiftly passed into Asia, and led their victorious army even into Egypt. But here we are told they were prevailed upon by their king Sammiticus, either by presents or intreaties, to proceed no farther. They made likewise some incursions into the land of the Philistines; and it was in this expedition that they took the city of Bethsheam from the half tribe of Menasseh on this side Jordan, and called it by their name the city of the Scythians or Scythopolis, as we have hinted in the history of the Medes *. In their return into Syria some of their stragglers plundered the temple of Venus at Ascalon, and for their sacrilege were punished with hemorrhoides, or, as others say, with that kind of it, which is only common to the other sex; which did also cleave to their posterity as a brand of infamy. b

THEY might probably have held their dominion in Asia much longer than they did, had not their indolence and exactions on the one hand, and the treachery of Cyaxares king of the Medes on the other, put an end to it, in the manner we have related in that history. What became of the rest that survived the slaughter we can only guess at; many of them might submit themselves to the Medes, and continue there; but a much greater number went, as is supposed, and served Nebuchadnezzar, part of whose army is said to have consisted of all the families of the north;
but the greatest part, according to Herodotus, marched towards Scythia †, where they met with an unexpected reception from their servants and slaves. This story is somewhat differently reported, as well as that of their Asiatic expedition, and the time c they spent in it: Justin, who calls this their third expedition, says, it lasted but eight years ‡, during which their wives having given them over for lost, on account of the great distance between them, had married their servants and slaves; to whom, as we have observed, their masters used upon all such excursions, to commit the care of their families and cattle. As soon therefore as the Scythians were entered into the confines of their own territories, this upstart race of slaves sent to forbid their masters to approach nearer at their peril.

BUT Herodotus, who speaks of this expedition as their first into Asia, and affirms it to have lasted twenty-eight years, adds §, that their wives, unused to be so long idle, had taken their servants and slaves to their beds, from whom this new genera- d tion was sprung, which obstructed their masters return into Scythia, after they had suffered themselves to be driven out of their Asiatic conquests by the Medes. This last is the more probable of the two in many respects, and agrees better with those other authors, who affirm, as was observed before, that the Scythians held the dominion of Asia twenty-eight years. However that be, this slavish offspring having timely notice of their masters returning home, had so well fortified and intrenched themselves against them, that they would in all probability have kept them out, had not some of the wiser Scythians bethought themselves of a stratagem, which quite discomfited that rebellious rout.

THEY had already had several skirmishes with equal success on both sides, when e one of the Scythian lords told the rest, that it was a shameful thing for them to fight with their slaves, as with their equals, and that if they designed to force them into submission, they must fall upon them, not with warlike weapons, but with whips and scourges, such as they were formerly wont to chastise them with. This advice was followed with surprizing success, and the slavish rebels were taken with such a panic at this new and unexpected kind of war, that they laid down their arms and fled with the utmost precipitation. As many of them as could be caught, were put to the most cruel deaths, whilst their mistresses, conscious of their guilt, sought to avoid their husbands resentment, by hanging, or some other speedy death (K).

After

(K) It is plain by these Scythians leaving their wives, servants, and baggage behind, that they designed to return again from Asia; for it is scarce probable that their design was to conquer some spacious country there, and then to come back to fetch them thither. And therefore we conclude, as we observed above, that they only went to assist those new colonies, which they were obliged to discharge from time to time for want of room, to make a good settlement there, after which they designed to return to their own homes, as usual.

However that be, this adventure seems plainly to contradict a story which Herodotus tells of the Scy-thians, that they used to put out the eyes of their slaves: for it can hardly be supposed that this slavish army that opposed their return, was wholly a new offspring, unless we can believe that their wives took their blind slaves into their beds almost as soon as their husbands backs were turned from them.

As for the war itself between the masters and slaves, it is so far from being a fiction, or so much as doubted of in those parts, even at this day, that we are

- a After this signal victory over their rebellious slaves, the Scythians, according to Justin, enjoyed a long and unmolested peace till the days of Jancyrus, of whom we shall speak by-and-by. We must however except the invasion which happened under the next reign we are going to mention.

Tomyris, Tomyris, or Tamyris, was that heroine whom we are told * Cyrus the Tomyris. great did, or at least pretended to, court in marriage, and was sending an embassy to treat about it. But she supposing that her kingdom, rather than her person, was the object of his wishes, sent express orders to the ambassadors not to proceed further. Cyrus, provoked either at her refusal, or at her suspecting his artifice, advanced with his army against the Massagetes, who were then under her dominion.

- b What the issue of this expedition was, and what credit may be given to the story of his tragical end, and the revenge, which that exasperated princess took of him, we have already seen in another chapter †, and shall not repeat it.

Jancyrus a magnanimous and haughty prince, is famed for the noble answer which Jancyrus. he sent to Darius king of Persia, when he sent to demand of him the usual presents of earth and water in token of subjection, and for the total defeat which he gave to that assuming monarch's army; and as such seems to be the same with Herodotus's Indatbyrsus †, or to have been his immediate successor. The occasion of this war with the Persians is variously related by Justin ‡, and the last quoted author: the former tells us that the Scythian monarch had exasperated Darius by refusing to

- c give him his daughter in marriage; and the latter introduces some Scythian princes, accusing him with being the first aggressor, and having invaded the Persian territories, whilst Darius himself pretended only to revenge the ravages which the Scythians had committed in Asia 120 years before, when they held it in subjection 28 years. There is therefore no other way of reconciling these accounts, and the two different names of the Scythian monarch, but by supposing the Jancyrus of Justin to have been the father of Indatbyrsus, and that finding that the refusal of his daughter had provoked the Persian king to a war, he resolved to be before-hand with him, and to send his son Indatbyrsus to invade his territories; and that dying soon after, he intailed that war upon his son, from which he afterwards reaped so much glory. Herodotus might not think fit to transmit a circumstance so much to the honour of the barbarous Scythians, as that of the great Darius's seeking to contract an affinity with one of their monarchs. And it is perhaps for the same reason that he makes the Persian army to have been rather harrassed and starved out of Scythia, than repulsed by the known bravery of that prince and nation. As for Darius, if he really received such an affront from the king of Scythia, as the refusal of his daughter, it was too dishonourable a pretence to ground his invasion upon; and a more glorious motive must be sought out, though at so great a distance of time, to cover the true and real one.

- d HOWEVER that be, Indatbyrsus having received the proud challenge from the Persian king, implied in the demand of earth and water, which we have elsewhere shewn to signify, not a supply of provisions for his army, but an acknowledgment of subjection †, sent him this haughty reply; that as he acknowledged no lord but his progenitor Jupiter, and Vesta queen of the Scythians, he would shortly send him a more suitable present, and such a one as might perhaps make him repent him of his arrogance. This present accordingly was dispatched to him soon after: it was a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows, without any farther application; these arrows might perhaps allude to the number of Scythian tribes, which were joined with his own, of which we shall speak by-and-by. These and the living creatures Darius immediately interpreted in his own favour, and to have been sent in token of sub-are told, that the Novogradians, whose city stands in the Sarmatian Scythia, did cause a coin, which they call a Dingoe Novogradjkoj, to be stamp'd in memory of it, which had a man on horseback, shaking a whip aloft in his hand, and which has been current ever since throughout all Russia †.

It is probable likewise, that it was from this breach of conjugal faith in the Scythian wives, that the custom has been since established among the Muscovite women, of presenting their future spouse, even in the time of their courtship with a Pudkee, or whip, wrought with their own hands, in token both of a greater subjection and fidelity than their Scythian ancestries, or most probably to put them in mind of their fault, and of their own duty, whenever they chance to forget it.

mission. But Gobrias, who knew the Scythians perhaps better than his master, and a compared the message and the present together, gave quite another sense to the latter, namely, that the Persians must not hope to avoid the effects of the Scythian valour, unless they could either fly like birds, plunge like frogs, or bury themselves in the earth like mice: Whether or no this was the real meaning of the present, the preparations which he made against him, sufficiently shew, that it was designed to signify an open defiance to the Persian army (L).

ACCORDINGLY the king of Scythia summoned up all the princes of the other tribes to come to his assistance, against the common enemy and invader of their country. These were the kings of the Gelonians, Budians and Sarmatians; the Agathyrsians, Neurians, Androphages, Melanclenians, and Taurians. These being assembled in council, and having debated the occasion of the war, were divided in their opinions; and the three first were the only ones who esteemed it a common cause, and resolved to join Indatyrfus in the defence of it. As for the other five, they sent him word, that as he had been the first and only aggressor, by invading the Persian territories without their participation, so they did not think themselves at all concerned in the retaliation which Darius was preparing against him. That they would therefore sit quiet at home, till some hostilities had convinced them that the Persians designs were equally levelled at them, in which case they would soon convince them that it was not their design to sit idle, and suffer their own territories to be invaded.

Indatyrfus was so exasperated at this unexpected message, that he resolved, at the same time that he made the best defence he could with his royal and free Scythians, and his three allied princes; to be revenged on the other five treacherous nations, by drawing, if possible, the enemy into their country. To this end he resolved to fight no battle in the open field, but gradually to withdraw his army from the frontiers, and to fill up all the wells and springs, and to destroy all the grass and provision as they went. He divided his army into two columns, the one, under the command of Taxacis, was to act in conjunction with the Gelonians and Budeans; the other, which was by far the greater, was commanded by the king himself; whilst the Sarmatians were ordered to advance to the territories of king Scopasis, that in case the Persians should come by that way, they might retire by the lake Meotis to the river Tanais; and upon their retiring, harass them as much as they could. Taxacis was ordered to keep still a day's march before the Persians, and to tire them with frequent skirmishes, in order to draw them into the territories of some of these five nations that had refused to join with them: and if that did not succeed, they were left at liberty either to return into their own country, or to attempt any other means their discretion should suggest to them.

THESE orders being thus fixed, they sent away their wives and children towards the northern parts, together with all the baggage and cattle they could spare; after which Indatyrfus commanded the best of his horse to march towards the enemy, whilst the rest followed them by private ways. This detachment, finding the Persian army advanced about three days march from the Ister, destroyed all the product of the ground, and fled away. This caused the Persians to pursue after them as fast as the others retired still further back, till they had drawn them through Sarmatia into the territories of the Budeans, where they burnt and laid waste all that came in their way. They continued their pursuit till they came to a great desert of about seven days march; and here Darius not thinking it proper to proceed further, set himself about building of some spacious cities at equal distances from each other. These however he left unfinished, to go in pursuit of the flying Scythians, who by degrees drew him through the territories of the Melanclenians, Androphages, and Neurians, who had cowardly left them to the mercy of the Scythians, who failed not to lay all waste as they went through, that the Persian army might find nothing there to subsist on. The remainder of this expedition we have already given in a

(L) We have given this story somewhat in a different order than we find it in Herodotus, who tells us that these reciprocal messages were not sent till the Scythians had drawn the Persian army into the furthest parts of their country, and, as it were, intrapped them in the wild countries of the Melanclenians, Androphages, and Neurians. Had this been the case, there had been no great bravery in their sending such a haughty answer to an enemy so harassed and entangled as Darius then was; neither will those circumstances be then found himself in, permit us to suppose that a proper time for his arrogant challenge to the Scythians. We think it therefore more probable, as it is indeed more consonant to the known customs of other kingdoms, that these messages were interchanged at the beginning of the war, or before he invaded the Scythian territories.

- a former section *: the result of which was, that the Persian monarch was forced to retire with the loss of the greatest part of his numerous army (M), glad to escape with his own life, and at the expence of his glory. How much dearer still, this invasion would have cost the Persians, had the Ionians, whom Darius had left to guard the bridge which he had laid over the Ister, kept their promise to the Scythians, and left them to destroy it, may be easily guessed; but they only deceived them with a promise that they would demolish it, and made a shew as if they were going about it in good earnest, by taking off so much of it on the Scythian side as an arrow might reach, to prevent the Scythians passing and demolishing it, which however they soon rejoined again, when the flying Persians appeared; by which means Darius once more escaped the fury of the pursuing Scythians, who failed not ever after to load the Ionians with the worst of epithets for their treachery and cowardice. As soon as they found that Darius was gone beyond their reach, they resolved to be avenged of him some other way, and to make themselves amends for the ravage they had been forced to make in their own country. Thrace, so lately conquered by the Persian king, became the unhappy victim of their fury: they laid it all waste as far as the Hellefpont, and repassing the Ister, returned into Scythia loaden with the immense spoils of that province.

- Saulius*, This was he of whom we took notice before, for killing Anacharfis, a Saulius. prince of the blood, for having ventured to introduce the nocturnal rites of the mother of the gods into Scythia, which he had seen used among the Grecians. For though Anacharfis had chosen a private place, covered with a great wood, to perform this new worship in, yet he was discovered in the midst of it by a Scythian, who went immediately to acquaint the king with it. Saulius hastened to the place, and found him playing on a tymbal before the images he had hung upon the trees, and shot him dead upon the spot. Our author gives us here the names of three of Saulius's predecessors, in a lineal descent, viz. Spargapylbes, Cyrus and Gnarus, and of one of his successors, viz. Indathyrfus †.

- Aripitbes* had a numerous issue, but particularly one son named Scythes, not by Aripitbes. a Scythian, but by an Istrian woman, who therefore brought him up in all the Grecian customs and learning. Aripitbes being afterwards killed by the treachery of the king of the Agathyrsians, this son found means to possess himself of his father's kingdom ‡.

- Scythes*, though now king of Scythia, and married to one of his father's wives, who was also a Scythian, yet preferred the Grecian customs, in which he had been brought up by his mother, to those of his own country. To indulge himself in them, and avoid giving offence of his subjects, he bethought himself of the following stratagem; he led his Scythians to the metropolis of the Borysthenians, which is reported to be a colony of the Milesians, and leaving his army before the place, he entered alone into it, and causing the gates to be shut, and centinels to be placed at each of them, put off his Scythian dress, clothed himself after the Grecian manner, and walked about the city without guards or attendance. Thus he continued a whole month, conforming to the Grecian worship, customs and dress, after which he resumed his Scythian habit, and departed. Not content with often repeating the same practice, he built a palace in that city, and married a native of it. He was going to be initiated in the rites of Bacchus, and had prepared all things for the ceremony, when the outward court of his sumptuous palace, which he had adorned with marble statues representing Sphinxes and griffins, was demolished by thunder. This did not however deter him from accomplishing his initiation; but whilst he was in the midst of it, a Borysthenian went and acquainted the Scythians with it in

(M) If Herodotus's account of this transaction may be credited, Darius was not so much repulsed by the arms of the Scythians, as affronted at an unaccountable instance of contempt which they occasionally shewed to him, just as the two armies were going to engage: he tells us they were both drawn in order of battle, when a hare accidentally starting in the interval between them, the Scythians immediately quitted their ranks with loud outcries, and in the utmost confusion, pursued after it. One would expect that the Persians would have took the opportunity of falling upon them, whilst they were in this hurly-burly; but, it seems, Darius judged quite otherwise of an enemy that shewed so little regard for his gallant army, as to turn their backs to it to run after a hare; so that he thought it high time to take Gobrias's advice, and to secure his retreat as soon as he could, which he accordingly did that very night.

words to this effect : you upbraid us with celebrating our Bacchanals, because when a possessed with the god, we lose, you say, the use of our reason ; come now and behold your king celebrating those rites with a divine fury, and be yourselves eye-witnesses how that God has taken possession of him. Some of the principal Scythians were immediately introduced into the city, and with grief and indignation beheld their prince from one of the towers, performing the Bacchanalian rites with a numerous choir.

At their return they acquainted the army with what they had seen, which did so enrage the Scythians, that as soon as he was got home they revolted from him, and chose his brother Oetamasfades in his room. Scythes being informed of the occasion of this revolt fled into Thrace, and as soon as his brother had notice of it, he pursued him with a numerous army as far as the banks of the Ister, where he found Sitalces king of Thrace advancing to meet him. But as both armies were preparing to fight, Oetamasfades received a message from the Thracian king, to this effect ; why should we try the fortune of war, thou art my sister's son, and hast my brother with thee, deliver him up to me, and I will send Scythes to thee, so shall we avoid the hazard of a defeat. Oetamasfades agreed to the proposal, and surrendered his uncle to Sitalces, who immediately decamped with his army, and the new king of Scythia having received his brother from him, caused his head to be immediately taken off^b.

Ariantes. Ariantes was that prince of whom we have lately spoken upon another occasion ; and who being desirous to know the number of his fighting-men, ordered them all to appear at a set time, and to throw every one the tip of an arrow into a common heap, which amounted to such a bulk, that he caused it to be cast into a large capacious bowl as a monument of the thing, and dedicated it to Exampæus^c.

THE last king we shall mention in this history (M), and under whom the Scythians are said to have received a considerable overthrow^a was Asbeas, or as he is called by others Matheas and Macheas. This prince being engaged in a war with the Istrians, a people of Myfia on the south banks of the mouth of the river Ister, sent to Philip king of Macedon to desire his assistance, and upon his complying, promised to make him his heir to the crown of Scythia. But the Istrians having, at the news of this powerful succour, delivered him of his fears by their sudden departure, he sent another message to Philip, in which he told him flatly that he had neither sent for

(N) We have omitted several of their kings, concerning whom we either meet with nothing except their names, or something too fabulous and ridiculous to deserve a place in this work, or at best so vague and uncertain, especially in point of time, that it is impossible to fix it to any epocha.

Of this nature is that story we are going to give out of Herodotus, not so much for its incredible singularity, as because, fabulous as it is, it must have been founded upon some facts, which give no small countenance to some conjectures we have ventured to advance in this history, it being not of Greek, but Scythian extraction. It is as follows :

He tells us of a part of Scythia, whose inhabitants he nevertheless doth indiscriminately call Scythians, who, though they owned themselves to be of much recenter date than the rest, yet pretended to have been 1000 years before Darius's expedition. The account they give of themselves is, that their country was at first peopled by Targitans the son of Jupiter, by a daughter of the river Borysthenes ; that this prince had three sons, viz. Lipoxais, Apoxais, and Colaxais, in whose reign, a plow with a yoke, an ax and a bowl, all of gold, fell from heaven into their country ; that the two elder brothers drew near the place, and one after another tried to take them up, and found them burning-hot ; but the youngest coming presently after, found them cool enough to take and carry them off, whereupon the other two yielded their share of the kingdom to him. They add that the Auchatian Scythians were descended from the eldest, the Catarians from Apoxais, and the race of their kings, whom they called Paralates, from the youngest brother. All these gave themselves the general name of Scheketes, which our author tells us, was also the surname of their kings, but were called Scythians by all the Greeks. The miraculous golden utensils we are told were preserved with utmost care, and that their kings did assist at the annual sacrifices which were offered to them with great magnificence.

Colaxais, who had likewise three sons, perceiving the vast extent of his territories, divided them between them, allowing however the biggest share to that portion into which the miraculous golden vessels were fallen. According to this tradition there must have started at least three new kingdoms or principalities, and by what our author adds immediately after, of the vast quantities of feathers or snow, with which the adjoining regions towards the north are covered ; we may reasonably suppose these three tribes to have sprung from a colony of the ancient Scythians, and to have been forced to seek for a new habitation in those more inclement regions, especially considering that they pretend to be of much recenter original than any others, meaning doubtless than any other Scythians, though older by 1000 years than the time of Darius. As for the pretended divine extraction of their founder, and the miraculous fall of the golden utensils, they only imitated their own and other nations in it, there being nothing more common in those early days than these pretences of something supernatural accompanying the foundations of most kingdoms, and the divine original of their first founders. Hence we would further observe, that it is most likely that the kings of Scythia, which we have given in the above list, did not all belong to the royal Scythians, but a for his assistance, nor promised him his crown; that the Scythians neither wanted the help of the Macedonians, nor their king an heir, whilst he had a son alive. Philip, who was then besieging Byzantium, sent to desire him at least to remit him some money to defray part of the expences of the siege, especially considering that he had paid nothing either towards the subsistence of, or by way of reward to the auxiliaries which he had sent to him.

Atneas had no way to elude so reasonable a demand, but by excusing himself upon the inclemency of their climate, and barrenness of their soil, which he said was so far from contributing to their enrichment, that it scarcely afforded them sufficient sustenance. Philip vexed at heart to see himself thus baffled, resolved to retaliate trick for trick, and whilst he was raising the siege in order to enter into a war with them, he sent the Scythians word that he had vowed to erect a statue to Hercules at the mouth of the Ister, which he desired liberty to come and set up there, as he was a known friend to the Scythians. Atneas, who smelt his design, sent him word, that if he had a mind to perform his vow, he need but send the statue, and he would take upon himself the care both of the erecting of it, and of its remaining safe there; but that he would by no means suffer him to bring his army into his territories: he added, that if he persisted in spite of him, to come and set up such a statue, they would soon melt and cast it into arrows against him. Philip not minding his threatening refusal, and both monarchs being highly exasperated against each other, c a bloody battle ensued, in which our author tells us, the Scythians, though superior in strength and courage, were overcome by the craftiness of the Macedonian king; twenty-thousand women and children were carried off prisoners, besides a vast quantity of cattle, and twenty-thousand of their finest mares which they sent into Macedonia for breeding. As for gold and silver they found none among them, and this, our author observes, was the first proof which the Scythians gave of their poverty in that respect.

HOWEVER, this overthrow is not so universally agreed among antient authors as the war is, neither doth it consist well with what our author has in another place; where he introduces Mithridates haranging his army, part of which consisted of Scythians, and complimenting their known valour with the relation of the two kings, d Darius and Philip, who having but dared to invade their territories, had been put to a shameful flight*. But be that as it will, 'tis plain their overthrow was not so considerable as to hinder them from signalizing themselves upon many occasions, both against the Macedonians and Romans, and against several other nations; and during a considerable time, as the sequel of this work will sufficiently shew.

Lambinus is supposed, upon what account doth not clearly appear, to have been the last king of Scythia†.

* I. xxxviii. c. 7.

† Vid. HEYL. lib. iii. p. 172.

but that some of them reigned over other tribes or branches which time and necessity had divided for them, especially as they were ever warring and elbowing one another out of the most pleasant parts of the country.

With respect to this pretended daughter of the Borysphenes, it will not be amiss here to observe once for all, that it was a common custom in those early and ignorant times for the first planters of kingdoms or colonies to give their names, not only to their new territories, and capital cities, but also to the most considerable rivers. Hence therefore it is more than probable, that their posterity, who every-where affected to boast of something miraculous in their origin, chose rather to derive it from the river itself than from their real parent, who gave name to it. We shall meet in the history of the fabulous and heroic times with instances more than enough of these sons and daughters of rivers, to justify the truth, and show the necessity of this previous observation.

CHAP. XIII.

The History of the antient Phrygians, Trojans, Lycians, Lydians, &c.

SECT. I.

A brief account of ASIA Proper.

AS the several small kingdoms, which we are to treat of in this place, were antiently comprehended under the name of Asia Minor, we shall premise a general description of that country for the better understanding of the particular accounts which we shall have occasion to join as we come to treat of the several regions contained therein.

Asia Proper.

THE different and various acceptations of the word Asia, even in its strictest sense, has created a great deal of confusion among writers, and often led the unwary readers into considerable mistakes. To obviate these inconveniencies the incomparable bishop Usher * advises those who are to give any account of Asia to begin by explaining the various acceptations of the word, without which it is impossible to understand the antient historians or geographers. He looks upon this as one of the most difficult points in history, there being a seeming contradiction between the sacred and profane writers as to the provinces comprehended under the name of Asia, which cannot be reconciled without a very careful distinction of times and places. In reading the antient historians or geographers we frequently meet with the following terms, viz. The Greater and Lesser Asia, Asia Proper, or Asia properly so called, the Lydian Asia, the Proconsular Asia, the Asiatic Diocesis. That vast continent, which was known to the Greeks and Romans under the name of Asia, was divided by the antient geographers first into the Greater and Lesser Asia. The lesser, commonly termed Asia Minor, comprehended a great many provinces, but that which included Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia, was named Asia Proper, or Asia, properly so called, as is plain from Tully ^b. Where it is to be observed that Tully, in enumerating the regions contained in Asia Proper, makes no mention of Æolis or Ionis, though undoubtedly parts of Asia Proper, because they were comprehended partly in Lydia and partly in Mysia. Lydia, beside the inland country, commonly known by that name, contained also the adjoining countries both of Ionis, lying on the sea-side between the rivers Hermus and Meander, and of Æolis, extending from Hermus to the river Caicus, according to Ptolemy ^c, or according to Strabo ^d to the promontory Lectum, the antient boundary between Troas and the sea-coast of the Greater Mysia (A). The remaining parts of Æolis and Ionis are by Pliny ^e, Strabo ^f, Hellanicus ^g, and Scylan ^h, placed in Mysia; nay Mysia itself, after the Æolians possessed themselves of it, was commonly called Æolis ⁱ; which Stephanus not being aware of, makes Affos of Æolis a different city from Affos of Mysia near Antandrus. From what we have said, it is plain that Asia Proper comprehended Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Æolis and Ionis. This tract was bounded, accord-

* In his geographical and historical disquisition touching Asia, properly so called. ^b Cic. in Orat. pro Flacco. ^c lib. v. cap. 2. ^d lib. xii. ^e lib. v. cap. 30. ^f lib. xv. ^g Id. lib. xiii. ^h SCYLAX. in Periplus. ⁱ POMPE. MELA, lib. i. cap. 18. PLIN. lib. v. c. 30.

(A) That Mysia reached to the mouth of the river Caicus, is acknowledged not only by Ptolemy (1), but also by Strabo (2); and yet because it was possessed in his time by the Æolians, he tells us, that Æolis, properly so called, extended from Hermus to Lectum (3). In like manner Pliny (4) makes the promontory Lectum the boundary betwixt Æolis and Troas; tho' elsewhere, following other authors, he places Affos in Troas (5). But Hellanicus (6), Strabo and Stephanus (7) make it a city of Æolis near the Hellepont.

It lies between the thirty-fifth and forty-first degree of north latitude, and extends in longitude from fifty-five to sixty-two degrees.

As Asia Proper is but a part of Asia Minor, so the Lydian Asia is only a part of The Lydian Asia Proper (B). Asia in this acceptation comprehends Lydia, Æolis, and Ionia, ^{Asia.} according to the description we have already given of it, and is that Asia whereof mention is made in the Acts and St. John's revelation. In the former we read the following account of St. Paul's journey ^a. When they had gone throughout Phrygia
b and the region of Galatia, and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia; after they were come to Mysia, they essayed to go into Bithynia; but the spirit suffered them not. And they passing by Mysia, came down to Troas. Where it is to be observed, that the Greater Phrygia, through which they passed into Galatia, Mysia, Olympena bordering upon Bithynia and Hellepont, where Troas was situate, though provinces of Asia properly so called, are yet in express terms distinguished from the Proper Asia of the Romans; as is likewise Caria, by what we read elsewhere in the same book ¹. As these cities and countries did not belong to the Lydian Asia, so what remains of Asia Proper, together with the seven Churches mentioned in the Revelations, were properly Lydia, or the Lydian Asia. In the first place Pergamus is c placed by Xenophon ^a in Lydia, and also by Aristotle ^b. The same Aristotle ^c tells us that Smyrna was at first possessed by the Lydians, and Scylax Coryandensis reckons it among the cities of Lydia, as also Ephesus, wherein he agrees with Herodotus ^d. Sardis, Philadelphia, and Thyatira, are reckoned by Ptolomy among the cities of Lydia, as is Laodicea by Stephanus ^e (C).

proconsular Hellepont. And this is Ptolomy's Asia Proper ¹. By the same emperor Pontus and Bithynia were made a Prætorian province ², and Asia a consular, contain-d ing all that part of Asia which lay on this side the river Halys and mount Taurus. In the time of Constantine the Great the Proconsular Asia was much abridged, and a distinction brought in between the Proconsular Asia, and the Asiatic diocesis; the one being governed by the proconsul of Asia, and the other by the Vicarius or Lieu- tenant of Asia (D). The Proconsular Asia, according to the description which Eun- apius gives us of it ³, seems to have been much the same with the Lydian Asia abovementioned. In the reign of Theodosius the elder, who succeeded Valens, the consular Hellepont was taken from the Vicarius of Asia, and added to the Procon-

(B) That in ancient times Lydia was called Mæonia, and the Lydians Mæonians, is manifest from Herodotus (8), Dionysius Siculus (9) Dionysius Afer (10), Strabo (11) Pliny (12), Stephanus, and others; and that Mæonia was called Asia, is no less plain from Callinus, who flourished before Archilochus (13), from Demetrius Scythius cotemporary with Crates and Aristarchus the Grammarians (14), from Euripides (15), Suidas (16), the great etymologist, &c. Nay, that Lydia was formerly called Asia, is expressly affirmed by the ancient scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius (17). From whence Lydia borrowed the name of Asia is altogether uncertain; some deriving it from a city of Lydia, seated on mount Imolus, others from one Asias king of Lydia, who according to the Lydians communicated his name to the whole continent (18). But be that as it will, it is certain that Lydia has a better claim to the name of Asia, than any other part of that continent.

(C) Laodicea is placed by Ptolomy in Caria, by others in Phrygia, and by some in Lydia, the confines of those countries having been so often altered, that it was not possible, as Strabo witnesses (19), to ascertain their exact boundaries; and hence it is that the same city is oftentimes placed by one of the ancient geographers in Phrygia, by another in Lydia, and by a third in Caria.

(D) We find in the Imperial Constitutions two rescripts of the emperor Valens, the one dated the 27th of January 365. (that is, towards the latter end of the first year of his reign) and directed to Clearchus, Vicarius Asia; the other dated the 6th of the October following, and directed to Auxonius, Vicarius Dioceseos Asiæ (20). This distinction was brought in by Constantine, and continued under the christian emperors that succeeded him.

fulcr Asia; but under Arcadius the Proconsular Asia was abridged of all the inland a part of Lydia. And this is the reason, why Palladius^a makes a distinction between the bishops of Lydia and those of Asia. However, the southern part of Lydia, lying between the Meander and Cayster, and the maritime provinces from Ephesus to Affos and the promontory Leclum, were left to the Proconsular Asia^a.

The Asiatic diocess.

THE Asiatic diocess (E) is sometimes taken in a more strict sense as distinct from the Proconsular Asia, and the provinces under the jurisdiction of the proconsul, and sometimes in a more extensive sense, as comprehending also the Proconsular Asia. According to this acceptation all Asia in the reign of Theodosius the Younger consisted of eleven provinces, three whereof were under the jurisdiction of the proconsul of Asia, viz. the Proconsular Proper, which he governed by himself, the consular Hel- b lespont, and that of Rhodes, with the other islands called Cyclades, which were first made a province by Vespasian, and placed under a President^a; eight were under the vicarius or lieutenant of Asia, viz. Lydia, Caria, Phrygia Salutaris, Phrygia Pacatiana, Pamphilia, Lycia, Lycaonia and Pisidia; these eight made up what was properly called the Asiatic diocess^a (F). These are the terms we most commonly meet with in reading the ancient historians and geographers, for the explanation of which we are chiefly indebted to the learned bishop Usher, who thought it well worth his while to examine the various acceptations of Asia Proper in a particular treatise^a.

As to the common name of Asia there is a great variety of opinions among the learned, some deriving it from Asia the daughter of Oceanus and Tbetis, wife of c Iapetus, and by him mother to Prometheus; others from Asius son of Atys, king of Lydia, from whom that kingdom first, and in length of time the whole continent was named Asia. Bochart^a is of opinion that it took its name from the Phœnician word Asi, signifying the middle, because Asia Minor, which, says he, communicated its name to Asia the Greater, lies, as it were, in the middle, between Europe and Afric. This opinion he endeavours to support with the authority of Pliny and Pomponius Mela^b. But as all that can be said on this head is grounded on bare conjectures, it is scarce worth our while to dwell on enquiries of this nature.

Climate and fertility.

THIS country is justly counted among the finest and most fruitful of the earth, and mightily extolled by antient writers, chiefly by the Romans, who were well d acquainted with it, for the fertility of the soil, temper of the climate, nature of the seasons, excellence and variety of its productions and fruits; in all which respects it was preferred by Tully^c to all the countries of the then known world. The common epithet, whereby the Latin poets distinguish this from other regions is that of rich, alluding not only to the richness of the soil, but also to the wealth and opulence of the inhabitants, which we may easily judge of from the immense sums that some of the Roman governors are said to have extorted from them, namely Marc Anthony, who, as we are told by Plutarch^d, squeezed from the inhabitants of Asia Minor in the space of one year the sum of twenty thousand talents.

Its present division.

THIS country is at present divided into four parts, viz. Natolia, properly so c called, the western part; Caramania, the southern part; Aladulia the eastern, and Anafia the northmost part. By the Turks the whole country, called by them Nadalu, is divided into five parts under the government of five Beglerbegs, who reside at Cotyaum, Tocat, Trabezond, Marosch, and Iconium. These are subdivided into lesser governments denominated from the city or town where the governor resides. But it is now time to proceed to the particular histories of the various kingdoms antiently comprehended under the common name of Asia Minor.

(E) The word diocess, in the dialect of the times we are here speaking of, imports a tract of country comprehending several provinces under the jurisdiction of one chief ruler.

(F) In the Notitia Imperii which was compiled in the reign of Theodosius the younger, the Asiatic diocess is said to consist of ten provinces only, the first and chief province of all, viz. Asia itself, being, we know not how, omitted (21). On the other hand Isidorus Mercator reckons twelve provinces belonging to this diocess, and among them Galatia, which was without all doubt a province of the diocess of Pontus (22).

The HISTORY of the PHRYGIANS.

S E C T. II.

The description of PHRYGIA.

AS we can scarce offer any thing touching Phrygia, but what we have either at second hand, or from mutilated pieces of antiquity, we shall not dwell long on so dark and perplexed a subject, not to pretend to supply the defect of better authorities with such precarious conjectures as every writer may, and the most ordinary usually do vent on such occasions (G).

WHENCE the small country before us borrowed the name of Phrygia is not determined. Some derive it from the river Phryx (now Sarabat) which divides Phrygia from Caria, and empties itself into the *Hermus, others from Phrygia the daughter of Asopus and Europa. The Greek writers tell us† that the country took its name from the inhabitants, and these from the town of Brygium in Macedonia, from whence they first passed into Asia, and gave the name of Phrygia or Brigia to the country which they settled in; but we shall have occasion to examine this opinion hereafter. Bochart is of opinion‡ that this tract was called Phrygia from a Greek verb, signifying to burn or dry, which according to him is a translation of its Hebrew name derived from a verb of the same signification (H).

No less various are the opinions of authors as to the exact boundaries of this country, which gave rise to the proverb related by Strabo§, viz. that the Phrygians and Myrians had distinct boundaries, but that it was scarce possible to ascertain them. The same writer adds¶ that the Trojans, Myrians and Lydians, are by the poets all blended under the common name of Phrygians, which *Claudian*¹ extends to the Pisidians, Bitbynians, and Ionians. Again *Pliny*² places Ascania in Phrygia, which together with Dardania is reckoned by *Strabo*³ among the provinces of Mysia. Phrygia Proper, according to Ptolemy, whom we chuse to follow, was bounded on the north by Pontus, and Bitbynia, on the west by Mysia, Troas, the Ægean sea, Lydia Maonia, and Caria; on the south by Lycia; on the east by Pamphylia and Galatia. It lies between the 37th and 41st degree of north-latitude,

(G) The names of the authors that have wrote the Phrygian history are Democritus, Hermesianastes, Timolaus, Aictazus, and Cornelius Alexander (23); but as their works have not reached us, we are left quite in the dark as to some of the most material points of that history.

(H) The Greek word Φρυγία seems to be derived from the verb Φρύγναι, to burn or parch; and hence that place on mount OËta where Hercules was burnt took the name of Φρυγία, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐν τῷ πύρρῳ καὶ τῷ ἤραν. Now as that part of Phrygia which was washed by the rivers Cayster and Merander, was distinguished by the epithet of Καλαμαναυμία as Strabo and Diodorus witness (24); it is not improbable but that the name of Phrygia, which was at first peculiar to one part might in length of time become common to the whole country. How this part came to be called Καλαμαναυμία, burnt, is variously reported. Diodorus (25) speaks of a fiery monster called Ægis which appearing there consumed all that tract; but was afterwards killed by Pallas. Others recur to the fable of Typhon (26), who, say they, was in that place thunder-struck by Jupiter. But without having recourse to fables, it will be no hard matter to account for this denomination, if we but consider that this part of Phrygia we are speaking of is described both by Diodorus and Strabo (27) as a dry soil, impregnated with sulphur, bitumen, and other combustibile substances, which in all likelihood gave rise to this appellation. We are not ignorant that the tract we are speaking of is by some of the antients reckoned a province of Mysia, by others of Maonia; but Hesychius (28), Diodorus (29), and most of the other historians and geographers place it in Phrygia. Bochart is of opinion (30) that by Gomer in scripture is meant Phrygia, and that the Greek word Phrygia is a translation of the Hebrew גֹּמֶר Gomer, which he derives from the verb גָּמַר Gamar, importing, among other significations, to burn or consume, in which signification he shews it to have been frequently used both by the Chaldeans and Syrians.

extending in longitude from 56 to 62 degrees. The inhabitants of this country ^a mentioned by Ptolemy are the Lycaones, and Anthemisenii towards Lycia, and Moceadeli or Moceadine, the Cydeses or Cydisses towards Bitbynia, and between these the Peltini or Speltini, the Moxiani, Phylacensis, and Hierapolita. To these we may add the Berecynes and Cerbesis mentioned by Strabo^a.

Pbrygia is commonly divided into the Greater and Lesser Pbrygia called also Troas. But this division did not take place till Troas was subdued by the Pbrygians; and hence it is more considered by some Roman writers as a part of Pbrygia, than Bitbynia, Cappadocia, or any other of the adjacent provinces. In after-ages, that is, in the reign of Constantine the Great, the Greater Pbrygia was divided into two districts or governments, the one called Pbrygia Pacatiana, from Pacatianus, who ^b under Constantine bore the great office of the Præfællus Prætorio of the east; the other Pbrygia Salutaris from some miraculous cures supposed to have been performed there by the archangel Michael.

Its soil and climate.

THIS country, and indeed all Asia Minor as lying in the fifth and six northern climates, was in antient times greatly celebrated for its fertility. It abounded in all sorts of grains, being for the most part a plain country covered with a deep rich soil, and plentifully watered by small rivers. It was in some parts productive of bitumen and other combustible substances. It was well stocked with cattle, having large plains and pasture grounds. The air was antiently deemed most pure and wholesome, though it is now in some parts thought extremely gross, great part of the ^c country lying uncultivated, a thing too common in such regions as groan under the Mohammedan yoke. In short, whatever desirable things, nature has frugally bestowed here and there on other countries, were found in this, while well manured, as in their original seminary.

THE cities of note in Pbrygia Major were, 1. Apamea or Apamia, a famous mart, and the metropolis of all Pbrygia till the above mentioned division of Constantine took place. It was seated at the confluence of the Marfya and Meander. Pliny^a places it at the foot of the hill Signia, surrounded by the rivers Marfya, Obrima, and Orga, which empty themselves into the Meander; wherein he seems to confound the situation of the antient Celene with that of the new city called Apamea. Celene ^d indeed stood at the foot of the hill, on which the Marfya has its spring; but Antiochus Soter son to Antiochus Seleucus who built Apamea of Syria, carried the inhabitants from thence to the new city which he built about ten miles from thence, where the Marfya and Meander begin to flow in one channel; this city he named Apamea from his mother Apamea, wife to Seleucus Nicanor^e. As there are many other cities bearing the same name, this for distinction sake is commonly called Apamea Cibotos; but as to the original of this appellation there is a great discrepancy among authors (I).

Laodicea, now Eskibissar, seated on the banks of the river Lycus, not far from Apamea. It was first called Diospolis, afterwards Rheas, and at last Diocæsarea and Laodicea. We are told by Stephanus that Jupiter appearing to Antiochus the son of ^e Stratonice in his sleep commanded him to build a city, which he did accordingly, calling it Diospolis from Jupiter, and Laodicea from his wife Laodice. It was afterwards greatly increased by Hiero, by Zeno the Rhetorician, and his son Polemon^f, who being honoured by Cæsar Augustus with the title of king, might perhaps out of complaisance to that prince add his name to that of Jupiter, calling the city Diocæsarea, the city of Jupiter and Cæsar. However the name of Laodicea, which Strabo derives from the river Lycus^g, prevailed. This city was famous for its wool, which was universally preferred on account of its softness, as the same author witnesses^h even

(I) As the word Κιβωτός signifies Ark or Coffer, some have supposed that it was so called, because the ark rested on the hill from which the river Marfya springs. But these writers confound the situation of Celene with that of Apamea; the former, which never bore the name of Cibotos, was situate at the foot of the hill Signia, but Apamea Cibotos at ten miles distance. As those who traded from Italy and Greece to Asia Minor, used to convey their wares to this city as a place of general resort (30), Salmastus thinks it was called Cibotos from its being, as it were, the common treasury of those countries (31). It is worth observing, that there are no fewer than seven cities bearing the same name, viz. Apamea of Bitbynia, Apamea of Media, Apamea on the Tigris, Apamea on the Euphrates, one in Persia, one in Syria, and one in Pbrygia; and all situate between two rivers, which made Bochart (32) conclude that they were so called from the Hebrew verb signifying to surround, whereof the import is plainly expressed in Jenas (33) אֶפְרַחֲבִי אֶפְרַחֲבִי aphaphuni majim.

a to that of Miletus so much cried up by the antients, and besides was of a very extraordinary blackness. With this the inhabitants carried on a very considerable trade, and were accounted the most wealthy people of all Asia Minor. Ptolemy makes Laodicea and Diocæsarea two different cities, wherein he is certainly mistaken. At Laodicea was one of the seven churches mentioned in the apocalypse, but at present not so much as the ruins of it are any where to be seen, that prophetic threat being fully accomplished; I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot—because thou art luke-warm—I will spue thee out of my mouth * (K).

Hierapolis famous for its mineral waters, which, according to Strabo's account, when exposed to the air petrified in the space of a year, and yet were endued with such a virtue as to render the fields they watered exceeding fruitful, and prove a present remedy against innumerable distempers to such as used them *. Near this city was to be seen an opening on the edge of a hill of an extraordinary depth, always overspread with a thick fog, and exhaling such a pestilent steam, that no living creature could come within the reach of it without being immediately stifled. Strabo and Pliny *, except the Galli or eunuchs of Cybele, Ammianus and Dio Nicæus all eunuchs (L) *.

Gordium, the seat of Gordius, king of Phrygia, and famous for the Gordian knot which we shall have occasion to mention hereafter. This town was situated on the borders of Phrygia towards Cappadocia, and not between the two Phrygia's, where c Justin places it *. Not long after the death of Gordius it was reduced to a poor beggarly village, as Strabo calls it, and continued in this despicable condition till the triumvirate of Augustus, when it was again made a city and called Juliopolis by one Cleo, a famous robber, native of that place (M).

Colosse, now Chonos, on the south side of the Mæander, to the people whereof St. Paul wrote that epistle which is part of our canon.

Sipylus the residence of king Tantalus, and therefore called also Tantalus. Some place this city in Mæonia, supposing Tantalus to have reigned there. 'Tis observable that four cities, viz. Sipylus, Archæopolis, Colpe, and Lebade, were successively built on the same spot, and destroyed by earthquakes.

d Synnada, Synada, or Synade, noted for its marble quarries. This city was by Constantine the Great declared the metropolis of Phrygia Salutaris, after his division of Phrygia into Pacatiana and Salutaris took place (N). Besides these and several

(K) Terrari in his dictionary tells us that Laodicea is still called Laudichia, and by the Turks Nov-Lefbe, that it is one of the archbishopricks of Asia Minor, &c. But he is either mistaken, or the town was not quite demolished in his time; at present it lies in ruins, and is only the habitation of wild beasts. Several travellers misled by the similitude of names have taken the village Laotik near Angora for Laodicea. At Eskibissar, as it is now called, there are still to be seen four theatres of white marble, as intire as if they had been but lately built; near one of them is an inscription in honour of the emperor Titus, which the reader will find in Spon's account of the seven churches (34).

(L) Strabo, an eye-witness (35) says, that in his time this Plutonium or opening was inclosed with balisters taking up about half an acre of ground in compass, that the pestilent steam kept within that inclosure, so that one might approach the balister without the least danger; but whoever advanced one step further was immediately stifled. What Strabo affirms is vouched by Ammianus, Dio Nicæus, both eye-witnesses, Apuleius, and many others (36). The city of Hierapolis is now called Bamboakkale, and some foot-steps of what it once was, are to be seen in the many heaps of ruins and fine pillars in the fields where it stood; insomuch that Dr. Smith after viewing them could not help thinking this city to have been inferior to none.

(M) This Cleo having with a band of robbers possessed himself of a strong hold on mount Olympus called Collydium, by frequent excursions from thence prevented the officers of Labienus prefect of Asia from gathering the annual tributes, on which consideration he was by Marc Antony rewarded with large territories. But in the Asiatic war revolting from Antony he sided with Augustus, who added great part of Morena to what Antony had bestowed on him, erected him prefect of Jupiter Abrotenus worshipped by the Mæsians, and high-priest of Bellona, adored in Commana of Pontus, a dignity no ways inferior to that of king (37).

(N) In the fifth general council held at Constantinople, Severus subscribed as bishop of Synnada the metropolis of Phrygia Salutaris (38); and yet Socrates in his ecclesiastical history (39), and Nicephorus blindly following him place this city in Phrygia Pacatiana (40). And here we may observe, by the way, that in the fourth general council held at Chalcedon, Abercius subscribed as bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia Salutaris (41), which some have looked upon as a mistake crept into the acts of that council, not reflecting that besides the more known city of Hierapolis in Phrygia Pacatiana, there was another of less note in Phrygia Salutaris. They are both mentioned by Pliny (42), and the one said to be under the jurisdiction of Laodicea, the other under that of Pergamus.

other cities of less note mentioned by the antients, there were in latter times some of no small account, such as Sagua the habitation of Etrogul father of Ottoman the first king of the Turks, Chara-chisar, by the Greeks called Melampyrus, or the Black-tower, Cilleuxga, Einegiol, &c. taken by the said Ottoman from the christian princes at the first rise of the Ottoman empire.

THE rivers of this country which we shall take notice of are, the Meander, now Madre and Mindre, a river so celebrated by the antients for its windings and turnings, that all obliquities are from thence called Meanders. It rises on the hill Celene, the same as Aulocrene mentioned by Pliny, at the foot of which stood antiently a famous city of the same name. Pliny and Strabo derive it from a lake on the top of the said hill. It passes through Phrygia, divides Caria from Lydia, and after 600 windings, by which it seems to flow back to its fountain-head, empties itself into the Archipelago between Priene and Miletus (O).

THE river Marfya, so named from Marfya, a celebrated musician, who challenging Apollo, was by him overcome, and fled for his presumption. Most of the antients tell us that this river hath its spring near that of the Meander; but Maximus Tyrius, who was upon the spot, derives them both from the same source, and so does Strabo. It rushes down from a considerable height between rugged rocks and precipices with great noise, on which account it was called by Herodotus Cataracta. It has not only the same spring with the Meander, but flows in the same channel through the town of Celene standing at the foot of the river on which it rises. In leaving the town the main stream divides itself into two branches, and forms these two rivers, the one the most winding river in the world, the other without so much as one turning during its whole course, and therefore flowing with an incredible rapidity. Near Apamea, that is after a course of ten miles only, the Marfya is again received within the banks of the Meander, which is left at Celene; so that in reality these two rivers are but two branches of the same original stream. Q. Curtius gives us a noble description of it, and adds, that while it flows within the walls of Celene, it is named Marfya, which name, on its leaving that city, it changes for that of Lycus; but with this author's leave, Marfya and Lycus are quite different rivers; the Lycus springs from mount Olympus, and discharges itself into the Meander not far from Laodicea, which was therefore called Laodicea on the Lycus; this is a quite different course from that of the Marfya, which we have already described (P).

Sangarius Sangaris, or Sangurus, is numbered by Pliny among the rivers of note; it springs from the hill Dindymus, washes Phrygia and Bitynia, and empties itself into the Black-Sea. Phryx, which divides Phrygia from Caria, and disembogues itself into the Hermus, now Sarabat. Hermus, much celebrated by the poets for its gold sands, takes its rise near Dorylaum, and falls into the Archipelago near Smyrna. Mysias, Orgos, Obrima, &c.

(O) The Cayster, now Minderfcare, bears such a resemblance to the Meander, that many of our modern travellers, and among them the incomparable Pietro della valle, du Loir, and Monconis, have mistaken the one for the other (42). The Turks call the Cayster Coutchouk-mindre and Minderfcare, that is, the little Meander, or the black Meander; and the Meander itself Bojouk-Mindre, the great Meander. Some have observed that it forms in its course the following Greek characters, ξ, ζ, ρ, ω, α, some pretend that Dardalus formed his labyrinth on this plan. Seneca (43) calls it poetarum omnium exercitatio & Judas; but Ovid's description of it (44) is, in our opinion, an inimitable piece, and far preferable to any other.

(P) The poets feign that Marfya having challenged Apollo, who fled him for his pride and arrogance, his death was so bemoaned by the nymphs and satyrs, that from their tears sprung a river called after him Marfya. This Marfya is said to have been the son of Olympus, and one of the most ingenious men of his age. He was the inventor of the pipe called Syrinx, and the first that brought in the playing on two pipes at a time. He was born, put to death, and buried near the spring of the river that bears his name. Pliny (45) gravely writes, that in his time was still to be seen the plane-tree, on which this unhappy musician ended his days. Others say, with the same appearance of truth, that it was a pine-tree. Maximus Tyrius (46) informs us that the rivers Meander and Marfya were both worshipped by the inhabitants of Celene; and adds, that the victims and offerings, though thrown into the common stream, never failed being carried by the waters at their parting, into the channel of that river for which the pious votaries had designed them. The river Lycus, which Q. Curtius, and with him Mr. Spon, mistakes for the Marfya (47), runs a few miles under-ground, but appears again before it loses itself in the Meander, which Ovid seems to have been ignorant of when he said (48).

SECT.

S E C T. III.

Of the antiquity, government, religion, customs, arts, learning, &c. of the antient Phrygians.

TH E Phrygians deemed themselves the most antient people of the world, which Their antiquity. opinion seems to have prevailed even among the Egyptians, at least in the time of Psammyticus, who in point of antiquity looked upon all other nations with an eye of contempt. For we are told ^k, that after the experiment, which we have mentioned elsewhere ^l, those great boasters of antiquity acknowledged the Phrygians to be more antient, challenging only the second rank to themselves. And hence it is that Apu-leius ^m distinguishes them with the epithet of first-born.

As to their origin, some suppose them descended from Togarmab, one of the Origin. Gomer's sons; and of this opinion are Josephus and S. Hierome ⁿ, who adds that they were known to the Hebrews under the name of Tigrammanes. Herodotus ^o, Strabo ^p, Pliny ^q, and Eustathius ^r, led by the similitude of names, a deceitful guide, derive them from the Brigians, a people of Macedonia, who passing into Asia Minor, were, with a small alteration, called Phrygians, and the country, which they settled in, named Phrygia. We are not unwilling to allow, that as the Phrygians and Brigians, bore antiently the same name, so they were originally one and the same people; but how it can be deduced from thence, that the Brigians passed out of Europe into Asia rather than the Phrygians out of Asia into Europe, is what we do not comprehend. All that can be concluded from this similitude, or, if you please, identity of names, is, that they were both derived from the same origin; but in order to c prove that the Phrygians were a colony of the Brigians, rather than the Brigians a colony from Phrygia, recourse must be had to some other argument. All we can say is, that if the Phrygians had been descended from the Macedonians, it is not likely they would have piqued themselves so much on their antiquity; at least other nations, namely the Egyptians, would not so readily have yielded to them the priority. Bochart ^s is of opinion, that the Phrygians were the offspring of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet, the word Phrygia being, as we have observed elsewhere, the Greek translation of his name. Josephus makes Gomer the father of the Galatians, but he by the Galatians must necessarily mean the Phrygians inhabiting that part of Phrygia, which the Galatians had made themselves masters of; the descendants of d Gomer being placed by Ezekiel ^t northward of Judea, near Togarmab (which Bochart takes to be Cappadocia) long after the Gauls passed over into Asia. Most of the modern writers will have the Cimmerii to be the offspring of Gomer, understanding their country by the country of Gomer mentioned in the scripture. But as the Cimmerians lay beyond the Euxine sea, at a vast distance from Judea, we can hardly think that the Jews had any knowledge of a nation so remote from them. The Chaldee paraphrasts place Gomer in Afric, wherein they must certainly be mistaken, since it is plain from Ezekiel ^u, that his country lay northward of Judea. We are therefore willing to let Gomer enjoy the fine country which Bochart is pleased to give him, and allow him the honour of being the progenitor of the Phrygians, since we have e no body else to bestow it on.

THE antient Phrygians are described as a superstitious, voluptuous, and effeminate Their cha- race, without any prudence or forecast, and of such a servile temper, that nothing rafter. but stripes and ill-usage could make them comply with their duty, which gave rise to several trite and well-known proverbs (Q). They are said to have been the

(Q) Phryges sero sapiunt, Phryx verberatus melior, Phryx non minus quam spynbarus, &c. which proverbs intimate their servile temper, and shew that they were more fit to bewail misfortunes in an unmanly manner, than to prevent them by proper measures. Their music too was suited to their effeminate temper. The Doric mood was a kind of grave and solid music; the Lydian a doleful and lamentable harmony; but the Phrygians chiefly calculated to effeminate and enervate the mind. But this is contradicted by others.

first inventors of divination by the singing, flying and feeding of birds. Their music, commonly called the Phrygian mood, is alledged by some as an argument of their effeminacy.

ment.*

CONCERNING their government thus much may be said, that it was monarchical, and that all Phrygia was, during the reigns of some kings, subject to one prince. Ninnacus, Midas, Manis, Gordius, and his descendants, were certainly lords of all Phrygia. But some time before the Trojan war we find this country divided into several petty kingdoms, and read of divers princes reigning at the same time. Appollodorus * mentions a king of Phrygia contemporary with Ilus king of Troy. Cedrenus * and others speak of one Teutibrans king of a small country in Phrygia, whose territories were ravaged by Ajax, himself slain in a single combat, his royal seat laid in ashes, and his daughter, by name Tecmessa, carried away captive by the conqueror. Homer † makes mention of Phorcys and Ascanius, both princes, and leaders of the Phrygian auxiliaries, that came to the relief of Troy. Tantalus was king of Sipylus only and its district, a prince no less famous for his great wealth, than infamous for his covetousness, and other detestable vices. Whether Phrygia was ever subdued by Ninus, as Diodorus Siculus informs us, or by the Amazons, as we read in Suidas ‡, is much questioned by the learned. Most authors, that speak of Gordius, tell us that the Phrygians having sent to consult an oracle in order to know how they might put an end to the intestine broils, which rent their country into many factions and parties, received for answer, that the most effectual means to deliver themselves and their country from the calamities they groaned under, was to commit the government to a king, which they did accordingly, placing Gordius on the throne. Whence we may conclude that some time before his accession to the crown, an aristocratical or democratical form of government had been introduced.

laws, learning*

As to their trade, all we can say is, that Apamea was the chief emporium of all Asia Minor. Thither resorted merchants and traders from all parts of Greece, Italy, and the neighbouring islands. Besides, we know from Synecellus that the Phrygians were for some time masters of the sea (he says 25 years) and none but trading nations ever prevailed on that element. The country was stocked with many choice and useful commodities, and well able to afford considerable exports. They had a safe coast, convenient harbours, and whatever may incline us to think that they carried on a considerable trade. But as most of the Phrygian records are lost, we will not dwell on conjectures so hard to be ascertained.

We have no set form of their laws; and as to their learning, since we are told that for some time they enjoyed the sovereignty of the sea, we may, at least, allow them a competent skill in geography, geometry, and astronomy, and add to these, from what we have said above, a more than ordinary knowledge of music.

Their language

SOME have been of opinion that the Phrygian language bore a great resemblance to the Greek; but the contrary is manifest from the few Phrygian words which have been transmitted to us, and carefully collected by Bochart * and Rudbeckius †. To these we may add the authority of Strabo ‡, who after attempting to derive the name of a Phrygian city from the Greek, concludes that it is a difficult matter to discover any similitude between the barbarous words of the Phrygian language and the Greek. The Phrygian tongue after the experiment made by Psammetichus king of Egypt, as we have mentioned elsewhere §, was looked upon by the Egyptians as the most antient language of the world. But other nations, namely the Scythians, refused to submit to their opinion as founded on an argument of no real weight. As the two children, say they, had never heard the voice of any human creature, the word Bec or Bekkos, the first they uttered, was only an imitation of the goats that had suckled them, and happened to be a Phrygian word signifying bread (R). A late writer ¶ after observing that Homer in several passages distinguishes the language of the gods from that of men, endeavours to shew that the poet by the language of the gods meant the Greek, and by that of men the Phrygian (S).

(R) Goropius Becanus makes use of the same argument to prove that the High-Dutch is the original or mother-tongue of the world, because the word Bicker in that language signifies a baker.

(S) Geibofradus Lakemacherus in order to prove this chuses the two following verses (49) :

- a As to the religion of the antient Phrygians, we have already observed that they Their religion. were greatly addicted to superstition. They had many idols, but the goddess Cybele seems to have been their principal deity. She was called Cybele, Berecynthia, Dindymene, from Cybelus Berecynthus, Dindymenus, all hills of Phrygia, and Idæa from mount Ida in Troas, because on these hills she was worshiped in a particular manner (T). She was also named Cubebe, because her priests, when seized with their frenetic fits, used to throw themselves on their heads, that name being derived from a Phœnician verb of that import. Arnobius gives us the following account of Cybele from the mythology of the Gentiles. There was a vast rock on the borders of Phrygia called in the language of that country Agdus, from whence Deucalion and Pyrrah, by the direction of Themis, took the stones, which they made use of to repair mankind after the deluge. From one of these sprung Cybele the great mother of the gods. The same rock conceived by Jupiter, and brought forth Acæstis, who is said to have been an hermaphrodite, of invincible strength, of a most cruel and intractable temper, and, above all, a most outrageous enemy of the gods, who were in no small fear of him, till Bacchus by a cunning contrivance found means to deprive him of his manhood, and thereby rendered him somewhat more tractable. From the blood he shed on this occasion sprung up a pomegranate-tree loaded with fruit in full perfection and maturity, which Nana daughter to king Sangarius being wonderfully taken with, gathered one, and, as it was of a most beautiful appearance, put it in her bosom. This cost her dear, for soon after proving with child, notwithstanding all her protestations of innocence, she was by her father shut up and condemned to starve. But being maintained alive with fruit conveyed to her by Cybele, she was in due time delivered of a son, who being exposed by his grandfather's order, was privately taken up by one Pborbus, and nursed with goats milk; whence he was called Attis, the word Attagos in the Phrygian dialect signifying a goat. As he grew up he proved a most beautiful youth, and was on that score greatly favoured both by Cybele and Acæstis; nay Midas king of Phrygia then residing at Pessinus, was so taken with him, that he designed to bestow on him his only daughter, by name Ida. The day appointed for the nuptials being come, Midas, to prevent any disturbance that other suitors might create, caused the gates of the city to be shut and well guarded. But no gates or guards could keep out the great mother of the gods, who being stung with jealousy, presented herself at the gate of the royal palace, with the walls of the city, and all their turrets on her head; whence she was ever afterwards pictured with a crown of towers on her head. At the same time came Acæstis, who inspiring with an enthusiastic frenzy all who assisted at the fatal nuptials, changed the genial banquet into a scene of horror and confusion. The unhappy bridegroom in the height of his fury emasculating himself under a pine-tree, soon after died of the wound; the bride laying violent hands on herself accompanied her spouse to the shades. Acæstis and Cybele drenched in tears long bewailed the untimely and where Homer tells us that the river here mentioned is by the gods named Xanthus, and by men Scamander. He shews, that as Xanthos is a Greek word signifying yellow, the abovementioned river had very probably its name from the Greeks, who gave the same name, as Strabo (50) witnesses, to another river in Lycia on account of its yellow sands. From hence he infers that Homer, by the language of the gods, can mean no other than the Greek. As to the word Scamander, he thinks that this name was communicated to the river from one Scamandrius, son of Hector, and king of the Phrygians, whose territories were watered by this river, it being a common custom among the antients to call the rivers after the names of the princes through whose countries they had their course. Now as Scamandrius, says he, was a Phrygian, his name was undoubtedly taken from that language; from whence he concludes that the name of the river Scamander is originally Phrygian, and that Homer by the language of men means the Phrygian. This author concludes the same of all other passages in Homer, where such a distinction is made; the more because two other words attributed by Homer to men, viz. Batia and Kumindis are without doubt Phrygian; the one being the name of a hill in Phrygia, and the other of a bird mostly frequenting mount Ida in Troas.

(T) Philostephanus is of opinion that the hill Dindymene was so called, because it had διδύμους μάρτυς, two tops; but Strabo says in express terms that it has but one. Bochart (51) thinks that a cymbal was in the Phrygian language called Dindum, as it is in the Syrian Zinnam; and from thence he derives the name of the hill Dindymus; the more because the invention of cymbals is generally ascribed to the Phrygians, and in particular to this goddess (52), whose festival was on that account solemnized on mount Dindymene with great noise of cymbals, drums, trumpets, and other instruments.

cruel death of their beloved Attis, and Jupiter having, at their joint entreaties, exempted his body from corruption, a magnificent temple was erected to his memory in Pessinus, ceremonies instituted, priests appointed, &c. Thus far Arnobius.

Eusebius ^a gives us a very different account of Cybele and Attis or Atys, copied, as he informs us, from the ancient Phrygian mythologists. According to these, the first king of Phrygia, by name Meon, was father to Cybele, who being smitten with the charms of Attis, proved with child by him; whereupon Meon caused Attis to be put to death, at which Cybele being unspeakably grieved, wandered long up and down Phrygia seeking in the mountains and woods some allay to her grief. Her sorrow being in length of time somewhat assuaged, she admitted Apollo into an intimacy with her, and with him wandered to the Hyperboreans. By his order the body of Attis was interred, and Cybele after her death ranked among the gods. From these two accounts of Cybele, which come both from very good hands, we may conclude that the Phrygians had different genealogies for, and traditions of, this their chief deity (U).

THIS goddess was pictured sitting in a chariot drawn by four lions, crowned with towers, holding a key in her hand, and attired with a garment seeded with flowers of different colours. The mythologists by Cybele mean the earth, taking her crown of towers to be an emblem of the towns and cities built thereon; the key she holds in her hand intimates that the earth, which, during the winter, is in a certain manner locked up, begins to open in the spring, and the seeds to shoot up; her garment variegated with flowers of divers colours is a symbol of the earth beautifully enamelled with all kinds of flowers; the lions that draw her chariot denote her empire over all sorts of animals, which she both produces and nourishes; finally Saturn, that is Time, is feigned to be her husband, to signify that the earth produces nothing but in time. Eusebius and others are of opinion that Cybele was a woman famous for remedies against such distempers as young children are subject to, and that on this skill or knowledge are grounded all the stories that are related of her.

Cybele had her peculiar priests, ceremonies and sacrifices. Her priests were called in the Phrygian language Cubeboi for the reason we have alledged above. The Greeks and Latins named them Curetes, Corybantes, which is the Greek translation of the word Cubeboi, and Galli from the river Gallus flowing through Pessinus, where this goddess had a magnificent temple. They were also stiled Idæi dactyli; but it is no easy matter to account for this appellation. Sophocles quoted by Strabo ^a informs us that they were called Idæi because they inhabited mount Ida, and Dactyli from the Greek word Dactylus, signifying a finger, they being at first ten, which is the number of a man's fingers. Strabo indeed numbers five brothers¹, viz. Hercules, Pæon, Epimides, Jasias, and Idas, adding that they had as many sisters. But in other writers we find three only mentioned, and quite different from those Strabo speaks of, viz. Kelmis, Damnameneus, and Acmon. Apollonius ^a acknowledges but two, Fitia and Cyllenus. Some derive the name of Corybantes from the word Cerberus, signifying in the Phœnician language valiant, and add that they were the guards of the first kings of Phrygia ^a (W).

(U) The Roman writers differ widely from those we have quoted, and frequently among themselves. Cybele according to them was the daughter of heaven and earth, wife of Saturn, and the same with Ops, Rhea, Vesta, and the Bona dea. She was exposed immediately after her birth on mount Cybelus, nursed there first by wild beasts, and after by the wife of a shepherd, who found her by chance, &c. The Romans having learnt from the books of the sibyls that they would never be able to drive the Carthaginians out of Italy till the Idæan mother was brought to Rome, sent thereupon ambassadors to king Attalus, who delivered to them a stone, which the inhabitants of Pessinus called the great mother of the gods. This happened in the year of Rome

550 (53). 'Tis to be observed that the Romans made Cybele to be the same with Vesta, but acknowledged two goddesses bearing the same appellation, which their poets frequently confound; Cybele was that Vesta they called the earth, and wife to Saturn, she was called Vesta because Stat vi terra sua, as Ovid says, vi stans Vesta vocatur. The other was daughter to Saturn, and the goddess of fire, or rather fire itself, according to that verse of the same poet, Nec tu aliud Vesta quam vivam intellige flammam.

(W) Diodorus tells us (54) that Cybele was daughter to Meon king of Phrygia, that she married Jasius a Samothracian, the brother of Dardanus, and had by him a son called Corybas; that after the death of her husband she went with Dardanus and Cory-

- a THE ceremonies performed by these priests in honour of this goddess were 1st, At stated times they used to carry her statue about the streets dancing and skipping round it, and after having with violent gesticulations worked themselves up to the height of frenzy, they began to cut and slash their bodies with knives and lancets, appearing seized with a divine fury. This ceremony was performed in commemoration of the grief wherewith Cybele was transported at the death of her beloved Attis: 2dly, A pine-tree was yearly wrapp'd up in wool, and with great solemnity carried by the priests into the temple of the goddess, in commemoration of her wrapping up after the same manner the dead body of Attis, and carrying it to her cave; on these occasions the priests were crowned with violets, which were
- b supposed to have sprung from the blood of Attis, when he laid violent hands on himself. The victims immolated in honour of the Phrygian goddesses were a bull or a she-goat, whence the sacrifice was called Taurobolium or Criobolium. At Rome a sow was yearly sacrificed to her, and the ceremony performed by a priest and priestess sent for out of Phrygia on that occasion. Her priests, (those at least who were known under the name of Galli) were all eunuchs; this the great goddess required of them in memory of Attis; the waters of the river Gallus, when plentifully drunk, were believed to inspire them with such a frenetic enthusiasm as to perform the operation on themselves without the least reluctance. They were not allowed to drink wine, because Attis, overcome with that liquor, disclosed his amours
- c with Acdestis, which he had ever before concealed with the utmost care. They abstained from bread, in commemoration of the long fast which Cybele kept after the death of the same Attis. They held oaths to be unlawful on all occasions, which tenet, some tell us, was common to all the Phrygians. The priests were placed after their death on a stone ten cubits high*. Though the Romans professed a great veneration for Cybele, yet we find that they looked upon her priests as the very refuse of mankind; of which we have a signal instance in Valerius Maximus†, who tells us that one Genucius, a Gallus or eunuch of Cybele, having by a decree of the Prætor been admitted to the possession of an estate that had been bequeathed him, Mamer-

bar into Phrygia, and introduced into that country the mysteries of the mother of the gods, calling the goddess after her own name Cybele, and her priests Corybantes from her son Corybas. Thus Diadorus; but Dionysius (55) informs us, that Dardanus instituted the Samothracian mysteries, that his wife Coryse learnt them in Arcadia, and that Idæus the son of Dardanus instituted afterwards the mysteries of the mother of the gods in Phrygia. Herodotus brings the Curetes out of Phœnicia with Cadmus; and Sir Isaac Newton (56) thinks that having followed Cadmus out of Phœnicia, some of them settled in Phrygia, where they were called Corybantes, some in Crete, where they were named Idæi dactyli, others in Rhodes, where they were siled Telebins; others in Samothrace, where they were known under the name of Cabiri; some in Eubœa, where, as they were well skilled in arts and sciences, they wrought in copper (iron not being yet invented) in a city thence called Calchis; some in Lemnos, where they assisted Vulcan; some in Imbrus; and a very considerable number of them in Ætolia, which was thence called the country of the Curetes, till Ætolus the son of Endymion possessing himself of it, called it Ætolia. These Curetes making themselves armour used to dance in it at the sacrifices with great noise of pipes, and drums, and swords, which they struck upon one another's armour, keeping time, and forming some kind of harmony. And this is reckoned the origin of music in Greece both by Solinus and Isidorus (57). Clement Alexandrinus (58) ascribes to the Curetes the invention of musical rhymes, and of the letters call'd Ephesian. And Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion (59), that when the Phœnician letters were by Cadmus brought into Greece, they were at the same time introduced into Phrygia and Crete by the Curetes, who called them Ephesian from the city of Ephesus, where they were first taught. These Curetes were no less esteemed for their skill and knowledge in religious matters, and mystical practices, than for their arts and sciences (60). In Phrygia they attended the mysteries of Cybele; in Crete and the Terra Cretæ those of Jupiter, who had been brought up under their care and tuition in a cave of mount Ida, where they danced about him in their armour with great noise to drown the cries of the infant, and conceal him from his father Saturn who sought his destruction. Bochart (61) brings them from Palestine, and thinks they had the name of Curetes from a people among the Philistines called Crethim or Crethibites. We must not forget that Cybele or the Great Mother was sometimes represented with a key, and sometimes with a drum in her hand; which has made some think that she was the same with the Syrian goddess Astarte, whose chariot was also drawn by lions. Lucian tells us (62), that she was the Cretan Rhea, that is, according to some, Europa the sister of Cadmus; and thus the Phœnicians first introduced, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, among the Greeks and Phrygians the practice of deifying their dead; for we meet with no instance of any such practice before the departure of Cadmus and Europa from Sidon.

cus Æmilius Lepidus, at that time consul, being appealed to, reversed the decree ^a of the prætor, adding thereunto, that an eunuch, as being neither man nor woman, could not enjoy any privileges of that nature. This judgment Valerius Maximus extolls as a decree worthy of Mamercus, worthy of one that was at the head of the senate, since it put a stop to the appearing of eunuchs in the courts of judicature, and defiling the tribunals with their unhallowed presence, under pretence of suing for justice.

BESIDES Cybele, who was the peculiar deity of Phrygia, the Phrygians had divers other idols; namely Bacchus whom they stiled Sabazios, and his priests and temples Saboi, whence Bochart derives the Hebrew word Sabbath, as that of Levite from Lyfius and Evius ^a. Apollodorus acquaints us ^b that while Bacchus was travelling through Phrygia, he was purified by Cybele, instructed in her mysteries, and presented by her with a stole, which was the first he ever used (X). Adagyus, whom Bochart ^c takes to be Hermaphroditus, the son of Venus and Mercury, there being, at least to his ear, a great similitude of sound between Adagyus and Androgynus. Some rank also the Cabiri or Cabires among the Phrygian deities, and add, that they were so called from Cabirus a hill in Phrygia, or, as Stephimbrotus terms it, in Berecynthia ^d. But others, with more appearance of truth, derive their name from the Hebrew word Cabir, signifying great or powerful ^e. Some confine the number of the Cabiri to two, viz. Jupiter and Bacchus; but Manaseas enumerates four, Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto and Mercury, whom he disguises under the uncouth appellations of Axiuros, Axiokersa, Axiokersos, and Kasmiros; to these Dionysiodorus adds a fourth, whom he stiles Casmiros, called by others Camillus, and the same with Mercury; but he is universally looked upon as one of an inferior rank, and no ways on the level with the Cabiri, termed the most high, the most powerful ^f. But these we shall have occasion to mention when we come to speak of the Samothracian deities.

WE likewise read of some dances and songs used by the Phrygians in solemnizing the festivals of their gods, and sometimes on other occasions, which they called Lityerses from Lityerses son of Midas king of Phrygia. Hesychius mentions certain Phrygian dances called by him Bricismata, without doubt from the word Briges the antient name of the Phrygians ^a. Some speak of a dance called Sicinnis, invented, ^d say they, by a Phrygian nymph, and used by the Phrygians in honour of Sabatius, whom they add to the number of the other Phrygian gods ^b. But it is now time to proceed to the history of the Phrygian kings.

(X) Stephanus (63) writes that when Bacchus was born, Jupiter committed the care of him to one of Cybele's female attendants, by name Ma, who being asked by Juno, whose child she nursed, answered, that it was the child of Mars, whence Bacchus in the Carian dialect was called Masaris or Masares, that is, the Mars of Ma.

S E C T. IV.

The reigns of the kings of PHRYGIA.

THE successions and reigns of the kings of Phrygia are overcast with such an impenetrable mist, and interrupted with so many chasms, that it is no easy matter to give any tolerable account of them. However we shall here produce what occurs in history relating thereto, and appears most worthy of credit.

THE first king of Phrygia we find mentioned in history is Nannacus, Annacus or Cannacas, for he bore all these appellations. Suidas ^a says that he reigned before the flood of Deucalion, and that from thence things exceeding ancient were proverbially said to be from the time of Nannacus. He lived to a very great age, for it is recorded of him that when he was above three hundred years old he sent to enquire of all such oracles as were in any repute how long he should live. The oracles unanimously answered, that at his death all things were to perish; whereupon a repairing with his subjects to the temples of the gods, he strove there with many sighs and tears to appease their wrath, and avert the impending calamities; and thence to weep like Nannacus, became a trite expression to signify an extraordinary grief or sorrow². Not long after Nannacus died, and the flood of Deucalion ensued, which was attended with the destruction of mankind.

Midas appears next, of whom all we can say is that he resided at Pessinus, and designed to dispose of his daughter, by name La, in marriage to Attis or Alys, as we have already mentioned. This perhaps is the Midas who built, as Diodorus Siculus informs us³, a magnificent temple at Pessinus, and appointed yearly sacrifices to be performed there in honour of the great mother of the gods. Hyginus seems to make him the son of *Cybele*⁴.

THE next king we read of is Manis, a prince, as *Plutarch*⁵ informs us, of such prowess and virtue, that the word Manic, derived from his name, became synonymous with Great, whence Manic achievements were among the Phrygians the same as great, glorious, heroic achievements⁶.

AFTER these reigned Gordius, who was raised from the plough to the throne. His rise is related thus⁷: While he was one day ploughing, an eagle settled on the yoke, and continued there all day. Gordius, terrified at this prodigy, went to consult the soothsayers of Telmessus, a city in Lydia, about this so extraordinary an event; for the art of divining was, in a manner, hereditary to all the Telmessians.

c At his entering the city he met with a most beautiful young woman, who upon his enquiring after the soothsayers, and acquainting her with the motives of his journey, informed him, as she was herself skilled in the art, that nothing less than a kingdom was presaged by that omen; and therewithal offered herself ready to share with him, in wedlock, the hopes with which she had inspired him. This offer seemed to him the greatest happiness that could attend a crown, he therefore readily complied with her request, gratifying at the same time his own inclination. Not long after a sedition breaking out among the Phrygians, the oracles, which they consulted on that occasion, were all unanimous in advising them to commit the government to a king, if they desired to put a stop to the growing evils. Upon this the Phrygians having sent again to consult about the person whom they should raise to that dignity, their ambassadors were enjoined to acquaint them, that the first man, who after their return should visit in a cart the temple of Jupiter, was by the gods designed for their king. The ambassadors had scarce delivered the answer of the oracle, when Gordius appeared riding in his cart, and was immediately with loud shouts of joy proclaimed king of Phrygia. Gordius, acknowledging the crown from Jupiter, in memory of so signal a favour consecrated in his temple the cart to regal majesty, which not by the Phrygians only, but other nations, was adored as a goddess. To the beam of the cart he fastened a knot woven with such art, and so perplexed, that the monarchy of the world was promised by the oracles to him who should untie it, which Alexander the Great having attempted in vain, cut it at last with his sword, and thereby either fulfilled or eluded the oracle. We know nothing more of Gordius, but that he built the city of Gordium, which was his residence, and that of all the princes of the Gordian family. Plutarch writes⁸, that his son Midas was born of the goddess worshipped by the Romans under the name of Bona Dea; but whether she was wife to Gordius is much questioned by the mythologists (Y).

(Y) Midas, the son of Gordius, according to Ælian and Arrian (64), was the first king of the Gordian family that reigned in Phrygia. They tell us that the Phrygians, having enquired of the oracle by what means they could put an end to their intestine broils, received for answer, that a cart would bring them a king who should restore their country to its former tranquillity; and that while they were musing on this answer, Midas came riding in his cart into the throng, who was immediately acknowledged king. But most writers begin, as we have done, the reign of the Gordian family with Gordius himself. Justin (65) makes Midas king of the Bri- gians in Macedonia; and adds, that being driven from his own territories he retired into Asia Minor, where the Brigians with a small alteration were termed Phrygians. According to this writer then the Phrygians, under the conduct of Midas, migrated out of Europe into Asia, and of course there were no Phrygians in Asia before Midas; how then could his father Gordius reign in Phrygia, and be raised to the throne from so mean a condition, as Justin himself relates? As to the Gordian knot, some authors say that it was of the bark of a cornel tree, and that it fastened the yoke of the cart to the beam.

Gordius was succeeded by his son Midas, of whom it was recorded, that when he ^a was a child, a swarm of ants was observed very busy one day, while he was asleep, in conveying their stores of wheat into his mouth; whereupon the oracles being consulted, returned answer, that immense riches were presaged by that omen. The prediction was completely fulfilled, for he is accounted by all the antients as one of the richest princes that ever reigned^a. Strabo^b says that he drew vast treasures from mines of metal, discovered perhaps in his reign, on mount Bermius. He is greatly commended by some writers for the comeliness of his person, by others for the religious bent of his mind. He is said to have been instructed by Orpheus in the mysteries of religion, and to have filled Phrygia with new deities, temples, priests, ceremonies and sacrifices^c. He introduced the custom of mourning over ^b the dead with doleful songs or dirges, and by annually renewing his lamentations over his deceased mother brought the Phrygians by degrees to worship her as a goddess^a. He built the town of Ancyra^d, where an anchor of his contrivance was to be seen in the temple of Jupiter, when Pausanias travelled through Greece^e. He is said to have reigned not over Phrygia only, but also Dardania^f. Cleobulus Lyndius, one of the seven sages of Greece, honoured his monument with an epitaph^g, which is falsely ascribed by some to Homer^h. His wife, by name Hermodica, is celebrated by *Heraclides*ⁱ in regard of her beauty and wisdom, and said to have been the first that taught the inhabitants of Cyme to coin money. By her Midas had three sons, Gordius, Ancharas, and Otreus; his fourth son, Lityrses was a ^c bastard (Z).

AFTER Midas reigned his eldest son Gordius, but all we can say of him is, that he surrounded the town of Gordium with a wall^j. His brother Ancharas is celebrated for the love he bore his country, having even sacrificed his life for the publick welfare. The fact is related thus^k; during the reign of his father Midas the earth opened to a prodigious depth, and swallowed up great part of the city Celane; whereupon Midas, having recourse to his oracles, understood that the opening would not close till the most valuable thing in human life were thrown into it. This answer was no sooner imparted to the inhabitants, but all the gold, silver, jewels, and whatever else of any value came to their hands, was gladly sacrificed ^d to the common safety. But all to no effect, for the gap continuing open threatened both the city and citizens with present destruction, when Ancharas considering with himself that nothing in the world was of such value as a human soul, embraced

(Z) Nothing has rendered the name of Midas more famous than the Greek proverb Μιδάς ἐν ὠρίᾳ, that is, Midas has asses ears; but what gave rise to that saying is variously reported. The poets tell us that in a trial of skill between Pan and Apollo, both famous musicians, and rivals in that art, Midas gave sentence in favour of the former, whereupon Apollo clapp'd a pair of asses ears on his head: this badge of ignorance he artfully concealed a long time under his diadem; but at last it was unfortunately discovered by his barber, and made public. Others say that Midas having offered an affront to Bacchus, was by the incensed deity metamorphosed into an ass. Conon in his first narration (66) tells us that Midas, having found a treasure, became very rich; that being instructed by Orpheus on mount Pierius, he got himself by various artifices proclaimed king of the Brigians; that in his reign Silenus appeared on mount Brime, that whatever Midas touched was immediately turned into gold; and that making use of this prodigy, he persuaded his subjects to remove out of Europe into that country which lies on the Hellepont; that he settled in Mysia, and there changed the name of his subjects, calling them no more Brigians, but

Phrygians. He adds that Midas had a great many spies dispersed up and down the country, by whose information he knew whatever his subjects did or said, whence he reigned in peace and tranquillity to a great age, none of his subjects daring to enter into any plot or conspiracy against him. His knowing by this means whatever his subjects spoke of him occasioned the saying, that Midas had long ears; and as asses are said to be endowed with the sense of hearing to a degree of perfection above all other animals, he was also said to have asses ears; but in process of time, what was taken in a metaphorical sense began to run current in the world for truth. Tully (67) relates that Silenus being taken prisoner by Midas instead of paying gold for his ransom, taught the king, that the greatest happiness was not to be born, and next to that to die soon. To other fables the poets add, that for entertaining Bacchus he was rewarded by the gods with the virtue of changing into gold whatever he touched, which is interpreted by some as if he had been extremely covetous, studying by all means and methods to fill his coffers (68).

a his father, took leave of his wife Timothea, and mounting on horseback rid full speed into the opening, which immediately closed. His example was long after followed in a parallel case by Curtius the Roman.

Otreus is stiled by Homer ¹ king of all Phrygia, and said to have been contemporary with Anchises, whence we may conclude, that he succeeded his brother Gordius.

Lityerses reigned at Celene, and is described as a rustic, unsociable, and inhuman tyrant. Sophocles the tragedian paints him as one of an insatiable and canine appetite, having in one day, as this poet writes, emptied three large baskets of bread, and drank out twelve gallons of wine. He took great pleasure in agriculture, and b used often to labour in the fields like a common husband-man. But as acts of cruelty were what he chiefly delighted in, he used to oblige such as happened to pass by while he was reaping, to join with him in the work; and then cutting off their heads for their pains, bind up their bodies in the sheaves. For these and such like cruelties he was put to death by Hercules, and his body thrown into the Meander. However his memory was cherished by the reapers of Phrygia (for reaping was his favourite employment); and an hymn, from him called Lityerses, sung in harvest-time in honour of their fellow-labourer.

Midas II. was king of all Phrygia, but whose son he was, or whom he succeeded, Midas II. is what we find no-where recorded. He was an usurper, and seized on the crown c in the following manner: One night under pretence of offering a solemn sacrifice to the gods, he marched out of the town of Gordium, attended with a numerous band of Phrygians, playing on all sorts of musical instruments; but at the same time, as they were privy to their master's design, with swords and daggers concealed under their garments. The citizens, led by their curiosity, and not suspecting any treachery, followed them out of town, when the conspirators all on a sudden throwing away their musical instruments, fell upon the multitude sword in hand, seized the city, and in that terror and confusion nobody daring to oppose them, proclaimed Midas king of Phrygia.

Midas II. was succeeded by Gordius III. perhaps his son. He is mentioned by Gordius III. d Herodotus ² as father to Midas, and that is all we can say of him. Herodotus does not stile him king, but as his son reigned, it is not unlikely that he held the crown before him.

Midas III. son of Gordius, was the first among foreign princes that sent dona- Midas III. tions to the oracle at Delpbi; he presented that deity with the royal seat or tribunal, from whence he used to administer justice. Herodotus, in whose time it was still to be seen, commends it as a piece of most exquisite workmanship: at that time it stood by the golden cups, with which Gyges king of Lydia had presented the same oracle; for after Midas, Gyges was the first of the Barbarians, as Herodotus informs us, who sent presents to Delpbi. Perhaps this Midas was succeeded by another Gordius, for we find that the kings of Phrygia took alternatively the names of Gordius and Midas.

Midas IV. lived in most calamitous times, when the Cimmerians, being driven Midas IV. out of Europe by the Scythians, invaded Asior Minor, possessed themselves of Sardis, and made a most dreadful havock of the Lydians, Papblagonians, and Phrygians. Gordius not finding himself in a condition to oppose so powerful an enemy, and foreseeing the many evils that were inevitably to fall upon him, thought best to prevent them by putting an end to his unhappy days, which he did accordingly, drinking off a large cup of bull's blood. And this is the first time that we find this sort of death mentioned in history; his example was followed long after by f Psammetis king of Egypt, and Themistocles the Albenian. Plutarch ³ says, that Midas thus ended his life, being driven to despair by frightful dreams and apparitions; but these in all likelihood were occasioned from the terror and consternation he was in at the approach of so dreadful and merciless an enemy. Midas had two sons, Adrastus, and another whose name is not mentioned in history. Adrastus, having ^{Year of the flood 2447. Before Christ 576.} unfortunately killed his brother in his father's life time, and being thereupon banished Phrygia, repaired to the court of Crasus king of Lydia, who not only purified him according to the custom of those days, from the blood he had innocently shed, but earnestly pressed him to remain at his court, assuring him he should want for a nothing that Crasus could give him. Adraftus complied with his request, and being entrusted with the education of the king's favourite son by name Atys, he unfortunately killed him too at a chace; which so grieved him, that he laid violent hands on himself, though Crasus had generously forgiven him*. In him ended the royal family of Phrygia, which became a province of the Lydian monarchy, and continued in that state till Crasus was conquered, and all Lydia reduced by Cyrus, as we shall relate in the history of Lydia.

The history of PHRYGIA MINOR.

THE tract we commonly call Phrygia Minor was antiently styled Troas, Teucria,^b and Dardania, from kings that reigned in that country. It was also named Idea from mount Ida, and Phrygia from the Phrygians, who were masters of great part of it, some say before, others after the destruction of Troy; the epithet of Minor was added, to distinguish it from the other Phrygia, where Midas reigned, as Eustathius expresses himself*. In the reign of king Priam the name of Troas generally prevailed.

THIS country was divided into two parts, the maritime called Hellepontica; and the mediterranean termed Epiſtetus. The former borrowed its name from the Helleſpont, and extended along the coast from the town of Percote, to the promontory Lettum or Leſton opposite to the north side of the island of Lesbos. This part was^c properly called Troas or Troia, though the Trojan kingdom extended from the river Aefopus to the banks of the Caycus^d, including not only Troas, but also the Greater and Lesser Mysia. Epiſtetus, or the inland part of Phrygia Minor extended to the neighbourhood of mount Olympus in the Greater Mysia. This part at first belonged to Prusias king of Bithynia, who yielded it, by agreement, to Eumenes king of Pergamus, whence it was called Epiſtetus, that is, acquired. However these appellations are frequently confounded, and both attributed to all Phrygia Minor (A).

Phrygia Minor, as precisely as we can gather, lay between the forty and forty-second degrees of north latitude, and was but of a very small extent in longitude, which we shall not pretend to determine, there being a great disagreement among^d authors as to the boundaries of the inland provinces. In general we may say, that Phrygia Minor, as comprehending both the Helleſpontica and Epiſtetus, was bounded by the Propontis on the north, by the Aegean sea on the south, by Mysia Minor on the east, and the Helleſpont on the west.

ON the coast were the cities of Percote, Abydos, Arisba, Dardanum, Rhotum, Sigeum, Troy, or Ilium, Lariſſa, Colone, Alexandria, Troas, &c. Percote is often mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Arrian, and Homer, who mentions one Merops and his two sons as being of this city*. Abydos was built by the Milesians on the Helleſpont, and became famous for the poetical story of Hero and Leander. Here it was that Xerxes began his bridge so much talked of, over which, in seven days and seven^e nights, he marched, according to Herodotus, seventeen-hundred-thousand foot, and fourscore-thousand horse, exclusive of the camels and carriages. Here all Alexander's cavalry, and most of his infantry, landed under the command of Parmenio, on their passing out of Europe in Asia. The geographers are generally of opinion that the castles of the Dardanelles were built on the ruins of Sestos and Abydos;

(A) Strabo sometimes distinguishes Troas Helleſpontica from Epiſtetus, and sometimes confound them; nay, he often makes Epiſtetus part of Phrygia Major (69), wherein he agrees with Ptolemy. Eustathius distinguishes three Phrygia's, viz. the Greater where Midas reigned, extending as far as Pisidias; the Lesser lying on the Helleſpont, and from thence reaching to mount Olympus; the third he calls Epiſtetus, and places it near Dorylaeum.

- a but they are manifestly mistaken, for the castles are directly opposite to each other, whereas Sestos was a great way nearer the Propontis than Abydos; and Strabo^a reckons 3750 paces from the port of Abydos to that of Sestos. Besides there are no remains of antiquity to be seen near the castles, but very remarkable ones three miles further, where the channel is considerably narrower^b (B). Arisba, the place appointed for the general rendezvous of Alexander's army, after he had passed the Hellepont. Dardanum, built by king Dardanus, near a promontory, bearing the same name. This city was the residence of Dardanus, and his successor Erichtonius. It communicated its name to the neighbouring country, and in length of time to all Troas. Some think that the Dardanelles borrowed their name from this city. Here Mitbridates and
- b Sylla concluded a peace. Some say, with what foundation we know not, that Dardanum was the patrimony of Aeneas. Rhæteum, memorable for the tomb of Ajax, who was said to have been interred there^c. Sigeum, seated on a promontory of the same name, whence that sea is called the Sigean sea^d. On this promontory was the tomb of Achilles, which Alexander honoured with a visit, and in antient times a statue of the same Achilles^e, with ear-rings like the statue of a woman, which Tertullian^f interprets as an argument of his effeminacy in point of dress (C).

Troy or Ilium, a city of great fame, and made immortal by the inimitable poems of Homer and Virgil, was built by Tros king of that country, who called it Troy from his own name, and Ilium from that of his son Ilus. It was seated on a rising ground near mount Ida, and about five miles from the shore. There were scarce any remains of it to be seen in Strabo's time and most of the antient, as well as the modern writers, confound the old and new Ilium. All^g Strabo says of its situation is,

(B) The Hellepont, every one knows, signifies the sea of Helle; for the antients tell us, that a daughter of Atamas king of Thebes, whose name was Helle, was drowned in that channel as she was carrying the golden fleece to Colchis with her brother Phryxus (70). The name of Dardanelles is probably derived from Dardanum an antient city not far from the castles bearing that name. This strait was antiently called the Hellepont and the strait of Abydos; but now it goes under the following names, the strait of Gallipoli, the channel of the Dardanelles, the arm of St. George, from a famous church of St. George in a village called Peristasis not far from Gallipoli: it is known to the Turks by the name of Boghas, or strait of the white sea. The mouth of the channel is defended by two new castles, which Mahomet IV. built in 1659, to secure his fleet against the insults of the Venetians, who used to attack it in sight of the old castles. The waters, that pass through this strait from out of the Propontis, flow with great rapidity; when the north-wind blows no ship can enter, but when 'tis south, the current is scarce perceptible. Tournefort (71) tells us that the mouth of the Hellepont is four miles and a half over, but Le Brun (72) says that it is only a mile and a quarter. Spon (73) informs us, that where the old castles stand the Hellepont is near two miles broad, and that the very name of Abydos or Avido is unknown to the inhabitants of the place. But Le Brun assures us (74) that the strait at the old castles is only half a mile over, and that one of them is still called Sestos, and the other Abydos or Avido; he adds that this sea, where broadest, is but a mile and a quarter over, and half a mile where narrowest: Among the antients Strabo (75) allows it about a mile in the narrowest place; Pliny (76) and Herodotus (77), seven furlongs or stadia, and Polybius only two (78). Of Abydos was Leander, who used to swim from thence to Sestos to visit his mistress.

One night that the sea was very rough, and he near being drowned, Marialis makes him address the waves thus; Parcite dum propero, mergite dum redeo. He is represented on the medals of Caracalla and Alexander Severus, as conducted by a Cupid flying before him with a torch. The inhabitants of this city made a vigorous resistance against Philip of Macedon, and when they were not able to hold out any longer, chose rather to destroy themselves than submit to the conqueror. Abydos was taken by the Turks through the treachery of the governor's daughter in the year 1530. It will not be amiss to observe here, that what Herodotus (79) relates of Xerxes, viz. that he ordered three hundred lasses to be given to the sea, and a pair of fetters to be thrown into it, for having broke down the first bridge he built here, is looked upon by some as quite fabulous. Gilles (80) thinks that this piece of folly was first laid to his charge by the Greek poets, and that Herodotus took the thing too seriously; the 300 lasses, says this writer, intimate 300 anchors, that were thrown into the sea to fix the ships that formed the bridge; and by the pair of fetters is meant the two iron chains that fastened them together at both ends, and on each side.

(C) Pliny (81) places not far from hence the tomb of Protefilans with trees set round it of a very extraordinary nature; for when they are grown up to such a height as to be discovered from Troy, they begin to wither, and soon after die; then they shoot up again, and thrive till they are grown up to their former height, when they begin anew to decay and wither; and this vicissitude of shooting up, and dying away has continued, says our author, ever since they were first planted; that is, since the death of Protefilans, who in the Trojan expedition was the first among the Greeks that set foot in Asia, and the first that was slain.

that the new Ilium or Troy was 30 furlongs nearer the shore than the old city. This a new city was reduced to a village in the time of Alexander the Great, remarkable for nothing but a temple of Minerva, which that prince visited after defeating Darius on the banks of the Granicus, and enriched with offerings, bestowing ample privileges on the place, and honouring it with the title of city. He likewise ordered the buildings to be repaired, and the whole city to be embellished, which was performed by Lyfimachus, one of his generals, who surrounded it with a wall of 40 furlongs in circumference. This new city was almost reduced to the condition of the former, and was more like a village than a city, when the Romans first entered Asia. As they pretended to be the genuine offspring of the antient Trojans, no cost nor pains was spared to restore it to its antient lustre, especially in the time of the Cæsars. b Cæsar Augustus sent thither a colony, embellished the city with many stately buildings, and enriched it with most ample privileges and exemptions. And of this Ilium are, without all doubt, the ruins which are to be seen at present. Bellonius tells us, that in his time the walls were yet standing with the ruinous monuments of their turrets, and that he spent four hours in compassing them partly on horse-back, and partly on foot. He observed round the walls a great many marble tombs of most exquisite workmanship, with their covers entire. Two of these were still remaining when Mr. Spon^a visited those places, who informs us that they were in the stile of the antient Romans, and not unlike those that are to be seen at Arles; whence he concludes them to be the remains of that Troy which was rebuilt by the Romans. c Bellonius likewise observed the ruins of three great towers, one on the top of a hill not far from the shore, another about the middle, and the third at the bottom, with a great many large cisterns to receive the rain-water. As to the so much celebrated rivers Xanthus and Simois, he calls them small brooks, and adds that in summertime they are quite dry. But Sandys^a thinks they are not so contemptible as Bellonius makes them, who perhaps mistook others for them. Spon^a observed on the south of the haven three columns lying among the briars, of which two were entire, and each of one single piece, being thirty foot long; the third which was broken in three places, was thirty-five feet in length, and four feet nine inches in diameter; they were all three of granate. Le Brun^a speaks of great remains of a most noble d structure which he visited at the distance of about five miles from the coast. The four gates of this great edifice, at that time intire, were about forty-five feet in height, and near them stood a wall of an extraordinary thickness with fourteen gates of a competent size; the vestiges of this magnificent structure took up a hundred and thirty feet in length, and a hundred in breadth. Our author thinks that these ruins may vie with any monuments of antiquity he ever saw. The harbour of Troy, so much spoke of by the antients, is now quite choaked up with sand; however there are still to be seen fragments of columns, to which they fastened their ships and galleys, and as these were placed round it, Spon thinks that the port was about a mile and a half in circumference. As to antient Ilium we shall have occasion to e speak of it more at length in the reign of king Priam, when it was taken and laid in ashes by the Greeks after a ten years siege.

Troas Alexandria was situated between the promontories of Lectum and Sigeum, and is named by Stephanus in the second place among the eighteen cities, which were so called from Alexander. It is sometimes named Alexandria without the appellation of Troas, and sometimes Troas without that of Alexandria or Alexandrea, which has made some think that Alexandria and Troas were two different cities. Its first name was Antigonía from its founder Antigonus, which was afterwards changed by Lyfimachus into that of Alexandria in honour of Alexander^a. This is supposed to be the place meant by the apostle Acts xx. 6. it being at that time f the metropolis of the province; it lies now in ruins, and is called by the Turks Eski-Stamboul. These are the chief cities on the coast, the others are but of small account, and therefore we shall dwell no longer on this subject.

OF the rivers that watered Troas or Phrygia Minor we shall only mention the Scamander and Simois, rivers, as Mela writes 'greater by fame than by nature. The Scamander rises from mount Ida, and having received within its banks, not far from Troy, the Simois, discharges itself into the Ægean sea, over-against the island of Tenedos.

- a It is said by Herodotus to have been drunk up by the army of Xerxes. *Pliny calls it a navigable river, and distinguishes it from the Xanthus, though it is certain that these are but two different appellations of one and the same rivers. Its original name was Scamander; but it was afterwards called also Xanthus, because it was believed to communicate a yellowish tincture to the sheep that drank its waters†. Homer tells us‡ that it was named Scamander by the gods, and Xanthus by men, where according to his custom he ascribes the most ancient appellation to the gods, and the more modern to men. This river was honoured by Hesiod with the title of divine Scamander. It was a custom among the Phrygian brides to bath themselves before marriage in this river, using on that occasion the following words, Receive, O Scamander, my virginity. Which opportunity one Cimon, an Arbenian, taking hold of, under the disguise of a river-god deflowered Callirhoe, a noble virgin, at that time betrothed, and thereby occasioned the abrogating of that superstitious ceremony.

THE Simois springs likewise out of mount Ida, falls into the Scamander near Ilium, and discharges itself into the Ægean sea, as we said already. Whatever these rivers were in antient times, they are at present but small brooks, if the accounts of our modern travellers are to be depended upon.

- Ida* is the only mountain of this country that deserves notice. It is rather a ridge of hills, than a single one; for it extends from the city of Zeleea, near the borders of Mysia Minor, to the promontory Lellum. We are told by the poets, that Paris c on this hill being chosen judge by the three contending goddesses, decided the controversy in favour of Venus, which, say they, occasioned the destruction of Troy.

THE soil of this country was antiently reckoned among the most fertile that Soil and climate. 1 were then known. It was productive of whatever was requisite for the pleasures of life, and yielded to no spot that lay under the same happy parallel; nor at this day are there wanting signs and sufficient indications thereof, though it is now in part uncultivated and neglected. Our modern travellers describe the Asiatic coast of the Hellepont as a most beautiful and fertile tract of land, the hills being covered with vineyards, and olive-plantations, and the vales productive of all sorts of grain.

- d OVER-AGAINST Troy lay Tenedos about two leagues from the shore, and formed Tenedos; the Trojan harbour. As all the splendor and magnificence of this island stood and fell with Troy, it will not be improper to insert here a succinct account of it. All antient writers agree that this island was first called Leucophrys, and afterwards Tenedos from one Tenes or Tennes, who brought a colony thither from the continent. Tennes who was son to Cycnus king of Colone in Æroas, and is described by Diodorus Siculus * as a man of great probity and justice, having been greatly beloved by his subjects during his life, and adored by them after his death. The antient inhabitants of Tenedos gave the following account of him, which Diodorus Siculus looks upon as fabulous, but Suidas and Pausanias seem to credit. Tennes, say they, was e son of Cycnus and Proclea, sister to Caletor, who was killed by Ajax in attempting to burn the ships of Protesilaus. Cycnus, after the death of his wife Proclea, married Philonome, who falling in love with her step-son Tennes, and finding that she could by no means make him comply with her incestuous desires, complained of him to her husband, as if he had offered violence to her. Stephanus adds that the evidence she produced in proof of her charge was a player on the flute. Cycnus giving more credit to his wife than his son, caused him to be shut up in a chest and thrown into the sea, which carried the chest safe to the island we are speaking of, where Tennes was received as sent by the gods, and with loud acclamations proclaimed king. Some writers tell us, that his sister by name Hemithea, not caring to outlive f her brother, was at her own request with him locked up in the chest. Some time after Cycnus being convinced of his son's innocence, sailed to Tenedos to crave his pardon, and express the concern he was in for so hasty and inhuman a resolution. But Tennes instead of receiving him went to the harbour, where with a hatchet he cut the cable which fastened his father's ship to the shore. This hatchet was carried by Perichytus, a citizen of Tenedos, to Delphos, and there lodged in the temple of Apollo. The Tenedians caused two others to be made resembling this in shape and size, which they consecrated in the temple of their city. These adventures gave a birth to two famous proverbs among the antients (D).

(D) The one is Τειδιος ἀλυστήρ, that is, the Tenedian player on the flute, a saying used by the antients to reproach a false evidence. The other Τειδιος αξίαν, that is, the Tenedian Ax, an expression used to signify a quick and an unalterable resolution (82). Aristotle, cited by Stephanus, explains this in a different manner. He says, that a king of Tenedos having enacted a law forbidding adultery on pain of death, the first that transgressed this law was his own son, who was therefore beheaded with an ax. Stephanus adds, that the heads of the two lovers back to back were represented on the medals of the island, and on the reverse the ax with which they were beheaded. 'Tis certain several medals of this kind have been found in that island. Some take these two heads to be those of Tennes and his sister Hemitea, others of Jupiter, and some Amazon, who might have founded a city in Tenedos. The ax on the reverse was the instrument used by the inhabitants in the execution of their criminals. Suidas tells us, that Tennes after he was settled on the throne of Tenedos ordered an officer to stand behind the judge in all public trials with an ax in his hand, ready to strike off the head of such as should give false evidence; and hence Τειδιος ἀλυστήρ, Τειδιος ἀντίδικος, that is, A man of Tenedos, an advocate of Tenedos, were expressions used to signify a man or a judge of great severity (83). Nothing has rendered this island more famous than the siege of Troy. It was within sight of that powerful city, as Virgil observes (84): he supposes that the Greeks concealed themselves behind this island, when they feigned to raise the siege. After the fall of Troy, the inhabitants were brought so low, that they gave themselves up to their neighbours, as Pausanias observes. Tenedos was one of the first conquests of the Persians after the overthrow of the Ionians at the isle of Lada (85). It was reduced by the Athenians, or at least sided with them against the Lacedæmonians, since Nicolaus admiral of Lacedæmon ravaged this island, and raised contributions in it in spite of the vigilance of the Athenian generals. The Romans enjoyed Tenedos in their turn, and the temple of that town was plundered by Verrus, who, as Tully informs us, carried away, to the great grief of all the inhabitants, the statue of Tennes founder of the city (86). This island is about eighteen miles in circumference. It had one city, two havens, and a temple dedicated to Apollo Smyntius, of which idol we shall have occasion to speak presently. There are no ruins to be seen at Tenedos except those of the granaries, which Justinian caused to be built as a repository for the corn that was brought from Alexandria to Constantinople, lest it should mould on ship-board, the vessels being frequently wind-bound for a considerable time at the entrance of the Dardanelles. These magazines, as Procopius informs us, were two-hundred and eighty feet long, and sixty broad (87). The muscate wine of this island is the most delicious of all the Levant, and though it is not celebrated by the antients as that of Scio and Lesbos, yet it may be proved from several medals that Tenedos has in all times produced great plenty of good wine, since on the reverse of some medals of that island is to be seen the branch of a vine charged with grapes, a plain indication that it was in ancient times famed for this production.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, religion, customs, arts, learning and trade of the TROJANS.

Antiquity.

THE inhabitants of Lesser Phrygia or Trojans, so called from Troy, the metropolis of that country, were without all doubt a very antient people; but as to their original there is a great disagreement among authors. Some make them Samothracians by descent, others Greeks, and tell us that Teucer, according to them the first king of Troy, was by birth an Athenian, and lord of a village named Axonus. Some derive them from the island of Crete, from whence they suppose Phrygia Minor to have been peopled; but these are again divided among themselves as to the leader of this colony, some bestowing that honour on Teucer, others on Dardanus. Some will have them descended from the Arcadians, and there are not wanting writers who make them even come originally from Italy, which opinion, though destitute of all probability, was embraced by Virgil, as most redounding to the glory of that country, and perhaps current among the Romans in his days. Bochart thinks that Lesser Phrygia was planted by Asbkenaz Gomer's eldest son, there being the footsteps of his name in the Ascanian lake, and a river called Ascanius with a bay of the same name in Bitynia, and likewise in a city named Ascania in Lesser Phrygia, with isles on the coast named the Ascanian islands: he also observes that besides Ascanius the son of Æneas, Homer mentions a king of that name, who was at the siege of Troy. Hence he concludes, that a colony was led by Asbkenaz

a out of Greater Phrygia, where his father had settled, into Troas or Lesser Phrygia, and that by this colony and their descendants that tract of country was peopled, which from the Aegean sea extends along the coast of the Hellepont and the Propontis to the Pontus Euxinus or Axenus, as it was first called by the Greeks, which he supposes to be a corruption for the sea of Askenex. He observes that the scripture, among the nations which were to be called by the Medes under Cyrus to destroy Babylon, mentions Ararat, Minni and Askenex. And to prove that the Askenex mentioned in scripture were the people of these parts, he shews out of Xenophon^a, that Hyaspes having conquered Phrygia that lies on the Hellepont, brought from thence many of the horse and other soldiers, which Cyrus carried with him to the b siege of Babylon. But whoever was the progenitor of the first inhabitants of this country, it is certain that in process of time their blood was mixed with that of foreigners, namely of Myrians, Samothracians, Greeks, and Cretans, who settled among them, and were reckoned of the same descent with the ancient proprietors.

As to their government, it was, no doubt, monarchical and hereditary; for from Government. Dardanus to Priam we find the father constantly succeeded by the son, or the elder brother by the younger. Their country was at first, like most others, parcelled out into several petty kingdoms; for we read of Cygnus, Pandarus, Euripilus and other princes of small territories within the limits of Lesser Phrygia^a. But all these were in length of time either driven out by, or made tributary to, the Trojan kings; c infomuch that Strabo^b enumerates no fewer than nine small kingdoms or principalities subject to Troy, besides the island of Lesbos. And this is what drew out the Trojan war to such a length, for all these countries were to be subdued before Troy could be invested. Diodorus Siculus informs us^c that the Trojans were subdued by Ninus; but Philostratus tells us in express terms, that they were allies, and no ways vassals or tributaries to the Affyrians. The Trojan kings seem to have been absolute, and no ways controulable by the subject. But we shall have occasion to resume this subject when we come to their history.

We have no particular system of their laws, and shall therefore pass to their religion.

d As to the religion of the Trojans it was in substance hardly different from that of the inhabitants of Greater Phrygia, which we have already described. Their principal deities seem to have been, Cybele, or, as they stiled her, the great mother of the Gods, who, according to the common opinion, was brought into Troas from Crete by Teucer, lord of that island, and the progenitor of the Trojans^d. She was chiefly worshipped on the hills of Ida, Dindymus, Berecynthus, and Cybele, whence she borrowed her name. Apollo, who had a temple in the citadel of Troy, called Perгамus. In this temple, and by this god, Homer feigns that Aeneas was concealed, till the wounds he had received in an encounter with Diomedes, were cured by Latona and Diana, Apollo's mother and sister. Minerva or Pallas, from whose temple Virgil pathetically describes Cassandra dragged by the victorious Greeks, while the city was in flames^e. The famous Palladium was a wooden statue of this goddess, holding in one hand a buckler, and a spear in the other, so contrived as to move them, and at the same time roll her eyes in a threatening manner. We are told, that while the Trojans were erecting a temple to Pallas in their citadel, this statue fell from heaven into the temple before it was covered; whereupon an oracle being consulted returned answer, that the city of Troy could not be taken so long as it enjoyed this heavenly gift; which coming to the knowledge of the Greeks, Diomedes and Ulysses got privately into the castle, killed the guards, and by bereaving the Trojans of their main defence enabled the Greeks to take the city. All the Roman writers f assure us that this Palladium was brought into Italy by Aeneas, and lodged first at Lavinium, afterwards at Alba, and at last removed to Rome, and deposited there in the temple of Vesta, under the care of the vestals and the Nausian family. The Romans were so strongly possess'd with the false notion, that the city, which was blest with this valuable treasure, could never fall into the enemies hands, that Metellus, seeing the temple of Vesta all in flames, ventured his life without the least hesitation to rescue this sacred depositum, and was on that score thanked by the senate and people of Rome, as if he had saved the republic. The Romans universally believed themselves masters of the true Palladium, but could never shew how they came by it. For to say, that it was in Troy when the city was taken, is the same as to deny its boasted virtue of rendering that city impregnable in which it was lodged. On the other hand, if it was stolen by the Greeks before they entered Troy, how could Aeneas bring it into Italy (E)?

Venus also is counted among the Trojan deities, but as to Vesta, whom Aeneas is said by the poets to have carried into Italy with his household gods, we find not any footsteps of worship paid her at Troy. She was indeed worshipped all over Greece, where there was not one city, but could shew a temple dedicated to this goddess with a lamp always burning in honour of her, which has made some think that the rites and ceremonies of Vesta were introduced into Italy by the Greeks and not by the Trojans ^a.

Among the other Trojan deities we find mention made of Apollo Smyntbius, so stiled from the Phrygian word Smyntbos signifying a field-mouse. We are told ^b that this sort of vermin made such a devastation in the field of Troas, that the inhabitants, finding all other means of ridding the country of them unsuccessful, had recourse to the oracle of Delfos, which answered that they should be delivered from that plague, if they sacrificed to Smyntbian Apollo, which they did accordingly, and moreover erected a temple in Amaxito, a city of Troas, to their pretended deliverer, addressing him under the title of Smyntbian Apollo. Others ^c relate the matter in a different manner, and tell us, that the inhabitants of Troas worshipped mice for having on a certain occasion gnawed the bow-strings of their enemies, and thereby secured a complete victory to the Phrygians. The worship of Apollo Smyntbius was introduced into Mysia, the isle of Tenedos, and other countries; for Strabo ^d tells us that a mouse was engraved at the foot of Apollo's statue in a temple of Chrysa a city of Mysia, to unfold the reason of his being surnamed Smyntbian; he adds, that the statue was done by Scopas a celebrated statuary of Paros. The same author, in speaking of the isle of Tenedos, says that it had one town, two havens, and a temple dedicated to Smyntbian Apollo (F). As to the religious customs and ceremonies of the Trojans we are almost quite in the dark; but we may suppose them to have been much the same with those of the inhabitants of Phrygia Major.

THE character we have of the Trojans is, that they were a brave and warlike people; and in this we shall be more confirmed when we come to view their behaviour in the reign of king Priam, when they withstood for nine years with uncommon bravery the combined forces of all Greece. They seem to have entertained a fond veneration for their deities, and a great respect for their princes; for we do not

(E) There is great variety of opinions among the ancients as to the Trojan Palladium. Some tell us (88) that a king of Phrygia Major presented Ilus with a pied ox, warning him at the same time to build a city, where the ox should lie down; that Ilus followed him, and in the place, where he lay down, built a city, calling it from his own name Ilum. They add, that Ilus, having desired Jupiter to signify his approbation by some visible token, found the Palladium next morning before his tent. Others say (89) that Chrysa daughter of Pallas, marrying Dardanus, brought him the Palladium as part of her fortune; that Dardanus first erected a temple in Samothrace to this and other deities, and afterwards took them with him into Phrygia on the Hellepont. Lycophron seems to insinuate that the Palladium was a Phœnician goddess, for he calls Ulysses Διφινίσσμος κλέψας φοινίκης Θεῶς (90). Johannes Antiochenus, Eusebius, and others say that it was made by a certain mathematician, and covered over with a human skin (91). Julius Firmicus (92). Clemens (93), and Arnobius (94), tell us that the Gentiles believed it to have been made of the bones of Pelops. According to the common opinion it was stolen out of the citadel of Troy by Diomedes and Ulysses; but some tell us that the true Palladium never fell into the hands of the Greeks, it being carefully concealed, and another of the same shape and size exposed to public adoration; this, say they, was carried off by Diomedes and Ulysses; but the true Palladium remained in Troy till Aeneas removed it from thence to Lavinium. But as this is derogating from the virtue of the true Palladium, and putting it, as it were, upon the same level with a false one, since it was not able to save the city in which it was kept, others, to mend the matter, suppose that the Greeks returned the Palladium to the Trojans, or rather to Aeneas, being warned so to do by the oracles. But we shall have occasion to examine in the course of this history the truth of Aeneas's voyage to Italy, and add something relating to this famous idol. In the mean time we may observe that there was another Palladium of great fame worshipped at Athens, which Nicias had placed in the castle of that city.

(F) Tournefort (95) mentions two medals of Tenedos, the one with Apollo's head, and under it a mouse, having on the reverse a two-edged ax; the other bears two heads back to back, and on the reverse the same ax with two mice.

- a find in their history any kind of intestine broils, or plots, or conspiracies against the prince on the throne, whoever he was.

We can say nothing particular touching the customs of the Trojans, their civil Customs, lan- concerns, or their arts and learning; they are celebrated by the ancients as one of guage, &c. the most polite and civilized nations of those days, and in the reigns of their latter kings they arose to a very considerable pitch of splendor and magnificence, those great encouragers of arts and industry. Their language was in all likelihood the same that was spoken by the inhabitants of Greater Phrygia, and perhaps in all that tract, which was afterwards known by the name of Asia Proper, the several nations spoke one and the same tongue with some variation of dialect.

- b THEIR trade we can only guess at from their situation, which very likely drew Trade. merchants from all the neighbouring parts to traffic in their country as well for their own growth as for foreign productions. Their country was stocked with many useful commodities, and must have abounded in all things necessary for life, since it could support for many years together two very considerable armies, as we shall see in the following section. Their settlements in Thrace, in Peloponnesus, in *Sicily*¹, in *Italy*¹, in *Egypt*², and in *Africa*³, are a convincing proof that they applied themselves pretty early to trade and navigation, which, in all likelihood, were the sources of the riches, splendor and power, wherein they far excelled all the states round them.

SECTION VII.

The reigns of the TROJAN kings.

- c Troas or Phrygia Minor was in all likelihood governed by kings before the reigns of Teucer and Dardanus; for Servius names out of Nero's Trocia one Cyntbius king of Troas long before Teucer. But as the Trojan history of that epoch is either fabulous, or altogether uncertain, it were lost labour to make a narrow search into it. It is no less uncertain which of the two abovesaid princes reigned first, some writers giving the precedency to Teucer, others to Dardanus; and truly this is so dark and obscure a subject, that every one may say what he lists. We shall follow the most common opinion, and begin with Teucer without pretending to add any thing of our own, or entering into the merits of so perplexed a cause.

- Teucer*, the son of Scamander and Ida, that is, born in Phrygia near the river Teucer.
d Scamander and mount Ida, ruled over all Troas or Phrygian Minor. He is said to have been very fortunate and successful in all his undertakings, but what they were we find no-where specified. Having no issue-male he married his only daughter, by some called Batia, by others Asia, by others Arisba, to Dardanus, settling therewithal the crown of Phrygia on him and his descendants. Those who make Teucer a Phrygian by birth, suppose him to have come to the crown by a lineal descent, and place Cyntbius, whom we have mentioned above, among his ancestors; so that according to these writers Teucer was not the founder of the Trojan kingdom, but the last of a long series of kings prior to those of the Dardanian family sprung from Dardanus and Batia. From Teucer the country was called Teucra, and the inhabitants e Teucri (G).

Teucer

(G) This is the opinion of Diodorus Siculus, and, as we have hinted, the most common. However Virgil, who had as good means to come at the truth, as any other could have, and very likely did not depart from it in such things as no ways concerned Augustus, makes Teucer a Cretan, and delivers his opinion as follows:

*Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula ponto;
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.
Centum urbes habitant magnas, uterrima regna.
Maximus inde pater, si rite audita recorder,*

*Teucus Rhætas primum est adveſtus in oras, Optavitque locum regno; nondum Ilium, & arces
Pergamææ ſteterant, habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiæq; æra, Idæumque nemus; hinc ſida ſilentia ſacris,
Et juncti currum dominae ſubiecro leones (96).*

Teucer then, according to those who follow Virgil's opinion, which is ascribed to Berosus, was the son of one Scamander, a native of Crete, from which island Teucer retiring in the time of a great famine, put to sea with the third part of the inhabitants in quest

Teucer was succeeded by Dardanus the son of Corytus or Corythus, by Electra the daughter of Atlas. Corytus was king of Samothrace, and had by Electra two sons, Jafus and Dardanus, and one daughter by name Harmonia. Dardanus succeeded his father in the kingdom of Samothrace, where he erected a stately temple, and instituted religious rites and ceremonies in honour of Pallas and the other gods, whose statues his first wife Chryse had brought with her as part of her fortune. This together with the many excellent laws he is said to have enacted on his accession to the crown, gained him the reputation of a wise, just, and religious prince. Insomuch that Teucer, who was stricken in years, and had no issue-male, invited him over into Phrygia, gave him in marriage his only daughter Basia, and appointed him his heir and successor to the kingdom of Phrygia, which, after the death of Teucer, he ruled with the same moderation, equity, and religion, as he had done that of Samothrace. He waged war with the neighbouring princes, namely with the Paphlagonians, and, as he was always attended with success, extended the boundaries of his new kingdom by considerable acquisitions. He built two cities, the one he honoured with his own name, styling it Dardana or Dardania, and this he chose for his royal seat; the other he called Thymbra from Thymbræus one of his intimates. Having settled the civil concerns of the kingdom, and made many useful laws for the due administration of justice, which he looked upon as the basis of regal authority, he applied himself entirely to religious matters. The Palladium, or as others will have it, the Palladiums (H), were by his orders brought over into Phrygia; as for the other gods, which he had with his first wife, they were left in Samothrace till the death of his brother Jafus, who governed that island in the absence of Dardanus (I). Dardanus had quest of new seats, and arrived at that part of Phrygia, which lies on the Hellepont. Here he landed not far from the Rhætan promontory, and being the first night greatly annoyed by vast numbers of mice, he resolved to settle there in compliance with the oracle, which had directed him, before he put to sea, to fix where he should be attacked in the night-time by an enemy sprung from the earth. His first care was to raise a temple to Apollo Smyræus, who was pictured treading under foot a mouse, called in the Cretan or Phrygian language Sminthos. He gave new names to the hill and river near which he landed, calling the one Ida, from a bill of the same name in his native country, and the other Scamander, which was the name of his father. This river to that time had been called Xanthus; whence Homer says, that it was called Xanthus by the gods, and Scamander by men, meaning thereby that the former was the more ancient. He likewise introduced the worship of Cybele according to the rites that were practised in Crete, where that goddess was supposed to have brought forth and nursed Jupiter. Some think the authority of Virgil, with regard to Teucer, to be of very great weight, since it no ways concerned Augustus whether Teucer was of Crete, or not.

(H) Some writers tell us, that Dardanus had with Chryse two Palladiums, or statues of Pallas, and that they were both of equal virtue, the oracle having promised that the city, in which either of them was kept, should never be liable to any disasters. Dionysius Halicarnassensis gives us the words, which the oracle was said to have uttered, and are the following:

*Fata dabunt urbem, poteris qua condere sacra, Cæcolasque illic sessis colere atque choris.
Munera namque deæ servabis arce reposita
Palladis, hæc quoniam cepit tua regia conjux, Servatura tuam duris præcunct omnibus urbem.*

One of these, say they, was stolen out of the citadel of Troy by Diomedes and Ulysses; but the other was brought by Æneas into Italy (97). But Varro (98) tells us that the Palladium was brought to Rome by one Nautus, and adds, that the priesthood of Minerva was hereditary in his family. Others say, that Diomedes, after the destruction of Troy, being driven by a storm on the coasts of Italy, and there ordered by an oracle to return the Palladium to the Trojans, sent it to Æneas by Nautus, one of Æneas's friends and companions.

(I) In what has been said of Dardanus we have followed Homer, Manetho, Diodorus, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Eusebius, Cyrillus, Cædemon, Johannes Tzetzes, &c. but Virgil and the poets to flatter Augustus make Dardanus son of Electra not by Corytus, but by Jupiter. And as to Corvus, they will have him to have been king of Latruria, and not of Samothrace. Virgil tells us, that Dardanus passed out of Latruria into Samothrace, and from thence into Phrygia. He expresses himself thus (99):

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt;
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebas,
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.
Hæ nobis propriae sedes; hinc Dardanus ortus, Iasusque pater, genus a quo principe nostrum.*
And elsewhere (100).

*Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferro fimos; his ortus ut apris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygiæ penetravit ad arbes, Throiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coriti Tyrræna ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæci Accipit, &c.*

Virgil does not tell us on what occasion Dardanus quitted Tuscany: But Annus informs us, that after the death of Corvus, the two brothers Dardanus and Jafus falling out about the succession to the crown, the former killed the latter, whereupon he was obliged to save himself by flight from the Tuscans, and from Siculus king of Spain, and brother to Electra, who was come to compose their difference. The same Annus gives the name of Comblabascus to the father of Dardanus and Jafus, and adds, that the word Corytus was a title of dignity. Apollodorus in his fabulous history of the Greeks tells us, that

- a had two wives, the first named Chryse an Arcadian, by whom he had two sons, Idæus and Dimas, the other Batia, who likewise bore him two sons, Zacynthus and Erichthonius. Idæus and Dimas, according to *Dionysius Halicarnassæus, inherited, in right of their mother, the territories of their grandfather in Arcadia, whence they led colonies into Asia, being forced to quit their own country by frequent inundations. Zacynthus planted a colony of Phrygians in an island of the Ionian sea, which from himself he called Zacynthus†. Erichthonius succeeded his father in the kingdom of Phrygia, as we shall see anon. As to his sister Harmonia, she married Cadmus founder of the Theban kingdom, whom her brother Jafus had initiated in the mysteries of religion. We shall have occasion to speak of her, and her husband Cadmus, when
- b we come to treat of the Theban kingdom. Dardanus reigned in Phrygia 64 or 65 years, and was succeeded by his son Erichthonius, who treading in the footsteps of his father was revered by his subjects, and greatly respected by all the neighbouring princes, with whom, as he was more inclined to the arts of peace than war, he carefully maintained a good understanding. The long quiet he enjoyed gave him an opportunity of heaping up immense riches, which Homer takes notice of, without burdening the subject with taxes and impositions. By his wife Astyoche he had but one son named Tros. He reigned, according to some, forty-six, according to others seventy-five years, and dying left the kingdom of Phrygia in a most flourishing condition (K).
- c On the death of Erichthonius, Tros ascended the throne, and in the very beginning of his reign laid the foundations of a city, which became soon the most famous of all Asia. This grand work being at last finished, he invited all the neighbouring princes, except Tantalus king of Sipylus, to assist at the solemn dedication of the new city. Why Tantalus was omitted we know not; but he highly resented such a contemptuous behaviour, as he called it, and soon after had a fair opportunity of shewing his resentment. For Ganymedes, a youth of extraordinary beauty, and the darling of his father Tros, being sent by him with a splendid retinue to carry presents of great value to Jupiter Europæus, in passing through the territories of Tantalus was not only detained, but abused by that vitious and impious
- d king (L). This indignity the generous youth took so to heart, that he died soon that Jafus, as he styles him, and Dardanus were sons of Eleëtra, the daughter of Atlas and Jupiter, that the former being passionately in love with Ceres, and attempting to ravish her, was thunder-struck, and that Dardanus was so concerned for the death of his brother, that, abandoning Samothrace his native country, he retired to the opposite continent, where he was kindly received by Tenex king of Phrygia. Isaacus Testuz (9) thinks that Dardanus was forced by an inundation to leave Samothrace. As to Atlas the father of Eleëtra, some say that he was king of Mauritania, others of Samothrace, and that he gave his daughter in marriage to Corytus, who had by her Chryse first wife to Dardanus. Bottæ (10) is of opinion that Atlas was neither an African nor a Samothracian, but an Italian. The want of good authorities in this point of ancient history has given every one leave to say what he pleased.

(K) Apollodorus tells us, that Erichthonius had an elder brother, by name Ilus, who died before his father, and a sister called Idea, who married Phibonius II. king of the Thracian Thyni, whom we shall have occasion to mention in the history of Thrace. As the name of Erichthonius is entirely Greek, some have concluded from thence that the Greek tongue began very early to prevail in Phrygia; which argument would be of no small weight, could they but prove that Erichthonius was that prince's original or Phrygian name, and not a Greek translation thereof; for the Greeks, as Plato observes (11), used to translate foreign names into their own language, as the Egyptians did all Greek names into theirs. Some finding a king of Athens bearing the same name, infer from thence that the Trojans were originally Athenians. An opinion built on so slight a foundation is scarce worth refuting.

(L) The fable of Ganymede's being taken up into heaven by Jupiter is variously interpreted; but Natalis Comes (12) is of opinion that this story was invented by the Greeks to give a kind of sanction to the unnatural lust that greatly prevailed in that nation. And truly Jupiter, as Arnobius observes (13), seems to have been set up for no other purpose but that men might father their crimes upon him, and thereby extenuate in great measure their own guilt. Thus Theocritus the poet, in celebrating the incestuous marriage of Ptolemæus Philadelphus with his sister Arfinos, produces the example of Jupiter and Juno; and Seneca the tragedian had recourse to the same topick to find something commendable in the marriage of Octavia and Nero; Sortita fratris more Junonis toros, says he, speaking of Octavia (14). Others tell us, that Ganymedes was killed in a battle between Tantalus and Ilus; for Ilus pursued the war with Tantalus which his father had begun. They add, that the body of Ganymedes not being found among the dead, nor ever after appearing, the poets took occasion from thence to feign, that he had been taken up into heaven by Jupiter. Suidas charges Minos with the rape of Ganymede, and says, that Minos being kindly received and entertained by Tros, on that occasion fell in love with Ganymede, and required the favours he had received after of pure grief. Neither did his father Tros long outlive him; for the war a which he made upon Tantalus to revenge the affront offered to his son, proving unsuccessful, the affliction, which arose from thence, joined to the concern he was in for the loss of his favourite son, put an end to his days in the 60th, or, according to others, in the 49th year of his reign. He had by his wife Acalide, or, as Apollodorus calls her, Callirrhoe, three sons, Ilus, Ganymedes, and Affaracus, and one daughter by name Cleomestra, or, as Apollodorus will have it, Cleopatra. Hyginus, by mistake, makes Ganymedes son to Erichibonius. From this king Phrygia Minor borrowed the name of Troas, as its metropolis did that of Troy.

As the chief commanders of the Trojan troops, whose names are of great renown in ancient history, and from whom most of our European nations have once pretended to derive their pedigree, were descended from Tros, before we proceed in the history of the Trojan kings, we shall give a succinct account of his numerous progeny. Tros, as we have already observed, had by his wife Acalide, or as others call her, Callirrhoe, three sons, Ilus, Ganymedes, and Affaracus, and one daughter by name Cleomestra. Of Ilus, who succeeded his father in the kingdom of Phrygia, and his posterity, we shall speak in the series of the kings. Ganymedes died without issue. Affaracus had by his wife Hieromname, or, according to others, Clytadora, one son named Capys, of whom we know nothing else but that the city of Cophya in Arcadia, according to Stephanus, borrowed its name of him, and that he married one Themis, by whom he had Anchises, who was famous for the comeliness of his person, which gave rise to the fable of his amours with Venus. He had the misfortune to see the city of Troy twice taken and plundered. During the first siege, which happened in the reign of Laomedon, he is said to have behaved with great gallantry; but in the time of the second, he was no more fit to bear arms, being wore out with old age and infirmities, occasioned by the lewdness and dissoluteness of his youth, to which his blindness is also ascribed. He is supposed to have been saved out of the flames of the burning city on the shoulders of his son Aeneas, and to have accompanied him to Sicily, where he died. He had two sons, Aeneas, whom we shall have occasion to mention hereafter, and Elymus, and one daughter named Hippodamia. Elymus, according to Suidas, imparted his name to the Elymæi, a people of Sicily. Apollodorus calls him Lycus. Hippodamia married Alcatbous, who fell in a battle by the hand of Idomeneus.

Cleomestra had but one son by name Lyerfus, father to Antenor. As to Lyerfus ancient history is quite silent; but Antenor is greatly commended for his prudence and wisdom. He was sent by king Priam ambassador into Greece to demand his sister Hesione, whom Hercules after taking Troy had carried captive into Greece, and bestowed on Telamon as a reward for being the first that mounted the wall of that city. The Greeks treated him more like a spy than an ambassador; whereupon returning to Asia, he inflamed Priam and his sons against that nation. However some time after he not only entertained in his house the Greek ambassadors that were sent to demand Helena, but protected them against the treacherous attempts of Priam's sons, and found means to convey them safe out of Troy. This having gained him the good will of the Greeks, he was sent into Greece on a second embassy, on which occasion he is commonly believed to have betrayed the trust reposed in him, and some years after the city itself, seeing that Priam would hearken to no conditions of peace, to which Antenor shewed himself mightily inclined after his last embassy. It is agreed on all hands, that the Greeks entering Troy sword in hand, shewed in the height of their revenge a tender and friendly regard to Antenor, having even caused the skin of a panther to be hung up before the door, lest, through mistake, any violence should be offered to his house or person by the greedy and incensed soldiery. Some add, that having known Ulysses, who had entered the city in disguise to observe the strength of the Trojans, he neither apprehended nor discovered him. Many however clear him from all treachery, and put a more favourable construction on the of the father by abusing, and forcibly conveying away the son, who was the only delight of his old age. Cicero (15) seems to make Ganymede the son of Laomedon, which is a mistake. Orosius (16) and Eusebius (17) inform us, that the war which Tros made upon Tantalus was described by one Patrocles a poet of no mean character; but his works have not reached us.

- a kindness shewn him by the Greeks, saying that they spared him merely in compliance with the laws of hospitality, which in those days were deemed sacred even by the most savage nations. Of this opinion is *Livy, and Virgil also seems to free him from all suspicion of treachery, saying that he escaped falling into the hands of the Greeks†. But be that as it will, the Trojans, that remained in the country after the destruction of Troy, were so prejudiced against him, that they obliged him to withdraw from Troas. At the same time the Heneti being driven out of Papblagonia, and forced to seek for new settlements, chose him for their leader in room of their king Pyramenes, who had been killed in the siege of Troy. With these, and a few Trojans he put to sea, and steering his course up the Adriatic gulph, landed in the country of the Euganei lying between the sea and the Alps. Here he resolved to settle, and having driven out the antient proprietors, and blended the mixed multitude of Heneti and Trojans under the common name of Veneti, he gave rise to a new nation. He built a small town in the place where he landed, and called it Troy. He is supposed to have built the city of Padua. Antenor had by his wife Tbeano sister to Hecuba, and daughter to Cisseus king of Thrace, Ipbadamas, Coon, Helicaon, Laodocus, Acamas, Archilochus, Polybus, Agenor, Laodamas, Demoleon, Glaucus, and Crino. Ipbidamus was brought up in Thrace under the care of his grand-father, and came to succour Priam and his country with twelve ships, which he left at Percope, marching by land to Troy, where he was slain by Agamemnon, whom he had engaged, and would very likely have conquered had he not been less fortunate than brave†. Coon, attempting to revenge the death of his brother, singled out and dangerously wounded the same Agamemnon, but at last fell likewise by his hand. Helicaon married Laodice daughter to king Priam. Archilochus and Acamas commanded, in conjunction with Aeneas, the troops of Dardania. Agentor was a warrior of great prowess, attended Hector in his boldest undertakings, and was not afraid to encounter Achilles himself‡. The others are named by Homer, Pausanias, Calaber, &c. but performed nothing worth relating. Pindar § tells us, that the sons of Antenor, after the destruction of Troy, joined Menelaus and Helena, and with them settled in Libya. But Eusebius says that they reigned in Phrygia till the return of Hector's sons by whom they were driven from the throne and the country. Perhaps some of them remained in Phrygia, and some accompanied Menelaus and Helena; among the latter were, according to Symmachus¶, Glaucus, Acamas, and Hippolochus or Archilochus. As to Tbeano Antenor's wife, Suidas and Cedrenus inform us, that she was the chief priestess of Pallas, and that she betrayed the Palladium to Diomedes and Ulysses, who were sent into Troy under the pretence of an embassy to king Priam. Let us now return to the succession of the Trojan kings.

- Tros* was succeeded by his son Ilus, who pursuing with great vigour the war, which his father had begun, after many signal victories drove Tantalus out of Asia and possessed himself of his kingdom, which he annexed to the crown of Phrygia. Ilus.

Before Christ,
- e Pelops, the son of Tantalus, after several unsuccessful attempts, was at last entirely routed, and forced to quit Asia and follow his father into Greece. Bysnus king of the Bebryces, who had espoused the quarrel of Tantalus and his son Pelops, was likewise defeated, and, some say, killed in the engagement. Ilus having thus revenged the affront offered to his brother, applied himself entirely to civil affairs, and is said to have made a great many useful laws for the regulation of publick affairs. He enlarged, and adorned with many stately buildings the city of Ilium or Troy. Plutarch informs us, that in his time the temple of Pallas being set on fire by lightning, he saved the Palladium out of the flames; but on that occasion lost his sight, which however he afterwards recovered. Herodianus informs us that he called the place, where he defeated Tantalus, Pessinus, which name was afterwards given to a city built on that spot. He died in the 40th year of his reign. He had by his wife Leucippe two sons Tithonus and Laomedon. Tithonus, whom some believe to have been the son, and not the brother of Laomedon, was from his early years greatly addicted to hunting; by which manly exercise having acquired a strong and robust constitution, and inured himself to hardships, he betook himself to a military life, and went to serve among the Assyrians, who in those days were a very warlike people, and thought to excel all other nations in the military art. courage and conduct soon raised him to the first posts in the army, in which he acquitted himself so well, that he was ranked among the Titanes or chief lords of the Assyrian monarchy, and made governor of Persia. Hearing that Phrygia was invaded by the Greeks, he obtained leave of Teutamus king of Assyria, who had a great value for him, to send his son Memnon at the head of a considerable body of chosen troops to assist his countrymen. But this expedition proved fatal both to the father and the son; for Memnon being slain by the Thessalians, Titbonus, already worn out with old age, was so grieved for his death, that he did not long outlive him. The comeliness of his person, his rising early in the morning, as he was a great sportsman, the old age he lived to, and his pining away at last with grief, may have given rise to the many fables which the poets relate of him; but for these and their explanation we must refer the reader to Athenæus^a, Tzetzes^b, Natalis Comes^c, and other mythologists.

Titbonus had by his wife Cissia, or, as Diodorus calls her, Ida, two sons, Memnon and Ematton, and one daughter named Hemera. Memnon, being brought up under the discipline of his father, proved a brave, wise and experienced commander. He served with great success in Egypt against the Ethiopians, who were become very troublesome neighbours to the Egyptians; for he routed and dispersed their armies, laid waste their country, and obliged them to pay an annual tribute to the Egyptians, who out of gratitude transferred it to Memnon, appointing him king over the country, which he had subdued. In Ethiopia he built a city bearing his own name, and some make him likewise the founder of Abydos. Having thus distinguished himself in Egypt and Ethiopia he returned to his father in Assyria, where he was set over part of Persia in quality of satrapa or chief governor, and is said to have built in his satrapy the city of Susa, and another to which he imparted his own name. To gratify his father he marched at the head of 20000 Ethiopians, and the like number of Persians, to the assistance of king Priam. On this occasion he behaved with his usual bravery, and often put the Greeks to flight; but at last falling into an ambuscade was killed by Achilles at the head of the Thessalians. His body was rescued out of the enemy's hands, his obsequies performed with great solemnity, and his ashes sent back to his father. Josephus places his tomb near Ptolemais in Phœnice, but Pliny and Ælian say that he was buried at Susa (M). Every body has heard of the vocal statue of Memnon near Thebes in Egypt. This, according to Pausanias^d, Eusebius^e, and Lucan^f, was broke in pieces by order of Cambyfes, but ever after, that part which remained on the pedestal, at the rising of the sun, yielded a sound like that of the string of a lyre or lute when it breaks on the instrument by being drawn too tight. Eusebius seems to have credited this story; for he says that this miraculous effect ceased at the birth of Christ. Pausanias^g, informs us, that Memnon's sword was kept at Nicomedia, and produces it as an argument to prove that the arms used by the antients were of brass. Anticles, quoted by Pliny, says that Memnon invented letters fifteen years before the reign of Phoroneus first king of Argos. Heliodorus^h makes him the progenitor of the kings of Ethiopia.

Ematton, the other son of Titbonus, remained at home with his uncle Laomedon, and was killed in the war that broke out between him and Hercules. Probus the grammarian is of opinion that Macedonia was from him named Ematbia, and Justin mentions an antient king of Macedonia bearing his nameⁱ. Romus, descended from one of the sons of Titbonus, was reckoned by some, as Plutarch informs us, among the founders of Rome^k. As to Hemera, we know nothing of her but what is related by the spurious Dionys now extant, whose history deserves no manner of credit.

(M) Pausanias (18) tells us that a cenotaphium or empty tomb was raised to him in the country of Troas, not far from the river Æsopus, which tomb, as the inhabitants informed him, was yearly visited by strange birds known to them under the name of Memnonian birds. These on stated days flocking to the tomb, cleared the ground, on which it stood, of all rubbish, and afterwards dipping their wings in the Æsopus, sprinkled it with the water of that river.

- a ON the death of Ilus Laomedon was placed on the throne, his elder brother Tithonus being at the same time employed in foreign wars. He built the citadel of Troy, being assisted therein by Apollo and Neptune, that is, he carried on the work with the treasures that were consecrated to them, and lodged in their temples. Several inundations are said to have happened in his reign, and a plague to have broke out, which carried off great numbers of the inhabitants. These are looked upon as punishments inflicted by the gods whose temples he had plundered. He treated Jason, and the other Argonauts, who had landed on the coasts of Troas, in a very inhospitable manner, refusing to supply them with necessaries, and even threatening to treat them as enemies, if they did not forthwith return on board their ships, and quit the country. To revenge this affront, Hercules, who was one of the Argonauts, returned some time after with twelve galleys to Troy, which he besieged, took and plundered. In this war Laomedon killed Oileus, a commander of great renown, but was himself not long after killed by Hercules, whom he had engaged with more courage than caution (N). Laomedon had five sons, Tithonus, Lampon, Clytus, Iccaton, and Priam; his daughters were Hesione, Cilla, Astyoche, Antigone, Proelia, and Eubria. All his sons, except Priam, were killed in the war with Hercules. As to the daughters, Hesione, as we have said, being taken by Hercules, was bestowed in marriage on Telamon, who treated her more like his concubine than wife; which Priam, who had succeeded his father, no sooner understood, but he sent Antenor into Greece to expostulate with Telamon, and to demand his sister Hesione. In the council of the princes of Greece, this embassy was heard with contempt, and the ambassadors used in a manner no ways suitable to their character, which gave occasion, according to several writers, to the Trojan war. Cilla and Astyoche are only named by *Apollodorus*¹. Antigone is described as a woman of a proud, haughty, and insolent behaviour, which gave rise to the fable of her contending for beauty with Juno, and being transformed into a stork by that incensed goddess². Proelia married Cycnus, by whom she had Tenus and *Hemithea*³. Eubria being taken by the Greeks, and preferring death itself to slavery, advised the Trojan women, who were captives with her on board the Greek fleet, to set the enemies ships on fire, and thereby
- d revenge the evils which they had brought upon their common country, and prevent those that were reserved for themselves. Her advice was followed, and the Greeks being gone ashore near Pallene to take in fresh provisions, they burnt both the fleet and themselves, which obliged the Greeks to settle there⁴, having no other ships to pursue their voyage. Apollodorus mentions one Bucolion, a natural son of Laomedon's by Calybe, who was slain with his fathers and brothers by Hercules. Laomedon reigned, according to some, thirty-six, according to others, forty-four years.

- Laomedon* being slain by Hercules, as we have said above, Podarces, the only surviving son, who had been carried away captive with his sister Hesione, was with a great sum of money ransomed and placed on the throne of his ancestors, and hence came the surname of Priam, which is derived from a Greek verb signifying to redeem or ransom. His first care, after his accession to the throne, was to encompass the city of Troy with a strong wall, to prevent such calamities as had happened in his father's reign. There being discovered in the beginning of his reign a mine of gold near Alydus, he was thereby enabled to undertake and carry on many public works; for he is said to have embellished the city with stately edifices, towers, castles, aqueducts, &c. He maintained in constant pay a considerable army, reduced most of the neighbouring states, and was rather considered as sovereign of all Asia Minor, than king of Troas. He married to his first wife Arisba, or, as others call her, Alyxoshoë, by whom he had but one son named Æsacus; but by his second wife Hecuba,

(N) Others tell us (19), that Apollo and Neptune were hired by Laomedon to build the walls of Troy; and that upon his refusing to pay them their wages, Apollo sent a plague, and Neptune drowned part of the country with inundations. They add, that the oracle advised him to expose his daughter Hesione to a sea-monster, and atone for his crime by sacrificing his favourite child. She was delivered by Hercules, say they, but Laomedon refused him the reward which he had promised; whereupon Hercules besieged and took Troy, killed the king, and gave Hesione in marriage to Telamon.

daughter to Cisseus king of Thrace, he had Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, ^a Helenus, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Polydorus, and Troilus; and daughters, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many children by concubines, in all to the number of fifty. Some writers say, that being abroad when Troy was taken in the reign of his father, he was called home and placed on the throne by Hercules, notwithstanding some of his elder brothers were then alive.

The cause of
war.

THE name of this king will be ever memorable in history for the war that happened in his reign between the Greeks and Trojans, a war famous to this day for the many princes of great prowess and renown that were concerned in it, the battles that were fought, the length of the siege, the destruction of that great city, and the endless colonies that were planted in divers parts of the world by the conquered as well ^b as the conquerors. As to the cause of this fatal and destructive war, it is agreed on all hands that the rape of Helen first kindled it; but what encouraged Paris to such an attempt, and induced his father Priam to stand by him at the expence of so much blood and treasure, is not determined by antient writers. Herodotus ^a gives a very unnatural and far-fetched account of this rape. He says, that the Phanicians having ravished Io, the daughter of Inachus king of Argos, and carried her with other Greek women into Egypt, the Greeks making use of reprisals, first carried off Europa, the king of Tyre's daughter, and afterwards Medea daughter to the king of Colchus, refusing to restore either till such time as they received due reparation for the rape of Io. Paris, adds Herodotus, in the next succeeding age hearing of these adventures, was encour- ^c aged to ravish Helen, persuading himself that he should not be constrained to make any reparation, seeing others had escaped with impunity. But this whole account is quite frivolous and foreign to the purpose. For how could the Greeks ever take it in their heads to quarrel with the king of Colchus, or revenge on him an injury done to their nation by the Phanicians, whom the king of Colchus, in all likelihood, had never so much as heard of? Besides, it is plain from Thucydides, that the distinction of Greeks and Barbarians was not introduced even in Homer's time, and consequently highly improbable that the Greeks so long before, when they had not even one common name to distinguish themselves from other nations, should never- ^d theless look upon them all as their enemies by reason of an injury done by one. Others say, that king Priam hearing that his sister Hesione was ill-used by Telamon, to whom Hercules had given her in marriage, sent first Antenor, and afterwards Paris to complain thereof, and insist on her being delivered to them. This, they think, has some appearance of truth; for Telamon in history bears the character of a surly, cruel, and ill-natured prince, insomuch that his own son Teucer chose rather to roam on the seas in quest of a new habitation after the war, than return home, not daring to appear before his father, for no other reason, but because his brother Ajax had laid violent hands on himself, which it was not in Teucer's power to prevent. Paris, add these authors, coming into Greece upon this embassy, was hospitably enter- ^e tained by Menelaus king of Sparta, who being obliged by his private concerns to pass over into Crete, his base and ungrateful guest laid hold on that opportunity to entice away his wife. But neither is this account by any means satisfactory; for were it true, that Hesione was ill used by Telamon, yet no body can imagine that Priam would on that score send a solemn embassy into Greece, or think of taking his sister from her husband with whom she had lived above thirty years. Whereupon it is most natural to think that Paris, in ravishing Helen, never thought of Europa, Medea, or Hesione; but falling in love with her as she was the most beautiful woman in Greece, was prompted by his own perverse inclinations to do what in those days was commonly practised both by Greeks and Barbarians. Thus Helen ^f herself had been stolen before by Theseus, and such practices of stealing women were so common, as Thucydides ^g informs us, that none durst venture to live near the sea-coast. The same Thucydides ^h tells us, that as Helen was a woman of extraordinary beauty, her father Tyndareus after recovering her from Theseus, to prevent a second rape, obliged all her suitors, who were most of the princes of Greece, to bind themselves by a solemn oath to rescue her, in case she should be taken from her husband. This done, he gave his daughter free choice of a husband, who preferred Menelaus to all the rest. According to this account, the oath, which so many princes had taken to Tyndareus, was what drew them together, and armed them

■ against the ravisher and his abettors. To which he may add the great power of Agamemnon, brother to the injured Menelaus, who, as he was by far the most potent prince of all Greece, so he had, without all doubt, a great influence over the rest of his countrymen. But be that as it will, war against Troy was determined in a general assembly of all the princes of Greece, and this was the first enterprize the Greeks ever undertook with common consent. Before the assembly broke up, Agamemnon was appointed commander in chief of the whole army; Ægium, a city in Peloponnesus, was fixed upon for the place of the general rendezvous; and each prince, as Greece was at that time divided into endless dynasties, enjoined to send his quota of troops and ships.

- b THE best and most rational account we have of this great war is that which we gather from Homer, whose inimitable performance ought not to be regarded as a mere fiction, or the result of a poetical imagination, but as a rich fund of the most antient history of Greece. The known rules of epic poetry suppose the truth of the history, though they admit of its being embellished with poetical fictions. So that if we had no other monuments of antiquity to convince us of the Trojan war, and the taking of that city by the Greeks, yet we could not question the truth of the fact. But most of the historical events related by Homer, are attested and confirmed by the most creditable historians, and by all the monuments of antiquity, namely by the Arundelian marbles. We must therefore carefully distinguish in c Homer's works what is historical from what is merely fictitious. He describes the state of Greece at that time, and informs us that it was canted out into a great many dynasties; that Agamemnon king of Mycenæ, Sicyon, and Corinth, was the most powerful prince of all Greece, that he was appointed to command in chief; he enumerates and names the several nations and princes that sided with the Trojans; he gives us an insight into the art of war practised in that age; discloses the laws and religion of the Greeks; gives us the character of their leaders; describes the situation of their country and cities, &c. all which are purely historical; so that Homer's poems may deservedly be considered as the most antient history of the Greeks, whose earlier ages are buried in oblivion for want of such a writer to transmit their actions d to posterity (O).

- THE number of ships employed by the Greeks in this expedition, according to Euripides, Lycophron, and Virgil, amounted to 1000; Homer enumerates 1186; but Thucydides^a raises the number to 1200. The Bæotian ships, that were the largest, carried 120 men each; those of the Philistææ were the smallest, and each manned with 50; every man, the commanders excepted, was both a mariner and a soldier; so that supposing the fleet to have been of 1200 sail, as Thucydides affirms, and the ships to have carried one with another 85 men, we shall find the Greek army to have been 102,000 men strong, no great force, considering, that all the powers of Greece, except the Acaruanes alone^b, were engaged in this war. The c Greeks, as Thucydides observes, could, have raised a far more powerful army, but were afraid of being distressed for provisions in a foreign country^c. Against this army the city of Troy held out ten years; but the Trojans, as Homer makes Agamemnon say, were not the tenth part of the enemies which the Greeks had to contend with; for all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia Minor sided with the Trojans. Rhesus, king of Thrace, marched at the head of a considerable body to their assistance, and Memnon, as we have said, joined them with 20,000 Assyrians and Æthiopians. Wherefore the Greeks, foreseeing the resistance they were likely to meet with, and how dear it would cost them to carry their point by dint of arms, before they began any hostilities, sent Menelaus and Ulysses ambassadors to f Troy to demand Helen, and the treasures which Paris had carried off with her, hoping that the fame of the vast preparations which they had made might frighten the Trojans into a compliance with so equitable a demand. What answer was returned

(O) Dion Chrysostome (19), in an oration addressed to the Trojans, attempts to prove the siege and reduction of Troy by the Greeks to be an errant fable without any foundation of truth. But his performance is generally looked upon only as a witty ef-

say, since the author elsewhere (20) disproves what he endeavours to prove here. And truly the siege and taking of Troy are transactions so well attested, and have left such a remarkable epocha in history, that no man of sense can call them in question.

to the ambassadors we know not; but 'tis certain that they returned without a Helena, and highly dissatisfied with their reception at Troy.

Herodotus upon a tradition that prevailed among the priests of Egypt, seems inclinable to believe that Helen was taken from Paris before he could reach Troy. The tradition, as Herodotus, who learnt it of the priests themselves, informs us, amounts to this: Paris on his return with Helen was by stress of weather driven on the coast of Egypt, and forced to put in at Tarichia on the Canopean mouth of the Nile. Here some slaves of Paris's retinue taking sanctuary in a temple of Hercules, which stood on the shore, informed against their master, aggravating before the governor of the province, by name Thonis, the injury which he had done to Menelaus. Thonis laid the whole matter before Proteus, at that time king of Egypt, who finding, upon b examination, the deposition of the slaves to be true, detained Helen, and the treasures that had been taken with her, in order to restore them to Menelaus; but commanded Paris, after having severely reprimanded him for his crime, to depart the kingdom within the term of three days on pain of being treated as an enemy. The Egyptian priests add, that when the Greeks sent ambassadors to demand Helen and her riches, the Trojans protested that they were not in their power, but in the hands of Proteus king of Egypt, which the Greeks looking upon as a mere shift to put them off, began the war; but at last after taking the town, as Helena nowhere appeared, and the Trojans persisted in their former protestations, the Greeks began to believe them, and sent Menelaus into Egypt, where he was kindly entertained by c Proteus, and had his wife restored to him without any injury done to her person or goods. These things the Egyptian priests assured Herodotus that they knew for certain, as they had happened in Egypt, and had been handed down to them from those, who had conversed with Menelaus himself. Herodotus produces one argument of no small weight to prove the truth of this tradition, viz. that if it had been in king Priam's power to restore Helen, he would certainly have done it rather than suffer the unspeakable calamities that befel his family, his kingdom and himself during the course of the war. How great soever his tenderness to Paris might have been, yet it could not be proof against so many misfortunes. Homer seems not to have been ignorant of the tradition of the Egyptian priests, for he mentions Paris d and Helen's arrival in Egypt, and says, that Menelaus went thither before he returned home to Sparta, which voyage it is not likely he undertook at that time for pleasure. Nevertheless Homer, and with him all the Greek poets (after whom the Latins have copied) except Euripides, suppress the circumstance of Helen's not being in Troy, as too favourable to the Trojan cause. But whether the Trojans would not, or could not, restore her, the ambassadors on their return highly complained of the treatment they had met with, and with their complaints so incensed their countrymen, that they resolved without further delay to put to sea, and carry fire and sword into the enemies country (P). They steered to the coast of Troas, where on their landing they met with so warm a reception, that they began to be sensible e of the difficulty of the enterprize. In the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, who was slain by Hector, and many others of less note. However they gained ground enough to encamp on. But what most of all retarded their progress was want of provisions, which daily increased, and was owing partly to their numbers, partly to the smallness of their vessels, which, as the building of ships with decks was not then introduced, could not carry such stores of provisions as were necessary to supply the army. Wherefore they were obliged to divide their forces, sending part of them to cultivate the ground in the Thracian Chersonesus, and part to rove about the seas for the relief of the camp. All writers, whether poets or historians, agree that the Greeks employed the first eight or nine years in scowering the seas, pillaging f

(P) Calchas, a famous soothsayer, without whose advice and approbation nothing was undertaken by the Greeks during the war, declared that the goddess Diana opposed their passage with contrary winds, and that she was to be appeased with a victim of no smaller note than Iphigenia daughter to Agamemnon. The goddess, say the poets, was incensed against him for having killed by chance one of her fags; but after all pitying the innocent young virgin, she prevented so horrid a sacrifice by putting a hind in her room. Some writers are of opinion, as we have observed elsewhere (21), that the fable of the sacrifice of Iphigenia had its birth from Jephtha's sacrificing his daughter.

- a coasts, and reducing such cities and islands as sided with the Trojans. Hence in the poets we read of many towns taken, Islands plundered, strong-holds razed, and numbers of people carried into captivity by Achilles, whom the army could not well have spared, had there been any service of importance to be performed before Troy (Q).

At last the several small parties, that had been dispersed up and down the neighbouring countries and islands, being joined in one body, and great store of provisions brought into the camp, they approached the city with a design to exert their utmost efforts, and put an end to so tedious a war. But by this time the Trojans had been reinforced with considerable bodies both of mercenaries and allies. Infomuch that when the Greeks first invested the town, Hector attacked them at the head of an army scarce inferior to theirs in number. The Greeks had not been long before the city, when a plague broke out in their camp, which Homer says was sent by Apollo, because Agamemnon refused to release the daughter of one of his priests; but Heracles on this passage informs us, that it was occasioned by the violent heats, and pestilential vapours raised by the sun, the Greeks being encamped among fens and marshes. The plague was followed by a quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles; for Agamemnon being obliged by the soothsayer Calchas to return his fair captive to her father a priest of Apollo, to appease that revengeful deity, took Briseis in her room, who in the division of the booty had fallen to Achilles. This affront Achilles revenged by withdrawing his forces, and retiring with them on board his vessels. In his absence several battles were fought with great slaughter on both sides, the victory generally inclining to the Trojans. In one of these Patroclus was slain by Hector; but his death was not long unrevenged, for Achilles returning to the camp put the Trojans to flight, and revenged the death of his friend by killing Hector himself. Achilles did not long outlive him, being slain by Paris. Thus fell many of the chief leaders on both sides, but the Greeks at last carried the city; whether by force, stratagem, or treachery is uncertain. All writers agree that it was taken by night: Some say that Aeneas and Antenor, who commanded the Dardanians, seeing that Priam would hearken to no terms even after the death of Hector and Paris, concluded a separate peace with the Greeks, betraying the city into their hands. The poets tell us, that it was taken by the contrivance of a wooden horse, which fable some think to have had its birth from the Greeks entering the city by the Scean gate, over which was the picture or statue of a horse. Perhaps they entered the town through a breach made in the wall by some wooden engine, called a horse, and in the nature of that which the Romans in after-ages made use of to batter the walls, and from its shape called a Ram. Be that as it will, the Greeks having at last mastered the city, practised all the cruelties and abominations which a cruel, hungry, and enraged enemy can be guilty of. The city was laid in ashes, and such of the Inhabitants as had not time to save themselves by flight, were either put to the sword without distinction of sex or age, or carried by the conqueror into captivity. And thus ended the Kingdom of Troy, after having stood, from Teucer to Priam 296 years, according to the most exact computations. The city was taken the 24th day of the month Tbargelion, or April, 1184 years before Christ.

The Greeks, having at last put an end to the war, divided the booty, and put to sea in order to return to their respective homes, but met with many adventures, many of them being driven on far distant coasts. Menestheus king of Athens died at Melos. Teucer the son of Telamon settled in Cyprus, where he built a city calling it Salamis from the chief city of his own country, which bore that name. Agapenor, who commanded the Arcadians, built in the same island the city of Paphos. Pyrrhus the son of Achilles settled in Epirus, and there built Ephyra. Ajax the son of

(Q) Ovid says, that from the first year to the tenth there was no fighting at all; and Herodotus tells us, that the Greeks did not sit down before Troy till the tenth year, contenting themselves with laying waste the enemies country, and blocking up the city. Homer (21) introduces king Priam sitting on a high tower, and there learning of Helen the names of the Greek commanders who appeared in the field on the tenth year; for which fiction, allowing it to be such, there would have been no room, had the Greeks been encamped under the walls of Troy for ten years together. The only thing wherein authors differ as to this particular is, that some, with Thucydides (22), say, that the whole army was employed in subduing the Trojan allies; while others, with Herodotus, tell us, that a considerable body of troops was encamped the whole time before Troy.

Oileus was lost. Some of the Locrians were driven on the coasts of Afric, others ^a to Italy, whereof all the east part was called Magna Græcia by reason of the many towns built there by the Greeks. Many, who got safe home, were obliged to put to sea again, as Thucydides informs us ^b, in quest of new seats, others having seized their territories, and usurped the sovereignty, during their absence. Agamemnon and his brother Menelaus fell out when they were upon the point of weighing anchor to return home, and their quarrel divided the whole fleet, some sailing with Menelaus to the island of Tenedos, and others remaining with Agamemnon on the coasts of Troas. Those, who followed Menelaus, not agreeing among themselves parted, each holding his own course homewards. Agamemnon arrived safe at Mycenæ, where he was soon after his arrival murdered by his wife Clytemnestra; but his son Orestes ^c revenged his death by the murder of Clytemnestra, of Ægisthus her gallant, and of Helen their daughter; for which murders he was tried and acquitted by the Areopagus. The adventures of Ulysses are related by Homer in a fabulous manner; but what may have some foundation in history, is, that some years passed before he got home. The adventures of the other Greeks are less known; but upon the whole it appears, that this war proved no less fatal to the conquerors than to the conquered.

As for the Trojans, those who escaped the general slaughter, seeing their country utterly ruined, took their measures accordingly, and settled in distant regions. Antenor, as we have said already, established himself in Italy, and founded the nation of the Heneti. Helenus, one of Priam's sons settled in Macedonia, where he ^c built the city of Ilium. Some say that during the siege he went over to the Greeks, and shewed them in what manner they might easily master the city.

As to Æneas, all the Roman writers assure us, that he settled in Italy, and there founded the kingdom of Alba. From him the Cæsars affected to derive their pedigree, as the other Romans did theirs from the Trojans who accompanied him. Livy alone seems to betray some sort of doubt as to this particular, insinuating, with a great deal of reserve, that he has not sufficient grounds either to admit or reject the common opinion. But notwithstanding the unanimous consent of the Latins, there are not wanting arguments of great weight, which the learned Bochart ^d has carefully collected to evince the arrival of Æneas in Italy to be a mere fable (R).

The

(R) In the first place this opinion is directly opposite to that of Homer (23), who supposes Æneas to have remained in Phrygia; for he introduces Neptune, whom he represents favourable to Æneas on all occasions, and averse from Priam and his whole race, assuring him that he and his posterity should reign over the Trojans, which the poet would never have done, had he not known that Æneas and his posterity had reigned, or were actually reigning in his time. It is the custom of poets to introduce their deities or prophets telling before-hand that such things will happen as the poet knows to have already happened; but no poet ever made them utter such things as he knew neither did nor could happen, which would be Homer's case if Æneas had not reigned in Phrygia. To this argument some answer, that Æneas, after settling a colony in Italy, returned to Phrygia and reigned over the few Phrygians that outlived the destruction of their country. As this answer has no manner of foundation in history, it is scarce worth refuting. Dionysius Halicarnassensis (24) is of opinion that Neptune, or rather Homer, meant only that Æneas was to reign over such Phrygians as accompanied him, or over a Phrygian colony. But this is no more than what happened to Antenor, Acestes, Capys, Helenus, and others; whereas the poet's intent is to make Neptune distinguish Æneas from the other Phrygians by some particular marks of his favour. Besides, the words of Venus in the hymn, which is generally ascribed to Homer in Ἰλιάδου ἀνάκτω are capable of no other sense, but that Æneas shall reign in the country of the Trojans; and in this sense they are understood by Strabo (25), who tells us in express terms, that Æneas remained in the country of the Trojans; that the family of Priam being extinct, the crown fell to him, and was by him transmitted to his posterity. Eustathius thinks (26) that when Homer introduces Neptune promising to Æneas that he and his posterity should reign over the Trojans, the poet by the Trojans meant the Romans; and because it might be objected, that Homer could have no knowledge of the Romans, being dead long before the foundation of Rome, he adds that Homer had either seen the oracles of the Sibyls, which derive the Roman princes from Æneas, or had himself foreseen, as most poets are endowed with the gift of prophecy, that the Romans were to descend from Æneas, and be masters of the world. But as to the books of the Sibyls, Homer certainly never did nor could see them; for they were forged, as several writers have demonstrated, above a thousand years after Homer's time; and as to the spirit of prophecy, which Eustathius is pleased to bestow upon poets, every one sees that it has not the least appearance of Truth. To the authority of Homer we may add that of Agathocles Cyzicensis, quoted by Festus (27), who cites many authors affirming Æneas to have been buried in the city of Beretychia by the river Nolus (or as others read, Gallus) not far from Troy. Stephanus informs us that the city of Ascania in Phrygia was built by Ascanius the son of Æneas, wherein he agrees with Nicolaus Damascenus. Mela tells us that the city of Antandrus was so called, because Ascanius, who reigned there, being taken by the Pelusi, yielding this city

- ^a THE city of Troy being utterly ruined, and most of the inhabitants of Troas put to the sword, some writers tell us that the neighbouring Phrygians and Lydians, possessing themselves of that country, settled there, and that Troas from that time began to be called Phrygia; others are of opinion that Aeneas, having gathered together the scattered remains of the Trojans, rebuilt the city, and that his descendants and the descendants of Hector reigned there till the country was subdued by the Lydians, who became so powerful as to over-run all Asia Minor. If the Trojans had any kings of their own after their city was destroyed by the Greeks, they must needs have made but a very indifferent figure, since they are not so much as named in history.

to them for his ransom. Hellanicus in his Troica makes Aeneas fly into Thrace, and from thence to Pallene; but as to Ascanius, he says, that he remained in Troas, and reigned there. Strabo assures us, that the city of Scepsis, in former times situate near Troy, was removed from thence sixty furlongs by Scamander the son of Hector, and Ascanius the son of Aeneas; and adds, that these two families reigned for many years in that city; and that the monarchical form of government being first changed into an oligarchy, and afterwards into a democracy, nevertheless such as were descended from these two families were still honoured with the title of kings. To these authorities Bechart (28) adds two arguments of no small weight, namely that the chief deities of the ancient Trojans, viz. Venus, Apollo, Cybele, &c. were for a long time quite unknown to the Romans, and that there is not the least similitude imaginable between the ancient Phrygian and Roman language, which he proves by producing the few Phrygian words that have been transmitted to us. This however is no exception to Virgil's divine and inimitable Aeneid; for he advances nothing but what was vouched by all the historians, orators, antiquaries, critics and poets, who had flourished before him. Neither is it the duty of a poet to contradict an opinion, which a whole nation holds for indubitable.

The History of the MYSIANS.

S E C T. I.

The description of the country, the manners, customs, religion, &c. of the Inhabitants.

- ^a THE small country before us is thought to have borrowed its name from the Lydian word Myfos signifying a beech-tree, because that tree remarkably abounded here. It was divided into the Greater and Lesser Mysia. Mysia Minor or the Lesser Mysia lay on the Propontis, and from thence extended to mount Olympus, being bounded by Bitynia and the Propontis on the north and west, by Phrygia Minor on the south, and by Phrygia Major on the east. Mysia Major or the Greater Mysia was bounded on the north by Phrygia Minor, on the south by Aolia, on the east by Phrygia Major, and on the west by the Aegean sea. What Strabo, whom we have followed, calls Mysia Minor, Ptolemy calls Mysia Major; the former is also named Olympena from mount Olympus, and Hellepontica, because some towns anciently belonging to it were seated on the Hellepont. That part of Mysia which lay between Ancyra of Phrygia and the river Rhındacus is called by Strabo Abrettana, and the remaining part Morena. The former denomination is often given to all Mysia.

IN that part of Mysia Minor which lay on the Propontis, were the following cities: Cyzicus or Cyzicum seated in an island of the Propontis bearing the same name, but joined to the continent with two bridges by Alexander the Great. It borrowed its name from Cyzicus king of that island, and the adjacent continent, who is said to have been killed through mistake by Jason the Argonaut. This city, when first known to the Romans, was one of the greatest and richest of all Asia, and hence was stiled by

by Florus the Rome of Asia, and celebrated by him and all the other Latin writers a for its walls, bulwarks, haven, marble towers, &c.^a Among its many magnificent buildings the chief temple is mightily cried up by the ancients; the whole structure was of polished marble, and the joinings all covered with lines of gold; the pillars were four cubits thick, and fifty high, each of one piece. The statue of Jupiter, which stood in the temple, was of ivory, and most exquisite workmanship^c. In after-ages this city made a glorious stand against Mitridates, who lost under its walls no fewer than 300,000 men, and after all could not conquer it. However the ancient inhabitants of this city and island were generally deemed a cowardly and effeminate race; insomuch that when any one behaved himself in an unmanly manner, or through fear did what was unbecoming, he was contemptuously called a Cyzican^b. Tully^a represents those of his time as a quiet and inoffensive sort of people, enemies to plots or tumults, averse from war, and of a turn to enjoy the sweets of peace, whatever they cost. The current coin of this island, called Stater, and weighing eighteen drams, was engraved with such nicety, exactness, and skill, that they were looked upon in those days as a miracle of art (S). The inhabitants pretended to a very great antiquity, and believed that their city had been given by Jupiter to Proserpine for her dowry, and on that account worshipped her as their chief deity. As for the beauty, greatness, riches, and laws of this city, we refer our reader to Appian^b. It was ruined by an earthquake, and the fallen marbles and pillars were conveyed to Constantinople to embellish that city. Under the Romans it was the metropolis of the Consular Hellespont, but is at present little better than a village, and known under the names of Chixico, Spiga, and Palormi.^c

Parium, so called, as some writers inform us, from Parus the son of Jason. Some think that Archilochus, the famous writer of Iambics, was a native of this place. In this city was a naked Cupid much celebrated by the ancients, and deemed no ways inferior to the famous Venus of Cnidos. In the neighbourhood of this city lived the Ophiogenes mentioned by Pliny^c, who are said to have had the gift of curing the bitings of serpents with their touch. Not far from hence stood a stately temple of Apollo Aëleus and Diana, which being demolished, the ruins were employed to build an altar at Parium, which was looked upon as one of the miracles of Asia.^d The ancient Parians were a colony of Milesians, and the more modern, of the Romans, who in all this province had but two colonies, namely Parium and Troas. Homer makes Parium and Adrastia one and the same city; but Strabo distinguishes them. Parium is now reduced to a village, but retains its ancient name.

Lampsacus or Lampsacum was seated at the entrance of the Propontis over-against Callipolis in the Thracian Chersonese. It was built, according to some, by the Phoenices, according to others by Priapus, who was a native of this city, and the most infamous of all the heathen deities. This city, as we are told, borrowed its name from a young woman named Lampsaces. It had a capacious and safe harbour, and a noble temple consecrated to Cybele. It was in ancient times famous for its wine, and on that consideration given by Artaxerxes to Themistocles in his exile. Alexander the Great conceived such an aversion to this city for the lewdness and vices of the inhabitants, that he resolved to lay it in ashes; which the inhabitants having timely notice of, dispatched deputies to intercede for mercy, and avert, if possible, their impending doom. They no sooner appeared before Alexander, but the incensed monarch, to redeem himself from their importunity, solemnly vowed that he would deny their request. Whereupon Anaximenes, who was at the head of that embassy, addressed the king thus: Most just and powerful monarch, the inhabitants of Lampsacus, having been so unhappy as to incur your royal displeasure, and desiring to atone for the enormous crimes that could provoke the wrath of so merciful a prince, have sent us to beg that you would utterly destroy their unfortunate city,^e

(S) This gave birth to the Greek proverb Κυζικηνὸν στήθος an expression used in commending any eminent Performance in the art of engraving; as if the Cyzician staters were the utmost effort of that art. This coin represented on one side Cybele the great mother of the gods, and a lion on the other, which has made some imagine the abovementioned proverb to be a taunt on those, who talk big, and affect to appear like lions, though they be in effect as timid and fearful as women (29).

- a a punishment richly deserved by those who could provoke your displeasure. This unexpected request, and the vow which Alexander, being bent on its destruction, had made to reject the deputies petition, was its preservation. Priapus was worshipped here in a particular manner, and his temple was a perfect sink of lewdness, a very school of the most unnatural lust. Tully^c represents the inhabitants of Lamp-sacus as a quiet and indolent sort of people, and more fit to relish the ease of peace, than suffer the toils of war. This city is still in a tolerable good condition, situated in a pleasant plain, and surrounded with vineyards, which are fenced in with pomegranate-trees, and produce excellent wine. The Greeks call it Lamp-saco; and the Turks Lepseck. These were the chief cities of Mysia Minor seated on the coast.
- b We will not take on us to mark out the bounds of the midland Mysia, which, according to Strabo, lay between the river Rhyndacus and mount Ida. Here Stephanus places the city of Apollonia on the banks of the Rhyndacus, which rises from a lake bearing the name of the city. This lake called now the lake of Abouillona, is five-and-twenty miles in compass, and eight miles wide, being interspersed with several islands and peninsula's, whereof the largest, which is three miles in circuit, is called Abouillona. As the village situate in this island bears the same name, some modern travellers^d take it to be the ancient city of Apollonia (U), which was once a city of great note, and maintained its ancient lustre to the reign of the emperor Alexis Comnenus, when it was taken and pillaged by the Turks, as his daughter
- c Anna Comnena informs us. Apollo was undoubtedly the chief deity of this city; for besides that it bore his name, he is represented on the reverse of several medals of this City^e.

THE chief rivers of Mysia Minor are the Rhyndacus and the Granicus. The Rhyndacus, called by Pliny Lycus, and by the moderns Lartacho, has its source in the lake of Apollonia or Artynia, as Pliny names it, and falls into the Propontis near Cyzicus. This river is memorable in the Roman history for the overthrow of Mithridates, who designing to surprize Lucullus, was himself surprized by that great commander, and his army cut to pieces on the banks of this river. The Granicus rises on mount Ida, and discharges itself into the Propontis between Parium and d Cyzicus. This river Alexander crossed at the head of 30000 Macedonians in face of the Persian army 600,000 strong. Travellers observe, that its banks are very high and steep on the west side; so that the forces of Darius had a considerable advantage, had they known how to use it. This river at present is called the Soufoughbirli, which is the name of a village it waters (W).

In this part of Mysia stands mount Olympus called by the ancients Olympus Mysiorum to distinguish it from several other mountains of the same name. It is one of the highest mountains in Asia, and great part of the year covered with snow.

- THE city of greatest note in Mysia Major was Pergamus seated in a spacious plain
- e on the banks of the Caicus. It was the royal seat of the Attalic kings and of Eumenes, and enriched with a library containing 200,000 choice volumes, for the transcribing of which parchment was here first invented, and thence called by the Latins Charta Pergamena. Ptolemy king of Egypt gave occasion to this useful contrivance by prohibiting the exportation of the Egyptian papyrus, in order to defeat the design of Eumenes king of Pergamus, which was to cause all the valuable books then extant to be carefully transcribed, and by that means make a collection that might vie with Ptolemy's famous library at Alexandria. In Pergamus were likewise invented those costly hangings which we call Tapestry, and the Romans
- f named Aulea, from Aula signifying a hall, because the hall of Attalus, who invented them, was the first room adorned with this furniture. Galen the famous Physician was born in this city. Here Æsculapius is said to have practised physic.

(U) Vaillant, who visited those places, describes Apollonia as seated on the top of a hill, at the foot of which runs the Rhyndacus; but this learned traveller mistook the city of Lopadi, or as the Turks call it, Ulubat, for the ancient Apollonia, not being aware that the inhabitants of Apollonia for the convenience of their commerce removed from Apollonia to Lopadi, giving the name of the city they had forsaken to this their new habitation; it being manifest from Anna Comnena that in her time Lopadi bore also the name of Apollonia.

(W) Span mistakes the Fourtissar, as it is now called, for the Granicus. The Fourtissar is a small brook rising on mount Tininus, which some, thro' mistake, think to be the Caicus of the ancients.

We must not forget that Pergamus was one of the seven churches mentioned in the a Revelations. It is now an inconsiderable place, and thinly inhabited. There are still to be seen in the neighbouring fields the ruins of the palace of the Attalic kings, of an aqueduct, and a theatre.

ON the coasts of the Greater Mysia were seated the following cities, Antandrus, Scepsis, Affus, Adramyttium, Pitane, &c.

Soil and climate.

THE soil of this country is one of the finest and richest of Asia, and as such celebrated by the ancients¹. It chiefly abounded in corn and wine, was well stocked with cattle, and had a great many large plains proper for pasturing them. It was plentifully watered with small rivers running down from mount Ida and mount Olympus. In short the Mysians, as Philostratus informs us, with respect to their country, ^b were the happiest of all the Asiatics.

Origin.

As to the origin of the Mysians, Herodotus^a informs us, that they were Lydians by descent. According to his account, Manes, the first king of Lydia was father to Cotys, and Cotys to Atys, who had three sons, Lydus, Mysus, and Cares. From Lydus the Lydians, formerly called Meones from Maon the father of Cybele, borrowed their name. Mysus and Cares planted Lydian colonies in the neighbouring countries, which from them were named Mysia and Caria. Others derive them from the Pbrygians, and tell us that Mysus was not a Lydian but a Pbrygian. Strabo derives the Asiatic Mysians from those of Europe inhabiting that tract, which lies between mount Hermus and the Danube, and is now known under the names of Bosnia, Servia, ^c and Bulgaria. There are divers other opinions touching the origin of this people, which it would be of no use to relate, as they are mostly founded on distorted and far-fetched etymologies.

Character.

As to the character of the ancient Mysians, it must be considered at different times; for they seem to have been once a warlike people. Herodotus^a and *Pliny*¹ speak of a very powerful army of Mysians and Trojans, which before the Trojan war passing over the Bosphorus into Europe, subdued all Thrace, and advancing to the Ionian sea penetrated as far as the river Peneus. But in after-ages they degenerated from the valour of their ancestors so as to be looked upon as the most contemptible and insignificant Nation on the earth; insomuch that the Greeks^k had no expres- ^d sion to signify more emphatically a person of no worth or merit, than to call him the last of the Mysians. They were prone to tears, and on that account employed by the *Greeks*¹ to attend their funerals, and lament over the deceased. Their language was in all likelihood the same as the Pbrygian and Trojan with some variation of dialect. As to their manners, customs, arts and sciences we are quite in the dark. Their trade we can only guess at from their situation and wealth; for Philostratus informs us, that in ancient times they were the most wealthy nation of all Asia.

Religion.

THEIR religion was much the same with that of the neighbouring Pbrygians, whom they did not fall short of in superstition. They worshipped the same deities, ^e and used the same religious ceremonies, which has made some believe them to be originally Pbrygians. Cybele had a stately and rich temple at Cyzicus, and Apollo Aelæus near Parium. Nemesis also is numbered among their deities, and was worshipped in a magnificent temple built by king Adrastus not far from the city of Parium, whence both the country and the goddess were named Adrastia. Priapus was worshipped by the more modern Mysians, but unknown to them even in Hesiod's time. The Mysian priests abstained from flesh, and were not allowed to marry. It was a ceremony practised among them to sacrifice a horse, and eat his entrails before they were admitted to the priesthood.

Their History.

CONCERNING their government, thus much appears, that it was monarchichal. ^f We find no mention made of their kings till the Argonautic expedition; but authors are of opinion that they had kings long before that time. Diodorus^m tells us, that they lived in subjection to Ninus, by whom they had been conquered, and to the Assyrian kings that succeeded him. After the destruction of Troy, and dispersion of the Trojans, the Mysians possessed themselves of great part of that country, which they held till they were conquered by Craesus king of Lydia.

- a THE first king of Myfia we find mentioned, is called Olympus: He is said to have Olympus. married Nipea the daughter of Jafius or Jafion brother to Dardanus king of Troy^a.

Teutbras appears next; it is uncertain whom he succeeded; he is said to have Teuthras. reigned over the Myfians, Cilicians, and Ceteans^b. He married Auge daughter to Aleus the king of Arcadia's son^c. As he had no issue male, he gave his daughter Agriope, whom he had by his first wife, in marriage to Telephus his second wife's son by Hercules^d (X). He built a city calling it Teutbrania, which name became common to the country where the new city stood, and in process of time to all Myfia^e. He had another daughter by name Tecmessa, who in the division of the booty which
b the Greeks had got in plundering Myfia, fell to Ajax the son of Telamon.

- Teutbras* was succeeded by Telephus a natural son of Hercules by Auge. Telephus Telephus. being exposed by his grand-father's order on mount Parthenius, was nursed there by a hind till he was found by the shepherds of one Corythus, who brought him up as his own child. Being desirous, when he was grown up, to find out his mother, he was directed by an oracle to steer his course towards Myfia, where he was received with incredible joy not by his mother only, but also by king Teutbras her husband, who being taken with this extraordinary youth, bestowed his daughter on him, and appointed him his heir. In the Trojan war he first sided with king Priam, and was dangerously wounded by Achilles; but was afterwards prevailed upon by the Greeks
c to stand neuter^f. Pausanias and Aristides tell us, that he planted a colony of Arcadians in the neighbourhood of Pergamus. Jornandes^g makes him king of the Goths, wherein he confounds the European with the Asiatic Myfians; for those of Europe, whom Pliny calls Mesians, are thought to be descended from the Myfians of Asia. Telephus had two sons, Eurypylus and Latinus: Eurypylus, according to some^h was killed in the Trojan war, according to others succeeded his father, or reigned over the *Cilicians*ⁱ. Latinus is said to have led a colony of Ceteans into Italy^j.

- Eurypylus* left one son by name Arius, who succeeded his father or grand-father, Arius. and was slain in a single combat by Amphialus the son of Neoptolemus, who possessed himself of the kingdom of Myfia^k. We read of no other kings of Myfia till d many ages after, when the Attalic family reigned at Pergamus, which we shall speak of in its proper place.

Caicus, and that Teutbras, who at that time reigned there, falling in love with Auge, married her, and, as he had no children of his own, adopted her son Telephus, declaring him his heir and successor to the crown.

CHAP. XV.

The History of the LYDIANS.

SECT. I.

The description of LYDIA.

WHENCE this country borrowed the name of Lydia is not determined. Name. Some led by the affinity of words derive it from Lud, Sbem's fourth son, whom they pretend to have settled here. But this opinion we shall examine, when we come to enquire into the origin of the Lydians. All the ancient writers tell us, a that Lydia was first called Meonia or Meonia from Meon king of Phrygia and Lydia, and that it was known under no other name till the reign of Atys, when it began to be called Lydia from his son Lydus. Bochart * finding in his learned collection of Phœnician words the verb Luz signifying to wind, and observing that the country we are speaking of, is watered by the Meander so famous for its windings, concludes, that it was thence named Lydia or Ludia. As to Meon and Lydus, he rids himself of them at once by denying that there ever were any such persons. To support this opinion, he endeavours to prove that the Phœnicians, and after them Moses, who in the description of countries made use of their terms, gave the name of Lud not only to Lydia on the banks of the Meander, but likewise to Elbiopia, b where the Nile, as Herodotus observes †, has as many turnings and windings as the Meander itself. Now as these two countries, lying on the two most winding rivers that were then known, were named Lud, which word signifies to bend or wind, who can doubt, says he, but they had their common denomination from the rivers which watered them? As to the ancient name of Meonia, he takes it to be a Greek translation of the Phœnician word Lud, wherein he agrees, in some measure, with Stephanus, who derives the name of Meonia from Meon the ancient name of the Meander. Some take the word Meonia to be a translation of a Hebrew word signifying metal, because that country, say they, was in former times enriched above any other with mines. c

THOUGH Lydia and Meonia are by most authors indifferently used for one and the same country, yet they are sometimes distinguished, that part, where mount Imolus stood, and which was watered by the Pactolus, being properly called Meonia, and the other, lying on the coast, Lydia. This distinction is used, as Spanhemius observes †, by Homer, Callimachus, Diomysius, and other ancient writers. In after ages, when the Ionians, who had planted a colony on the coast of the Ægean sea, began to make some figure, that part was called Ionia, and the name of Lydia given to the ancient Meonia.

Lydia, according to Pliny †, Ptolemy, and other ancient geographers, was bounded by Mysia Major on the north, by Caria on the south, by Phrygia Major on the east, and Ionia on the west, lying between the 37th and 39th degrees of north latitude. What the ancients stile the kingdom of Lydia was not confined within these narrow boundaries, chiefly under the latter kings, but extended from the river Halys to the Ægean sea. Pliny's description includes Æolia, lying between the Hermus and the Caicus, but that tract we shall consider apart. d

THE chief cities of Lydia were Sardis, the metropolis of that kingdom, and the seat of king Cræsus. This city stood on the banks of the Pactolus at the foot of mount Imolus. The Persians thought Sardis of such consequence after it fell into their hands, that Xerxes, hearing it was taken by the Greeks, commanded one of his attendants to cry aloud every day while he was at dinner, The Greeks have taken e Sardis; which was continued till he recovered the city. It was utterly ruined by an earthquake, and rebuilt by Tiberius. There are still to be seen the ruins of a large palace and two magnificent churches with a great many pillars and cornices of marble. Not far from Sardis stands a village of the same name, which some take to be that Sardis which is mentioned in the Revelation, and was one of the seven churches. Near this city was to be seen in Herodotus's time † the sepulchre of Alyattes father to Cræsus, whereof the foundation was of stone, but the whole superstructure of earth, being six furlongs, and 200 foot in circumference, and a thousand three hundred foot in breadth.

Philadelphia formerly the second city of Lydia, and so called from Attalus Philadelphus brother to Eumenes, stood in a spacious and fruitful plain on the north side of mount Imolus. In this city were anciently celebrated the common feasts of all Asia, as appears from an inscription quoted by Spon †. It was one of the seven churches, and continued to make a good figure under the Greek emperors. It was the last in Asia Minor that submitted to the Turks, and that upon very honourable terms after six years siege. Among the Greeks it retains its ancient name, but is known to the Turks by the name of Allackshyer. Part of the ancient walls is still f a, remaining, with the ruins of an amphitheatre, and some sepulchres, whence the bodies, according to an ancient tradition among the inhabitants, were transported by the Christians into Europe.

Thyatira, a colony of the Macedonians, as Strabo informs us, was situated in a pleasant plain not far from the river Hermus. This city was another of the seven churches, and its present ruins testify its former grandeur. The Greeks call it Tbyra, and the Turks Akbisar. It is a place of some trade for corn and cotton, and inhabited by about 5000 Turks.

Magnesia, by the Turks called Guzetbisar, seated on the Meander, was formerly a city of great note, as the ruins of many stately buildings demonstrate. Here b Themistocles died, this being one of the three towns that Xerxes allotted to him for his subsistence, during his exile. It is still a large, handsome and well-built city. Another city of the same name stood at the foot of mount Sypilus on a rising ground, whence it commanded a very large and beautiful plain, famous in history for many battles fought there, but especially for that between Antiochus and the Romans under the command of Scipio, which decided the fate of Asia. This city was for some time the seat of the Ottoman empire, and is still the capital of Carasia.

Mount Sypilus is the only one in Lydia of any note. The goddess Sypilene took her name from this mountain; or rather Cybele was called Sypilene, because she was worshipped in a particular manner on mount Sypilus. And hence on the reverse of c almost all the ancient medals of Magnesia this goddess is represented sometimes on the frontispiece of a temple with four pillars, and sometimes in a chariot. Plutarch informs us, that mount Sypilus was likewise named the Thunder Mountain, because it thundered more frequently there than on any other mountain of Asia; and hence we find on the reverse of several medals stamped at Magnesia Jupiter armed with thunder-bolts. Mount Tmolus, and in more ancient times Timolus, was once very famous for its wine and saffron.

THE rivers of this country that we shall take notice of are the Paetolus, which rushing from mount Tmolus waters the city of Sardis, and then discharges itself into the Hermus or Sarabat. It was called by the ancients Chrysoorhoas from the colour d of its sands, which shine like gold. The Cayster celebrated by the poets for the swans that frequented its banks, has its source in Phrygia Major, baths Lydia, and empties itself into the Egean sea near Ephesus. It has almost as many windings, if Spon is to be believed, as the Meander itself, but neither have near so many, according to Tournefort, as the Seine beneath Paris.

As to the origin of the Lydians, Josephus, and after him all the ecclesiastic writers, derive them from Lud, Shem's fourth son. As this opinion has no other foundation but the similitude of names, there is a strong objection against it, viz. that the Lydians were first called Mæones, as all the ancients agree, and Lydians from e Lydus the son of Atys, except we suppose the Greeks were deceived, and that the name of Mæones ceasing, they resumed their old name of Lydians, which often has happened. But even in that case, we ought perhaps to consider Lydia as possessed by the Ludim, or posterity of Lud, on a second or third remove, for we see no more reason than Sir Walter Raleigh's, why Lud should straggle so far from his friends as Lydia, according to what we have said elsewhere *. Some of the ancients will have the Lydians to be a mixt colony of Phrygians, Myrians, and Carians. Others finding some conformity in religion and religious ceremonies between the Egyptians and Tuscans who were a Lydian colony, conclude them, without any further evidence, to be originally Egyptians. The very similitude of names, which on like occasions f is generally ready at hand to help out at a dead lift, fails here; which has obliged some writers to take up with arrant fables not worth relating. All we know for certain is that the Lydians were a very ancient nation, as is manifest from their very fables, for Attis, Tantalus, Pelops, Niobe, and Arachne, are all said to have been the children of Lydus. And Xanthus in his Lydiaca, quoted by Stephanus, informs us, that the ancient city of Ascalon, one of the five satrapies of the Philistines mentioned in the books of Joshua and the Judges, was built by one Ascalus a Lydian, whom Aciamus king of Lydia had appointed to command a body of troops which he sent, we know not on what occasion, into Syria. The Heraclide, or kings of Lydia descended from Hercules, began to reign before the Trojan war, and had been preceded by a long series of kings sprung from Atys, and hence stiled Atyade, which is a strong proof of the antiquity of that Kingdom.

Government. THE Lydians began very early to be ruled by kings, whose government, so far as we can gather from their conduct, seems to have been truly despotic, and the crown hereditary. We read of three distinct races of kings reigning over Lydia, viz. the Atyade, the Heraclide, and the Mermnade. The Atyade were so called from Atys the son of Cotys and grandson of Manes. Manes the son of Jupiter and Tellus, and first king of Maonia, had by Callirhoa, the daughter of Oceanus, one son by name Cotys; Cotys by Halia the daughter of Tullus had two, Afius and Atys; from Afius Lydia borrowed the name of Asia, which in process of time became common to the whole continent. Atys married Callithea the daughter of Choræus, and had by her Lydus and Tyrrhenus. Lydus succeeded his father in the kingdom of Maonia, which in his reign began to be called Lydia. Tyrrhenus led a colony into Italy, and settled in Hetruria now Tuscany. This is the account Dionysius Halicarnassensis gives us of the kings sprung of Atys, or the first race of the Lydian kings.

THE Atyade were succeeded by the Heraclide or the descendants of Hercules. For Hercules being by the direction of the oracle sold as a slave to Omphale queen of Lydia to expiate thereby the murder of Iphitus, had during his captivity by one of her slaves a son named Cleolaus, whose grandson by name Argon was the first of the Heraclide that ascended the throne of Lydia. This race reigned from Argon the first to Candaules the last 505 years, the father succeeding the son for 22 generations. They began to reign about, or not long before, the time of the Trojan war.

THE third race called Mermnade, perhaps from one of the family named Mermnas (for the ancients are silent as to the origin of this appellation) began to reign not long before the Medes shook off the Affyrian yoke. The Mermnade were also, properly speaking, Heraclide, being descended from one Lemnos, or as Apollodorus calls him, Agelaus, the son of Hercules by Omphale. The first king of this race was Gyges, and Cræsus the last.

Their character.

As to their character, it must be considered at different times: under Cræsus, and some of his predecessors, they were without all doubt a very warlike people; for they reduced all the neighbouring countries, and spread far and wide the terror of their arms. But being afterwards subdued by the Persians, and enjoined by Cyrus according to the advice given him by Cræsus (Y), to wear long vests and apply themselves to such arts and callings only as had a natural tendency to debase their manners and enervate their courage, they became by degrees a most voluptuous and effeminate race, unfit for action, and entirely given up to idleness, pleasures and diversions.

THE soil of this country by reason of the many rivers that watered it was exceeding fruitful; it abounded in all sorts of grain, and is celebrated for its exquisite wines. It was enriched with several mines, whence Cræsus is said to have drawn his immense wealth.

Religion.

As to the religion of the Lydians it seems to have been much the same with that of the Phrygians, which we have already spoke of; they worshipped Diana, Jupiter and Cybele at Magnesia under the name of Sypilene; for in the alliance concluded between those of Smyrna and Magnesia on the Meander in favour of king Seleucus Callinicius both parties swore, as appears from the Arundelian marbles, by the goddess Sypilene. She borrowed this name from mount Sypilus, or perhaps from a town of the same name, which, as Strabo informs us^a, was ruined by an earth-

(Y) The Lydians, not long after they were conquered by Cyrus, rebelled at the instigation of one Pactyas a Lydian, whom Cyrus had trusted with the gold which he had found in the treasury of Cræsus at Sardis. With this gold Pactyas putting to sea engaged the maritime powers to join him, and having raised a considerable army of mercenaries, marched to Sardis, where he besieged Tabalus, whom Cyrus had appointed governor of that city. News of this revolt being brought to Cyrus as he was leading his army against the Babylonians, Bactrians and Egyptians, he resolved to march back into Lydia, sell all the Lydians for slaves, and at once put an end to that unhappy nation. This resolution he imparted to king Cræsus at that time his prisoner, who fearing the utter ruin of his country earnestly intreated him to forgive the Lydians and wreak his just anger on Pactyas alone, by whom they had been seduced, advising him at the same time, in order to prevent any future rebellion, to forbid the Lydians the use of arms, to encourage luxury and debauchery among them, to which they were naturally inclined, and to cause their children to be brought up to such callings only, as were most capable of debauching their minds, and inclining them to idleness. This advice was followed by Cyrus, and in a short time the Lydians became the most lewd and debauched nation under the sun (31).

(31) Herodot. lib. i.

- a quake in the reign of Tantalus. In the same city of Magnesia stood a temple of Diana Leucophraya no ways inferior to the so much celebrated temple of Diana Ephefna.

THE customs of the Lydians were, as Herodotus informs us¹, much the same with those of the Greeks, except that they used to prostitute their daughters; for the young women among them had no other fortune but what they earned by prostitution; after they had by this means acquired a competent dowry, they were allowed to marry whoever they pleased. They punished idleness as a crime, and inured their children from their very infancy to hardships. Their arms were not bows and arrows, as some have pretended to argue from *Jeremiab*²; but long spears, such as were anciently used by the horse; and in horsemanship, if Herodotus is to be credited³, the Lydians far excelled all other nations. They were the first that introduced the art of coining gold and silver, to facilitate trade; the first that sold by retail, that kept eating-houses and taverns, that invented publick sports and shews, which were therefore called Ludi by the Romans, who borrowed them of the Tuscans, descended, as we shall see anon, from the Lydians. Herodotus informs us⁴ on what occasion they invented those public and several other private diversions. During the reign of Atys the son of Menes, a great scarcity of provisions prevailed all over the kingdom of Lydia, which the inhabitants endured for several years with an astonishing patience. But as the evil continued, in order to divert their minds from the consideration of their unhappy condition, they applied themselves to all manner of diversion, and some inventing one game, others another, they gradually introduced dice, balls, and such other diversions as were in ancient times used among the Greeks, chess only excepted, whereof the Lydians, as we are told by Herodotus, do not challenge the invention. Having thus contrived various kinds of diversions, they used to play one whole day without intermission, eating and drinking the next day without amusing themselves with any kind of games. After they had continued thus alternately fasting, and feasting as the scarcity of their provisions could well allow, finding that their calamities increased rather than abated, the king divided the whole nation into two bodies, commanding them to determine by lot, which of the two should remain at home, and which go abroad in quest of new seats, since their native country could not afford wherewithal to maintain them at home. The king appointed his son Tyrrhenus to command those, who should be obliged to remove, he himself remaining to reign over those who should have the fortune to stay. Those, who by lot were constrained to abandon their country, marched to Smyrna, where they equipped a small fleet, and putting to sea, after many adventures arrived in that part of Italy which was then called Umbria, and now Tuscany. Here they changed their name, and were no longer called Lydians, but Tyrrhenians from their leader Tyrrhenus.

- THE trade of the ancient Lydians is no-where mentioned; but we may suppose it to have been very considerable, especially under the latter kings, when Lydia was in the meridian of its glory; whosoever considers the splendor of this monarchy, and commodious situation of the country, cannot doubt but commerce must here have flourished to a very eminent degree. To this we may add the immense riches not only of the Lydian princes, but of several private persons. *Herodotus*⁵ mentions one by name Pythius, who not only entertained Xerxes and all his army, while he was marching with innumerable forces to invade Greece; but made him a proffer of two thousand talents of silver, and three millions, nine hundred, ninety-three thousand pieces of gold bearing the stamp of Darius, wherewithal to defray the charges of that war. The same Pythius had presented Darius, father to Xerxes, with a plane-tree and vine of massive gold, and was reckoned, after the kings of Perfia, the richest man in the then known world.

The reigns of the kings of LYDIA.

Masnes.

THE first king of Lydia we find mentioned in history is Masnes, or Manes, ^a Herodotus calls him. He is said to have been the son of the earth, which in the language of the ancients denotes him to have been of a mean extraction. Heraclides mentions an anonymous king of Lydia, who from the abject condition of a journeyman or slave to a cartwright living at Cyma, was raised to the throne of Lydia. The same author adds, that as the Lydians were disbursing the money for his ransom, a citizen of Cyma, for whom the slave was at that time making a cart, insisted on his finishing what he had in hand before he was set at liberty, protesting that he valued more the glory of having a cart made by the king of Lydia, than all the gold they could offer him. This fortunate slave may have been Masnes, since he in regard of his mean descent is called by the ancients son of the earth. Heraclides does not tell us what induced the Lydians to place a slave on the throne; but we may suppose this to have been brought about by the advice of some oracle, as it happened in the case of Gordius king of Phrygia; for Heraclides informs us, that the Lydians chose a slave for their king, in hopes of being rescued by his means from the oppressions they groaned under.

Cotys.
Atys.

Masnes was succeeded by his son Cotys, and Cotys by his son Atys, in whose reigns as the country was overstocked with inhabitants, the great famine, which we have mentioned above, reigned for the space of 18 years, and obliged the king to divide his subjects, keeping one half of them at home, and sending the other abroad in quest of new settlements under the conduct of his younger son Tyrrhenus. ^c

Lydus.

Atys was succeeded by his son Lydus, from whom the country had the name of Lydia, having been called to that time Mæonia.

Alcymus.

Alcymus appears next: It is uncertain whom he succeeded: He is represented as an excellent prince, and is said to have had nothing so much at heart, as the welfare of his subjects; whence in the seventh year of his reign the whole nation met, as Suidas informs us, to offer up prayers and sacrifices for his health and prosperity. Stephanus calls him Alciamus, and adds, that in his time the city of Ascalon was built by Ascalus son of Hymenæus and brother to Tantalus, who conducted an army of Lydians into Syria.

Adrymetes.

Adrymetes or Adramytis is mentioned by Albenaus, and said to have been the first ^d that employed women in such ministeries as other kings had done eunuchs.

Cambletes.

Cambletes, Camblitas, or Cambles, a debauched prince, who murdered his wife, and afterwards revenged her death by laying violent hands on himself. Albenaus says, that he was so ravenous as to devour his wife in his sleep, and that finding her hand in his mouth next morning, he was so grieved and ashamed of what he had done, that he put himself to death.

Tmolus.

Tmolus put an end to his life by throwing himself headlong from a precipice, being driven thereto, as Plutarch acquaints us ^e, by Diana for ravishing one of her followers by name Arrbipe.

Theoclymenus.

Theoclymenus succeeded his father Tmolus, of whom we find nothing in history, ^e but that he buried his father on mount Tmolus, which from him had its name.

Marfyas.

AFTER Theoclymenus Marfyas reigned, who, on what occasion we know not, coming into Italy, built there, as we are told by Solinus ^{*}, the city of Archippena.

Jardanes.

Jardanes succeeded Marfyas, and in his reign all manner of lewdness prevailed in the kingdom of Lydia to such a degree, that Omphale, the king's only daughter, could not find shelter even within the walls of the royal palace against the insults of the licentious multitude, the most infamous lusts receiving a kind of sanction from the example of the prince.

Omphale.

ON the death of Jardanes his daughter Omphale was by the unanimous votes of the nobles placed on the throne. She punished with great severity those by whom ^f she had been abused in her father's life-time, and by causing the slaves all over the a kingdom to be shut up with their mistresses, extended her revenge to the whole nation. But in the mean time falling in love with Hercules she gave herself entirely up to him, and had by him a son named Alcaus.

Omphale was succeeded by her son Alcaus, according to some authors, who will have him to have been the first king of Lydia of the race of Hercules.

AFTER Alcaus reigned Belus, and after Belus his son Ninus, of whom we know nothing but their bare names.

Argon succeeded his father Ninus, and is said to have transferred the royal seat to Sardis. Herodotus will have Argon to have been the first of the descendants of Hercules that reigned in Lydia.

b Argon was succeeded by his son Leon, Leon by Adryfus, who reigned thirty-six years; Adryfus by Alyastes who reigned fourteen; and Alyastes by Meles, who reigned twelve.

Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last king of this second race, and lost by his imprudence both his life and kingdom. The fact is thus related by Herodotus: He had a wife whom he passionately loved, and believed the most beautiful of her sex. He extolled her charms above measure to Gyges, his favourite, whom he used to entrust with his most important affairs; and the more to convince him of her beauty, resolved to shew her to him quite naked; and accordingly placed him in the porch of her chamber, where the queen used to undress when she went to bed, ordering c him to retire after seeing her, and take all possible care not to be observed. But notwithstanding all the caution he could use, she plainly discovered him going out, and though she did not doubt but it was her husband's contrivance, yet she passed that night in a seeming tranquillity, suppressing her resentment to the next morning, when she sent for Gyges, and resolutely told him that he must either with his death atone for the criminal action he was guilty of, or put to death Candaules the contriver of it, and receive both her and the kingdom of Lydia for his reward. Gyges at first earnestly begged of her, that she would not drive him to the necessity of such a choice. But finding that he could not prevail with her, and that he must either kill his master, or die himself, he chose the former, and being d led by the queen to the same place, where her husband had placed him the night before, he stabbed the king while he was asleep, and at the same time married the queen, and took possession of the kingdom, in which he was confirmed by the answer of the Delphic oracle. For the Lydians having taken up arms to revenge the death of their prince, an agreement was made between them and the followers of Gyges, that if the oracle should declare him to be lawful king of Lydia, he should be permitted to reign; if not, he should resign the crown to the Heraclidae. The answer of the oracle proved favourable to Gyges, whereupon he was universally acknowledged for lawful king of Lydia. Candaules is said to have purchased a picture, done by one Bularchas, and representing a battle of the Magnetes, for its weight in gold, e which shews how early the art of painting began to be in request, for Candaules was contemporary with Romulus.

Gyges having thus possessed himself of the kingdom of Lydia, sent many rich and valuable presents to the oracle of Delpbos, among the others six cups of gold weighing thirty talents, and greatly esteemed for the workmanship. He made war on those of Miletus and Smyrna, took the city of Colophon, and subdued the whole country of Troas. In his reign, and by his permission, the city of Alhydus was built by the Milesians. Plutarch and other writers relate his accession to the crown of Lydia in a quite different manner, and tell us, without making any mention of the queen, that Gyges rebelled against Candaules and slew him in an engagement. As to f his fabulous ring mentioned by Plato, and Tully, we refer the reader to Tzetzes, Suidas, Philostratus, &c. Gyges reigned thirty-eight years, and was succeeded by his son Ardayes.

Ardayes or Ardayes carried on the war against the Milesians, which his father had begun, and possessed himself of Priene in those days a strong city. In the reign of this prince the Cimmerians invaded and over-ran all Asia Minor; but what battles were fought between the Lydians and these invaders, and with what success, we find nowhere mentioned. Herodotus only informs us, that in the time of Ardayes they possessed themselves of Sardis the metropolis of Lydia, but could never win the castle. Ardyes reigned forty-nine years, and was succeeded by his son.

Sadyattes.

Sadyattes, who reigned twelve years, and warred most part of his reign with the Milesians.

Alyattes.

AFTER him came his son Alyattes, who for the space of six years waged a bloody war with Cyaxares king of the Medes. The occasion of this war is thus related by Herodotus. Certain Scythians being driven out of their country on occasion of a sedition that happened among them, they retired into Media, where Cyaxares received them with great humanity, and as he entertained a good opinion of them, committed to their care divers youths to be instructed in the use of the bow, and in the Scythian tongue. The strangers were great sportsmen, and used daily to supply the King's table with game, which they dressed after their own manner. But returning one day empty, Cyaxares, as he was of a violent temper, treated them with most opprobrious language, which the Scythians resenting, agreed among themselves to kill one of the youths committed to their care, and serve his flesh up to the king's table dressed like venison. This they effected, and then made their escape into Lydia, where they were kindly entertained by Alyattes, which, according to Herodotus, gave occasion to a war that lasted six years, Cyaxares demanding the Scythians, and Alyattes refusing to deliver them up. This war was carried on with various success, the Medes sometimes defeating the Lydians, and the Lydians sometimes the Medes. In the sixth year while both armies were engaged, the day was all on a sudden turned into night (Z), which so frightened both the Lydians and Medes, that they gave over fighting, and shewed a strong inclination to make up their differences in an amicable manner, which was done accordingly by the mediation of Syennesis king of Cilicia and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. The peace was ratified by a marriage between Aryenis the daughter of Alyattes, and Astages the son of Cyaxares (A). A peace being thus concluded between the Lydians and Medes, Alyattes employed all his forces against the Scythians, and after a war, which lasted several years, had the good luck to rid his kingdom of so troublesome guests. He was attended with the like success in the war he undertook against the Smyrneans, whom he worsted in several battles, and at last made himself master of their capital and whole country. He continued for the space of five years the war, which his father had begun against the Milesians, ravaging their country, and about harvest-time carrying away yearly all their corn, in order to oblige them for want of provisions to surrender their city, which he knew he could not reduce any other way, the Milesians being at that time masters of the sea. In the 12th year of this war the Lydians having set fire to the corn in the fields, the flames were carried by a violent wind, which happened to blow at the time, to the temple of Minerva at Assesus, and burnt it down to the ground. Not long after Alyattes falling sick sent to consult the oracle at Delphos, which refused to return any answer till such time as the king should rebuild the temple of Minerva at Assesus. Hereupon Alyattes dispatched ambassadors to Miletus, enjoining them to conclude a truce with the Milesians till the temple should be rebuilt. On the arrival of the ambassadors Thrafsybulus, then king of Miletus, commanded all the corn that was at that time in the city to be brought into the market-place, and the citizens to banquet in public and revel, as if the city were plentifully stored with all manner of provisions. This Thrafsybulus did to the end that the ambassadors, seeing such quantities of corn, and the people every-where diverting themselves, might acquaint their master therewithal, and divert him from pursuing the war. As Thrafsybulus had designed, so it happened; for Alyattes, who believed the Milesians greatly distressed for provisions, receiving a quit different account from his ambassadors, changed the truce into a lasting peace, and ever afterwards lived in amity and friendship with Thrafsybulus and the Milesians. Alyattes had two sons, Cræsus by

(Z) This total eclipse fell upon the 28th of May, and had been foretold by Tales the Milesian some years before.

(A) The account which Herodotus gives us of the cause of this war seems to some writers highly improbable. And truly it is not very likely that the Scythians falling out among themselves should have had recourse to either of these kings, whose countries the Scythians had over-run, and oftentimes plundered. They had chiefly reason to distrust Cyax-

ares, for the treachery he had shewn in massacring such of their countrymen as had settled in his dominions. Others are of opinion, that Alyattes being jealous of the too great power of Cyaxares (who had seized, after the conquest of Nineveh, the regions belonging to the Assyrians as far as to the river Haly) entered into an alliance with the Scythians against the Medes, and that the war was carried on with the joint forces of the Lydians and Scythians.

- a a Carian, and Pantaleon by an Ionian. Cræsus succeeded his father after he had reigned fifty-seven years.

Cræsus succeeding his father at the age of thirty-five years enlarged his dominions so as to be no ways inferior to any prince of that age, though there were in his time three very powerful monarchies, viz. of the Media, of Babylon, and of Egypt, Cræsus was the first that made war on the Ephesians, whose city he besieged and took, notwithstanding their consecrating it to Diana, and fastening the walls by a rope to her temple, which was seven stades distant from the city. After the reduction of Ephesus he attacked under various pretences the Ionians and Æolians, obliging them, and all the other Greek states of Asia, to pay him a yearly tribute. He also formed a design of equipping a fleet to attack the inhabitants of the islands, but was diverted from this thought by Bias of Priene, or, as others say, by Pittacus of Mitylene (B). Not long after he subdued the Pbrygians, Myrians, Maryandini, Chalybes, Paphlagonians, Thracians, Thynians, Bithynians, Carians, Dorians, Æolians, Pamphilians, and all the nations that lay between Lydia and the river Halys. Athenæus out of Berosus mentions a signal victory of his over the Sacæans, a Scythian nation, in memory whereof the Babylonians, his allies, yearly celebrated a feast, which they called Sacæa. Cræsus having by these victories acquired great fame and renown, many wise men of that age went to Sardis on purpose to see him, and among others

b Solon, who after publishing his laws at Athens, had absented himself from his country, under pretence of travelling, for the space of ten years, that he might not be obliged to repeal any of the constitutions which he had established; for the Athenians could make no alteration of themselves, the citizens having taken a solemn oath to observe his laws for the space of ten years. Being arrived at Sardis he was with great humanity entertained by Cræsus in his own palace, and a few days after his arrival carried to see the wealth and magnificence of his treasury, which when he had seen, Cræsus asked him who was the happiest man he had ever known, believing that he would give, without any hesitation, the preference to himself. But Solon, as he was an enemy to all manner of flattery, and resolved on all occasions to speak the plain

c truth, answered, that Tellus the Athenian was the happiest man he had ever seen (C). Cræsus again asked him who was the happiest man after Tellus, not doubting but he would name him at least in the second place, but was again disappointed, the philosopher adjudging the second place to Cleobis and Biton two Argives (D). Cræsus shewing himself highly dissatisfied with Solon for preferring the condition of private men to that of so rich and powerful a prince as he, the philosopher informed him, that it was impossible to judge of the happiness of any man before death, and that all things ought to be measured by their end. Whereupon he was dismissed by Cræsus as a man of no experience. Not long after the departure of Solon, Cræsus lost his favourite son Alys, who was unfortunately killed at the chase of a wild boar by d Adrastus, son of Gordius, and grandson of Mydas king of Pbrygia, who had fled to

(B) Bias arriving at Sardis from Greece told Cræsus inquiring what news he brought from thence, that the islanders had bought ten-thousand horses with a design to attack him by land, which Cræsus believing thanked the gods for inspiring them with such a resolution, as knowing that the main strength of his army consisted in cavalry. Then Bias acquainted him, that the islanders had no such design, but were no less pleased in hearing that he designed to attack them by sea, than he was at the news of their preparing to attack them by land. Whereupon Cræsus, being fully apprised of the rashness of his design, laid it aside, and concluded an alliance with all the Greeks that inhabited the islands.

(C) Tellus was an Athenian, had many virtuous children, who all survived him, and after having enjoyed all the happiness, which the condition of mortals is capable of, ended his life in a most glorious manner. For coming to the assistance of his countrymen in a battle fought at Eleusis against the neighbouring people, he put the enemy to flight, and died in the field of victory. He was buried by the Athenians at the expence of the public in the place where he fell, and yearly honours were paid to his memory.

(D) These two Greeks proved victorious in the Olympic games, and all other public sports. Their mother was a priestess of Juno, who being one day obliged to go to the temple, whither she ought to have been carried in a chariot drawn by a yoke of oxen, her sons seeing that the oxen were not brought from the field at the time appointed, yoked themselves, and drew the chariot the space of forty-five furlongs. This action was greatly extolled by all the people that were assembled at the temple, and their mother, transported with joy in seeing her sons so much honoured by the whole nation, begged of the goddess that she would reward her children with what she thought would prove most advantageous to them. Having put up this petition, and after offering the usual sacrifices banquetted, and with her sons, they both fell asleep and died in the temple. Upon which the Argians, in commemoration of their piety, caused their statues to be made and dedicated at Delphos (31).

Sardis for refuge. This loss was no small allay to his happiness, for he continued a disconsolate the space of two whole years, and in a state of inaction, till the conquests of Cyrus, and growing power of the Persians roused up his martial spirits, and diverted his mind to other thoughts. He apprehended that the good success, which attended Cyrus in all his undertakings, might at last prove dangerous to himself, and therefore resolved to put a stop, if possible, to his conquest. To this end he consulted all the oracles of any fame either in Greece or Afric (E), he strengthened himself with alliances, and, having raised what forces he could, marched into Cappadocia, then belonging to the Persians, before his allies could join him. Here he encamped near the city of Sinope on the Euxine sea, took the city of Pteria, and laid waste all the adjacent country. Cyrus hearing of the enemies motions, put himself b at the head of a powerful army, and marching into Cappadocia, encamped in sight of the Lydian army. Here after several skirmishes, the two armies came at last to a general engagement, wherein many fell on both sides. The night coming on both armies parted on equal terms. But Cræsus fearing to venture a second battle, as his forces were not near so numerous as those of Cyrus, retired in the night-time, and marched with all possible expedition to Sardis, where he disbanded his troops, enjoining them to re-assemble at the end of five months; for he did not in the least apprehend that Cyrus, who had not been able to get the better of him in the field, would venture to advance to his capital. Cyrus, finding the next morning that the enemy had left the field, resolved to pursue him to Sardis, and oblige him to c venture a second battle before his allies could join him. This resolution was executed with such expedition, that Cyrus at the head of his army appeared in the plains of Sardis, before Cræsus had any intelligence of his design. The Lydians were strangely alarmed at so bold an attempt, which they had neither foreseen nor expected. The king, however, drawing together what forces were still remaining marched out against the Persians, by whom, after a sharp engagement, he was put to flight, and forced to shut himself up in Sardis, which was soon after taken by assault, and Cræsus himself made prisoner. In the taking of the town Cræsus himself had been killed, had not his second son, who to that time had been speechless, cried out to the Persian, who was ready to strike, Spare Cræsus. Whereupon he was d against his will saved and carried to Cyrus, who commanded him to be put in fetters, and placed on a great pile of wood, with a design to burn him and fourteen young Lydians in honour of the gods, as a sacrifice and the first-fruits of his victory. Then Cræsus recollecting the words of Solon, that no man can truly be called happy before his death, pronounced thrice that great philosopher's name, which Cyrus hear-

(E) We are told by Herodotus, that Cræsus sent ambassadors to the oracles of Delphos, of Abr, of Pbocis, of Amphiarans, of Trophonius, of Branchis, and of Jupiter Ammon, enjoining them to propose, each to the oracle he was to consult, and all on the same day, the following question: *What is Cræsus the son of Alyattes king of Lydia now doing? What answer the other oracles returned we find nowhere mentioned; but that of Delphos, as Herodotus informs us, answered thus: I know the number of the sands of Libya, the measure of the ocean, the secrets of the silent and dumb lie open to me. I smell the odour of a lamb and tortoise boiling together in a brazen cauldron; brass is under, and brass above the fish. Cræsus hearing this answer, adored the god of Delphos, and owned that the oracle had spoke truth; for on the same day that his ambassadors consulted the oracle, he was employed in boiling together a lamb and a tortoise in a cauldron of brass, which had a cover of the same metal, thinking it impossible that any, but a god, could know what he was doing. Wherefore he immediately offered to the Delphic Apollo a sacrifice consisting of three thousand oxen; and to render him more favourable and propitious, he brought out beds of gold and silver, vessels of gold, robes of purple, and other rich apparel, and burnt them all together, commanding the Lydians to follow his example. On this occasion so much gold was melted down, that one hundred and seventeen tiles were made out of it, whereof the longest were six spans in length, the shortest three, but all one* span in thickness. These with a golden lion weighing ten talents, and many other rich presents Cræsus sent to the Delphic oracle, enjoining his ambassadors to enquire whether he should undertake a war against the Persians. The oracle returned this answer; If Cræsus passes the Halys, he will put an end to a vast empire, which was capable of being interpreted either of Persia or Lydia. Cræsus hearing this answer, and not doubting in the least, but that he should overturn the Persian monarchy, sent more presents to the oracle, and two staters of gold to each of the inhabitants of Delphos. In consideration of which, the Delphians granted Cræsus and the Lydians a right to consult the oracle before any other nation, together with the first place in the temple, and the freedom of the city for ever. Cræsus, having made these presents, sent a third time to consult the oracle whether he should long enjoy the kingdom. The oracle answered, That he should reign till a mule ruled over the Medes, which Cræsus deeming impossible, concluded that he and his posterity were to hold the kingdom of Lydia for ever. But the oracle, as it was afterwards interpreted, by a mule meant Cyrus, whose parents were of different nations, his mother being a Mede, and his father a Persian. And now Cræsus relying on these fallacious answers, and believing himself invincible, marched, without waiting for the troops of his allies, into Cappadocia, where he was met by Cyrus at the head of a powerful army.

a ing, and understanding what induced him to invoke Solon, commanded him to be taken down from the pile, and ranked among his friends and counsellors. Xenophon tells us, that Cyrus received his royal prisoner with great kindness and humanity, when he was first presented to him, without mentioning the treatment which we read of in Herodotus. The first favour Cræsus begged of the conqueror was, that he would give him leave to send his fetters to the oracle of Delphos, as the trophies of the success which Apollo had promised him. This favour Cyrus willingly granted; but the oracle, or rather the priests, convinced Cræsus that he and not Apollo was to blame (F). Thus ended the ancient kingdom of Lydia, continuing subject to the Persians, till they also were conquered by the Macedonians, as we have seen in the foregoing part b of this history.

(F) The oracle answered, that the god himself could not reverse the decrees of fate, and that Cræsus, in the fifth generation suffered for the crime of one, who at the instigation of a woman, had murdered his master, and possessed himself of a crown, which did not belong to him; and that as to the answers of the oracle, he had no Reason to complain; for Apollo only foretold that by making war on the Persians, he would overturn a great monarchy. Had he desired to be truly informed, continued the oracle, he ought to have sent again to enquire whether his own, or that of Cyrus was meant by the oracle. But if he neither understood the true meaning of the oracle, nor would be at the pains of suing for a further explanation, his misfortune and downfall was entirely owing to himself. Cræsus, hearing this answer, acknowledged himself to be in the wrong; and cleared, as much as in him lay, the oracle from all suspicion of falshood.

The History of the LYCIANS.

a T H E country before us was at first called Milias or Tremile from the Milia, a Name and people of Crete that settled there, as Herodotus * and Stephonus informs us, divisions. and afterwards Lycia from Lycus the son of Pandion king of Athens. The proper Lycia, as precisely as we can gather, lies between the thirty-sixth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude. It was bounded by Caria on the west, by Pamphylia on the east, by Phrygia Major and part of Pamphylia on the north, and by the Mediterranean on the south.

THIS country was divided into two parts, the Maritime and the Mediterranean, or the coast and the country. The most remarkable cities on the coast were Telmessus or Telmessus, seated on a noted bay in the western limits, whose inhabitants are b said to have been the first pretenders to interpretation of dreams. Patara, situated on a hill, and formerly celebrated for a temple and oracle of Apollo, no ways inferior to that of Delphos. At Patara Apollo was said to reside the six winter months, and the six summer months at Delos, whence the epithets of Patareus Apollo † and Sortes Lyciæ ‡. This city was greatly improved and embellished by Ptolemæus Philadelphus, and called Arfinoe from his wife who bore that name, but the former name prevailed. Myra built on a high hill about twenty furlongs from the coast, mentioned in the Acts §. This city was the metropolis of Lycia when a Roman Province, and of consequence in the christian times an archbishop's see. Olympus a famous city with a mountain of the same name. Phaselis on the borders of Lycia and Pamphylia, and c therefore by some placed in Pamphylia, by others more accurately in Lycia. This city in the time of the Romans was a famous nest of pyrates, but was at last reduced by Servilius, while Pompey scoured the sea with a numerous fleet. To the pyrates of this town former ages were indebted for those swift vessels, which the Romans from the place called Phaseli, and we Brigantines. We will not take upon us to mark out the bounds of the midland Lycia. Strabo reckons it in the following towns, Pinara, Cræsus, at the foot of a hill bearing the same name, Tlos, Simena, &c. Ptolemy adds to the Mediterranean part of Lycia two small countries, viz. Milias on the west bordering on Caria, and Cabalina on the east bordering on Lycia Proper. But Strabo places

Milias on the borders of Pisidia and Pamphylia. The inland part of Lycia was divided a by the river Xanthus, which rising in two springs from the foot of mount Cadmus, and washing the walls of Xanthus, a city formerly of some note, discharges itself into the Mediterranean. From this river the people, inhabiting the inland parts of Lycia, were called Xanthians. The chief mountain of this country, and indeed of all Asia, is mount Taurus, which has its beginning in this province, and extends eastward to the great oriental ocean. In Lycia was also the famous mountain Cbimera, which vomited flames, the bottom whereof was infested with serpents, the middle parts afforded pasture for goats, and the top much frequented by lions, which gave occasion to the poets to paint it as a monster with the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a serpent. This mountain was first planted, and rendered habitable b by Bellerophon, who is therefore fabled by the poets to have killed this monster.

Soil and climate.

THE soil of this country is very fruitful, and the air reckoned very wholesome. It is plentifully watered with small rivers running down from mount Taurus, which often swell to an immoderate degree, and overflow the country, being increased by the melting of the snows on that mountain, or by heavy rains.

Their origin.

As to the origin of the Lycians, Herodotus and others * inform us, that they were descended from the Cretans; for Sarpedon being driven out of the island by his brother Minos, and landing in Asia with those Cretans, who had sided with him, settled in Mylias, and there founded a new kingdom, after having conquered and driven out the ancient proprietors, whom Herodotus calls Milyans and Solyms. During the reign of Sarpedon they continued to be called Cretans, but after his death took the name of Lycians from Lycus the son of Pandion king of Athens, who, being forced by his brother Ageus to quit his native country, had fled to Sarpedon. Hence the poets, and with them Strabo, seem to confound the Lycians with the Carians, who were undoubtedly descended from the Cretans. But Diodorus Siculus † and Plato ‡ before him, counts the Lycians among the Greek nations of Asia, as being descended from the Argivi. But not to dwell on such uncertainties, the Lycians were once a very powerful and warlike people, considering the smallness of their country. They had, according to Strabo § three and twenty, according to Pliny ¶ six and thirty, large and populous towns, were experienced mariners, and extended their power on the seas as far as Italy. d

THE Lycians are highly commended by the ancient writers for their sobriety, and manner of administering justice. They had in latter ages twenty-three considerable cities, each of which sent their deputies to a general assembly or diet, the great cities three, the lesser two, and the least one only. In this assembly all matters of consequence were canvassed, and determined by the majority of votes. They chose in the first place the president of the council, and after him the civil and military officers of each city. Here they administered justice, settled all private differences, declared war, made peace, concluded alliances, &c. Whence we may conclude, that their government, at least in latter times, either was not monarchical e, or their monarchs no ways absolute. This form of government they maintained even under the Romans, as Strabo informs us †, but with this difference, that the consent of the Roman governor, and, in matters of moment, of the senate, was requisite for the validity of such acts and decrees as had passed in their assembly. Their government was at first monarchical, and the country parcelled out into several petty kingdoms; for we read of the families of Bellerophon, Sarpedon, Lycus, Telephus and Pandarus reigning in Lycia at one and the same time; if we will not rather suppose the government to have been aristocratical, and these families to have bore the greatest sway in the administration. But be that as it will, in process of time all Lycia became subject to one prince; for Herodotus in enumerating the princes that f contributed towards the equipping and arming of Xerxes's fleet mentions but one king of Lycia, by name Cyberniscus. This nation, as most of the other nations of Asia, was first subdued by Craesus or the Lydians, and after the downfall of the Lydian kingdom, by Cyrus. The courage, resolution, and intrepidity with which the Lycians of Xanthus opposed Harpagus the Persian general, deserves particular notice. For instead of tamely submitting, like their neighbours, to the Persian yoke, they attacked with a handful of men Harpagus's numerous army, and fought with incredible bravery, though under all the disadvantages imaginable. But being over-

- a powered with numbers, and forced to retire into their city, they first set fire to the castle, where they had shut up their wives, children, slaves, and all their riches; and then engaging themselves by a solemn oath to die together, returned to the field of battle, renewed the fight, and were all killed to a man. The Lycians continued to be governed by their own kings even after they were subdued by the Persians, but paid an annual tribute to the king of Persia. They fell with the Persians under the power of the Macedonians, and after the death of Alexander were governed by the Seleucidae. Of these Antiochus the Great being confined by the Romans beyond mount Taurus, Lycia was granted to the Rhodians; but these disobliging the Romans in the war with Perseus, Lycia was declared a free country, and
- b continued to be so till the reign of Claudius, who, provoked at their intestine dissensions, reduced their country into the form of a province.

THEIR customs were much the same with those of the Cretans and Carians, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. But they had one custom peculiar to themselves; for they took their names not from their fathers, but from their mothers, so that if any one was asked, who he was, or of what family, he had recourse to the female line. Besides, if a free-born woman married a slave, her children enjoyed all the privileges of citizens; but on the contrary, if a man of ever so great a family married a slave, their children were incapable of enjoying any honours, or bearing any public employment¹. As to their trade and navigation, c we are quite in the dark. Their religion was the same with that of the inhabitants of Crete, which we shall have occasion to describe when we treat of the Greek islands.

The succession of the kings of Lycia, and the years of their respective reigns are Their kings. overcast with such a mist, and interrupted with so many chasms, that it is not possible to give any tolerable account of them. We find mention of but three kings of all Lycia that we are sure of.

Amisodarus, who is fabled to have nourished the monster Chimera.

- Jobates*, who married his daughter Sthenobea, or, as others call her, Antea to Præus king of the Argives. He is said to have undertaken an expedition against
- d the Tirynthians in favour of his son-in-law, and to have subdued them. His daughter Sthenobea falling in love with Bellerophon, the son of Glaucus king of Ephyra, and having solicited him in vain to comply with her unchaste desires, complained to her husband as if she had been solicited by him. Whereupon Præus, being unwilling to violate the laws of hospitality by putting a stranger to death in his own kingdom, sent him into Lycia with letters to Jobates his father-in-law, requesting him to revenge the affront offered his daughter by the death of the bearer. Jobates thinking it a base thing to imbrue his hands in the blood of a stranger, sent him with a small body of troops against the Solyimi, a warlike and barbarous people, in hopes he should there find his doom. But Bellerophon returned from this, and many other
- e dangerous expeditions, which he was put upon, not only safe, but victorious; whereupon Jobates being reconciled to him, and discovering the calumny, gave him his other daughter in marriage, and with her part of his kingdom.

MANY years after reigned Cyberniscus, who was one of Xerxes's admirals in his expedition against Greece. And this is all we find upon record concerning the ancient kings of Lycia.

The History of the ancient CILICIANS.

CILICIA, according to the Greek writers, borrowed its name from Cilix the son Name and of Agenor, and brother of Cadmus, who is said by them to have settled in this divisions. country, as we have observed elsewhere^a. Josephus^b tells us, that it was anciently called Tarsis from Tarsibis the son of Javan, who first peopled this part of Asia^c; and of the same opinion are Stephanas^d, Zonarus^e, and Hierom^f; but the latter by Tarsis in scripture sometimes understands Carthage^g, sometimes a province in India^h, and sometimes the sea ^v. *Bochart*² derives the name of Cilicia from the Phœnician a word Challekim or Challukim, signifying a stone, that part of Cilicia, which the Greeks called Cilicia Trachæa, being very stony, and to this day called by the Turks Tas Wilietb, that is, the stony province.

Cilicia properly so called lies between the 36th and 40th degrees of north latitude, and is bounded by Syria on the east, or rather by mount Amanus, which separates it from that kingdom, by Pamphylia on the west, by Isauria, Cappadocia and Armenia Minor on the north, and by the Mediterranean on the south. It is now called Caramania, having been the last province of the Caramanian kingdom that held out against the Ottoman race. This province is so surrounded by steep and craggy mountains, chiefly the Taurus and Amanus, that it may be defended by a handful of b resolute men against a whole army how numerous soever, there being but three narrow passes leading into it, commonly called Pyle Ciliciæ, or the gates of Cilicia, one on the side of Cappadocia called the pass of mount Taurus, and the other two, called the pass of mount Amanus, and the pass of Syria, leading from Syria. The Persian army marched through the straits of mount Amanus, while that of Alexander was encamped at Iffus not far from the straits of Syria, which lie more to the south, and were guarded by a body of Macedonians under the command of Parmenio; the straits of mount Taurus Alexander had passed in entering Cilicia, the Persians who guarded that important pass having retired at the approach of the Macedonians.

Cities of Cilicia Aspera.

THE whole country was divided by the ancients into Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris c; the former, called by the Greeks Trachæa or stony, is bounded by Isauria on the north, Pamphylia on the west, Cilicia Campestris on the east, and the Mediterranean on the south. The cities in this part of Cilicia, mentioned by the ancients, are Sydra, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Syëdra, Nagidus, a Samian colony, Anemurium, Asfione, Celenderis, or Celandris, Aphrodisias, so called from Venus, who was worshipped there in a stately temple, Holmus, or, as Pliny calls it, Holmia, Sarpedon famous for a noble temple consecrated to Apollo and Diana, Lephyrium, according to Ptolemy, the last city of Cilicia Aspera, which Strabo extends to Sole. Pliny, Mela, and Scylax make no distinction between the two Cilicia's. Near Lephyrium d was a grove much celebrated by the ancients, and minutely described by *Pomponius Mela*⁷. Sebaste, which Archelaus the Cappadocian chose for his residence after he was by Augustus appointed king of Cilicia Aspera; this city was situated on a small island called Eleusa, and not on the continent, where Pliny and Ptolemy have placed it. These were the towns of most note on the coast of Cilicia Aspera; the inland cities were, Seleucia built by Seleucus Nicator on the banks of the Calycadnus, and peopled by the inhabitants of Holmus; it was a free city under the Romans, and maintained its liberty, as is plain from several medals, at least to the time of the emperor Gordian. Domitianopolis, Philadelphia, Lamus, and in latter times Scandoloro on the confines of Pamphylia, which, with the adjoining territory, was governed by its own prince, while all the neighbouring provinces were subject to the Caramanian kings. e

Cities of Cilicia Proper.

THE chief cities of Cilicia, properly so called, or Cilicia Campestris, were, according to Strabo, Soli, or Sole, built by the Rhodians and Albæus. This city was destroyed by Tigranes king of Armenia in his wars with the Romans, and rebuilt by Pompey; whence in after-ages it was known by the name of Pompeiopolis. *Laertius*² tells us, that this city was built by Solon on his return from the court of Cræsus, and peopled by a colony from Athens; and adds, that these Athenians, having in process of time quite lost the purity of their native language by conversing with the Barbarians, became remarkable for their rude pronunciation, and uncouth expressions, whence any impropriety of Speech was called a Solecism. But this is contradicted f by others³, who derive the word Solecism not from the Solenses in Cilicia, but from the Solii in *Cyprus*⁴. Tarsus, which produced the great apostle of the Gentiles, and was, if we believe *Strabo*⁵, in former times no ways inferior for the study of philosophy and polite literature either to Athens or Alexandria. We are told that it borrowed its name from Tarshish the son of Javan, by whom or by his descendants it was built; but Strabo out of Aristobulus acquaints us, that it was built by Sardanapalus, and proves his assertion from an ancient monument found in those parts with

The inhabitants enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens, which St. Paul thought fit to make use of according to the Portian law^a. The Tarsians, to ingratiate themselves with Julius Caesar, exchanged the ancient name of their city with that of Julio-polis; but the old name survived the new, that city being called to this day by the Greeks Tersa or Terassa; the Turks, as Bellonius and other more modern travellers inform us, call it Hamsa. Anchiale, built by Sardanapalus, as we hinted above, or, if we believe Asbenodorus, by Anchiale the daughter of Japhet. Anazarbum situated on the river Pyramus, and in the
- b Roman times the metropolis of Cilicia Secunda. Suidas tells us, that it was first called Cyinda, and afterwards Anazarbum from one Anazarbus, who was sent by the emperor Nerva to rebuild it after it had been quite ruined by an earthquake; but he is certainly mistaken, since Pliny, who died long before the reign of Nerva, calls the inhabitants of this city Anazarbeni; and Stephanus derives its name from mount Anazarbus at a small distance from the place where this city stood. Anazarbum was the birth-place of Dioscorides, and continued in a very flourishing condition to the division of the empire. Epiphania, which gave birth to George the famous Arian bishop of Alexandria. Mopsuestia, the see of Theodorus Mopsuestenus, a great patron of the Nestorian heresy in the time of Chrysostom. Iffus situated on a gulph to which
- c it gave name, and famous for the battle fought near it between Alexander and Darius; this town is now called Ajazzo, and the great gulph on which it stands the gulph of Ajazzo. Alexandria built by Alexander the Great between Iffus and the straits which lead from Cilicia into Syria. Ptolemy places this city in Syria, but Strabo more rightly on the bay of Iffus. As this city was situated in a place very convenient for trade, it soon became one of the most flourishing cities of the world. Alexander in building it employed Democrates, who had rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus burnt by Erostratus^b, and took care to people his new city with colonies from several other places, especially from Judea^c, allowing the Jews the free exercise of their own religion, and the same privileges, immunities and exemptions
- d which he granted the Macedonians. As it was very convenient for such as traded on the Mediterranean, the Red-Sea and the Nile, it continued in a very flourishing condition, till trade took another course on the discovery of a way to the Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, when it became by degrees a poor village. It is at present called by the Turks Scanderon, by the Italians Alexandretta, remarkable for nothing else but some ruins, which shew what it was in better times. Several other cities are mentioned by the ancients, but as they were no ways considerable, and are at present quite unknown, we shall not dwell any longer on this subject.

THE rivers of any note in Cilicia are, the Pyramus which rises on the north side Rivers. of mount Taurus, and empties itself into the Mediterranean between Iffus and Margarus; the Cedrus, which springs from the Antitaurus, passes through Tarsus, and disembogues itself into the Mediterranean near the city of Anchiale; it is famous for the rapidity of its stream, and coldness of its waters, which proved very dangerous to Alexander; the Calycadmus, the Lamus, the Sarus, the Pinarus, and several others of less note, water this province, and discharge themselves into that part of the Mediterranean, which the ancients called the sea of Cilicia, and extended near two hundred and fifty miles from east to west.

THAT part of Cilicia, which the ancients called Cilicia Campestris, was, if we Soil and believe Ammianus Marcellinus, one of the most fruitful countries of all Asia; but the climate. western part equally barren, though famous even to this day for an excellent breed

f of horses, of which 600 are yearly sent to Constantinople for the special use of the Grand Signior. The air in the inland cities is reckoned very wholesome, but equally dangerous on the coast, especially to such as are not accustomed to it.

THIS country, according to Josephus^d, was first peopled by Tarshish the son of Javan and his descendants, whence the whole country was called Tarsus, and not the territory alone adjoining to the city of Tarsus, as some have wrote. The ancient inhabitants were in process of time driven out by a colony of Phanicians, who under the conduct of Cilix first settled in the island of Cyprus, and from thence passed into the country which from their leader they called Cilicia. Strabo^a tells us, that a this Phœnician colony passed from Cyprus into Pbrygia, where they lived in subjection to the kings of Troy, and after the Trojan war possessed themselves of that country, which was afterwards called Cilicia. In tract of time several colonies from other countries settled in this kingdom, namely from Syria and Greece, whence the Cilicians in some places used the Greek tongue, in others the Syriac, but the former greatly corrupted by the Persian, the predominant language of the country being a dialect of that tongue.

Their manners, government,

THE Cilicians, if we believe the Greek and Latin writers, were a rough race of people, unfair in their dealings, cruel, great liars (G), and in the Roman times entirely addicted to piracy. They first began together with the Pamphylians in the time of the Mitbridatic war to infest the neighbouring coasts, and being emboldened with success soon ventured as far as the coasts of Greece and Italy itself, where they took innumerable slaves, whom they sold to the Cypriots, and to the kings of Egypt and Syria. Publius Servilius was first employed against them, who gave them a great overthrow in a sea-engagement, took Phaselis and several other strong-holds, whither they used to retire, and ravaged the whole country. But scarce was he withdrawn, when they broke out more violently than ever, filling all the ports and creeks of the Ionian, Mediterranean, and Archipelago, with their vessels so as to entirely obstruct the navigation. Whereupon Pompey himself did not think it beneath his greatness to undertake a war against them, which he ended in the space of one month, having at the same time attacked them both by sea and land with 500 ships, and 130,000 men.

In ancient times the Cilicians, before they settled in that country which we call Cilicia, were governed by their own kings, and divided into two petty kingdoms, viz. the Theban and the Lyrnessian; in the former ruled the family of Eetion, in the latter that of Evenus. These kingdoms did not extend beyond the territories of Thebes and Lyrnessus, two cities in the famous plain called the plain of Thebes, often mentioned both by the Greek and Latin writers, as having been the occasion of frequent disputes between the Lydians and Mysians, and in the Roman times between the neighbouring princes of Asia Minor. After the settling of the Cilicians in that country which from them was called Cilicia, we find no mention made of their kings till the time of Cyrus, to whom they voluntarily submitted, continuing subject to the Persians till the overthrow of that empire, but governed to the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon by kings of their own nation. Herodotus indeed counts Cilicia among the *Persian Satrapies*¹; but from other writers it is manifest that the Cilicians were governed by kings of their own in the time of *Xerxes*², and Artaxerxes Mnemon. After the downfall of the Persian empire Cilicia became a Macedonian province, and on the death of Alexander fell to the share of Seleucus, and continued under his descendants till it was by Pompey reduced to a Roman province. As a proconsular province it was first governed by Appius Claudius Pulcher, and after him by Cicero, who reduced several strong-holds on mount Amanus, in which some Cilicians had fortified themselves, and held out against his predecessor, for which he was saluted by the army with the title of Imperator or General. All Cilicia being thus brought under subjection, it was first divided into Cilicia Campestris and Trachæa; the former became a Roman province, but the latter was governed by kings appointed by the Romans till the reign of Vespasian, when the family of Tracodementus being extinct, this part too was made a province of the empire, and the whole divided into Cilicia Prima, Cilicia Secunda, and Isauria; the first took in all Cilicia Campestris, the second the coast of Cilicia Trachæa, and the last the inland parts of the same division; and in this state it continued till the division of the empire.

As to the succession of the Cilician kings we are almost quite in the dark. Those we find mentioned by the ancients, are Eetion, who reigned before their migration into Cilicia, and assisted Priam against the Greeks. He was king of Thebes only, in a the defence of which city he was with his seven sons killed, as we read in Homer ¹, by Achilles. The famous Andromache, Hector's wife, was his daughter. Evemus reigned in Lyrnessus during the Trojan war, and is likewise mentioned by Homer ². He was succeeded in his petty kingdom by his sons Mines and Epistropus, who siding with the Trojans were both killed by Achilles. Syenneſis I. who was contemporary with Alyattes king of Lydia, Cyaxares king of the Medes, and Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, as we have hinted in the histories of Media and Lydia. Horomedon mentioned by Herodotus ³. Syenneſis II. who assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece ⁴, and is greatly commended by Æschylus. Syenneſis III. who assisted, tho' much against his will, Cyrus the younger, against his brother Artaxerxes. After his death we find no mention of kings, but only of governors of Cilicia, appointed by the kings of Persia; whence we conclude him to have been the last that reigned in Cilicia before the country was subdued by Alexander. Of the kings that reigned several ages after in Cilicia Trachæa we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

The fabulous and heroic times; Containing the history of the ancient kingdoms of Sicyon, Argos, Attica, Boeotia, Arcadia, Thessaly, Corinth, of Sparta to Lycurgus, and some others of less note, to their severally becoming common-wealths.

An account of the fabulous and heroic times in general.

a I T being the design of this chapter to open the way to the history of Greece, by tracing the several nations of it, as far as can be done with any probability, to their primitive, weak, rude, and obscure originals; and by pointing out the various steps by which they raised themselves from the lowest beginnings to that flourishing state in which they came at length to excel all the world in learning, in arts and sciences, in politeness, in the excellency of their laws and government, and in the strength and valour of their armies; we cannot reasonably expect that our readers will rest satisfied with our bare endeavouring to give them the best account that can be had of this long and perplexed epocha, clear of all the monstrous fictions with which the extravagant fancies of the poets, and the vanity and ignorance of the Grecian writers have stuffed it. We shall therefore strive to make the best and shortest way we can through this long period of 900 years, whose ancient monuments, though disguised under the tales of the most unnatural actions of the gods, such as their adulteries, rapes, murders, and the like, and the incredible exploits of their heroic offspring (A); yet when divested from the fable, afford at least so much light

(A) It will not be amiss to begin our notes on this fabulous epocha, with offering some tolerable account for that heap of monstrous fables under which the history of it is couched; and it will, upon examination, appear to flow from some, if not all, of the following reasons:

1. From the genius of those languages in which these ancient monuments were written, which was altogether light to those dark times, that an history of this country would be justly thought a imperfect without some short account of them.

Geography of Greece.

THE limits of Greece, not as they were afterwards enlarged, either by continual sending out of colonies, or by conquests, which still carried their name with them, which will be best seen in the next chapter, but only as they relate to our present epocha, extended from north to south, that is, from the long ridge of mountains which divided it from Macedonia, and from the river Strymon, by which it was parted from Thrace, to the promontory of Tenarus, the utmost southern extent of Peloponnesus, about 6 deg. 20 min. or 380 miles. And from east to west, that is from the Aegean to the Ionian sea, about 5 deg. 10 min. or 310. It contained the following kingdoms: In Peloponnesus, Sicyon, Argos, and Messenia, Corinth, Achæia b Propria, Arcadia, and Laconia. Out of it, or in Græcia Propria, those of Attica, Megara, Bæotia, Locris, Epichnemidia, Doris, Phocis, Locris, Ozolæa, and Ætolia. In Epirus the Molossi, Amphiloebi, Cassiopæi, Dræopes, Cbaones, Threspotii, Almeny, and Acarnania. In Thessaly it contained the countries of Thessaliotis, Ebiotis, Pelasgiotis, Magnesia, and Phibia *. All these have at one time or other been severally governed by kings of their own, whose names we only find occasionally mentioned in the history of the more considerable kingdoms of Argos, Attica, Thebes and Sparta, of the Argonautic expedition, and of the Trojan war b. The fuller description and history of those chief kingdoms will be seen in the following sections; the rest we must content ourselves with a bare mention, because we know very little except c their names.

names.

FOR this reason it cannot be expected, that we should enter into a critical enquiry into the names and original of those various inhabitants of ancient Greece. The general names by which they were known, and mentioned by old historians and geographers, were those of Graioi and Graicoi c (B). These they quickly changed for those of Achæi and Hellenes d, by which they are generally called in ancient authors (C). Another name by which they were known in several parts of Greece was that of Pelasgi, which the Arcadians, who are generally reckoned the ancientest people of altogether figurative, and whose elegance consisted in the boldest and most sublime allusions and metaphors.

2. From the writers themselves, who being all poets, and recording these transactions in short sonnets to be learned by heart, and sung upon proper occasions, did still inhance upon their native idiom in poetic pieces, and made choice of the most strained, and surprising allegories, that they might make the deeper and more lasting impression both on those who sang, and those who heard them.

3. From an ambitious affectation of antiquity, equal or superior to other cotemporary nations, or perhaps rather, from a shame of their mean and low extraction, and of their rude, not to say brutish ancestors, who like wild beasts did live by preying upon one another, having no law or rule, but that of the strongest arm. The consciousness of which made some of them fetch their original from certain great heroes, begot by some lecherous god, either upon some kind goddess, or straggling nymph, whilst others contented themselves with pretending that they sprung like mushrooms out of their own native soil.

4. This might be also another reason, why they transformed into fictitious monsters, those real ones amongst them, whose cruel and infamous actions they could not either palliate or obliterate.

5. From the high esteem they had for those renowned heroes, who cleared the country of those pests of mankind. They could not, it seems, look upon the arduous, and yet successful labours of a Minos, Hercules, or a Theseus in this so beneficial a province, without supposing them to have been more than mortal men, or at least, without an ambition to make them pass in future ages for the offspring of some of the gods.

6. From an imitation of, or rather an emulation to outdo the ancient Hebrew heroes, both in their extraction, and in their wonderful exploits; thus we find a great part of the character of Hercules to be a mere compound of those of a Sampson, Gideon, Jephtha, and other Jewish worthies. The same may be said of several others (1).

(B) From Graecus the father, or, according to others, the son of Thessalus, who gave name to Thessaly (2). But by a modern critic (3) derived from Ragan the same with Ren the son of Peleg (4). by the transposition of a letter, to soften the sound.

(C) The first supposed from Achæus the son of Xuthus, the son of Hellen, and father of Ion; or according to the fable, the son of Jupiter (5); the other from Hellen abovementioned, the son of Deucalion, and father of Dorus, from whom came the Doræ, afterwards a famous nation in Greece.

Thucydides observes rightly however, that the name of Hellenes did not universally obtain over Greece; since Homer, who wrote so long after the siege of Troy, doth only call them so who followed Achilles from Phibiotis (6).

a it, do challenge from their pretended founder Pelasgus, who, we find, did get such foot in Peloponnesus, that the whole peninsula was from him called Pelasgia. We find these Pelasgians, for whom some critics and antiquaries have found a much older original (D), spread in many other parts of Greece, as in Attica, Thessaly, and Epirus; in which last they have been supposed by some ¹ to have laid the foundation of the Dodonean oracle. But the most ancient name of all, is universally allowed to be that of Iones, which the Greeks themselves derive from Ion the son of Iones descend- Xuthus, or, as the fable hath it, of Apollo by Crensa the daughter of Erichtheus, and ed from Javan. grandson to Deucalion. But it is more probable, as Josephus affirms ², that their original is of much older date, and that Javan the son of Japhet, and grandson b of Noah, and his descendants, were the first who peopled these countries, as the learned Bochart seems to have proved by very strong arguments ³ (E).

It is true, indeed, that among the Greeks themselves, only the original Athenians, and such colonies as sprang from them, were called Iones, but then it is plain beyond exception, that other nations called all the inhabitants of Greece by that name; witness the testimony of Hesychius ⁴, and the scholiast on Aristophanes, and those passages of holy writ mentioned in the last note. We omit the names of several other people among the ancient Greeks, which were supposed to have been the oldest of all, but which do not appear by far to have been the first peoplers of that country; such were the Aones, Hyanthes, Leleges, Dryopi, Caucones, Jemices, and others, c mentioned by Strabo ⁵, but which may be better supposed to have been reliques of the old Carians, who, Thucydides tells us, made frequent incursions into Greece ⁶.

If we look upon this infant state of Greece, with respect to its inhabitants, it appears, even by the confession of their own writers, to have been one continued u uncultivated desert, inhabited by savage creatures, scarcely removed one degree from brutes; men living indifferently on every fruit, herb, or root, that came in their way, and lying either in the open fields, or at best, sheltering themselves from the inclemency of the weather, in dens, clefts, and hollow trees. The first improvement they made to their way of living was exchanging their old food, for the more wholesome acorns, building themselves huts to sleep in, and covering their d bodies with the skins of beasts. All this it seems they were beholden for to Pelasgius abovementioned ⁷, whose memory was highly revered among them upon that account. But this reformation in their way of living wrought none upon their

(D) These (7) suppose that the descendants of Peleg, the fourth in descent from Shem the son of Noah, whom they suppose to have been the father of the Scythians, were the first who peopled Greece; and that they only softened the name of Peleg, or according to the septuagint and vulgate, Phaleg their progenitor, and called themselves Pelasgians. The last of those authors confirms this opinion, drawn from the affinity between the Hebrew and ancient Greek, from the various dialects and pronunciations of the latter, which in the Doric comes nearest to the eastern tongues; and from the remainder of those tongues, especially in those places where the Pelasgians have been, which Bochart thought of Phœnician, but our author will rather have of Hebrew extraction.

All this is further confirmed by a passage in Epiphanius, who says (8), that from the age of Therah downward, Phaleg and Ragau removed towards the clime of Europe, to part of Scythia, and were joined to those nations from which the Thracians came.

This last passage, wherever Epiphanius got it, has been sufficiently confuted by Bochart (9), who shews that both Phaleg and Ragau, and their descendants, continued still in the confines of Media and Armenia. And we have elsewhere shewn [†], that the Scythians were the descendants of Mageg, and not of Phaleg or Ragau. They were the sons of Japhet, and not of Shem, who divided the isles of the gentiles (10). We shall therefore leave the Pelasgians to their own founder, and find a much more likely one for the ancient Greeks in the following note.

(E) First from the authority of Josephus above quoted. 2. From the name itself of the patriarch, ^{††} without the points, sounding more properly Jon than Javan. 3. From the authority of Moses, who says (11), that by these (the sons of Japhet) were the isles of the Gentiles divided; which according to the genius of the Hebrew, means, not islands properly so called, but all maritime countries, at any distance from Palestine, especially those which are along the Mediterranean. 4. From that of the prophet (12), who call Græcia by the name of ^{††} Jan or, as pointed, Javan. According to which the Jews have all along to this day called the Greek tongue ^{†††} Javanith.

All this is further confirmed by our author from the clear remains of Elisha Javan's eldest son (13), which were still to be found in that of Elis, one of the ancient kingdoms of Peloponnesus.

manners. On the contrary, they who had no occasion to fight for any thing but a hole to sleep in, began now to envy and rob another of these new acquisitions. This in time put them under a necessity of joining themselves into companies under some head, that they might either more safely plunder their neighbours, or preserve what they had got. Laws they had none except that of the strongest arm; so that they only lived safest and most quietly, who inhabited the most craggy and barren spots of ground, whilst those, who were more pleasantly or fruitfully seated, were continually liable to be dispossessed by new invaders. Hence it was that Greece for a long time had no settled inhabitants, but was in a continual fluctuation, the weakest being always sure to be turned out by the strongest. Their gigantic size and strength, if we may believe Plutarch ^a, added so much to their insolence and cruelty, that they seemed to glory in committing the greatest acts of violence and barbarity on those that unhappily fell into their hands.

THE case did not alter much for the better after they came to form themselves into regular societies, and build themselves towns and cities for safety. Attica seems the only place that was free from those incursions, because it was destitute of every thing that could invite a plundering enemy; but those cities fared worse which were situate on the sea-coasts, because they were in continual danger of being plundered either by sea or land; for pirates did not less infest all those seas, than the robbers did the land. And this was one main cause why most of the ancient cities of Greece were built at some distance from the shore; but even in these, as all their safety consisted in the resistance they could make against an invader, so their inhabitants were under a necessity of going constantly armed, and to be ever on their guard.

ANOTHER mischief arising from these continual piracies and robberies was, that the far greater part of their land did lie uncultivated, so that men only planted and sowed as much as was barely necessary for their present support; and where there was such an universal neglect of agriculture, there could be as little room for any discoveries in other useful arts and trades at land, as in commerce and navigation at sea. Hence it is also, that whilst other ancient nations, as the Jews, the Egyptians, Midianites, Phœnicians, had improved them to a very great degree, as we have seen in their several histories, the Greeks alone seem to have been the only strangers to them; insomuch that one may reasonably question, by Homer's making oxen the standard of the value of things, whether they knew the use of money even in his days. One art however one would have expected them to have been very expert in, that of war, and the only one indeed they seemed to have had a value for; but even here, the very reverse may be inferred from what the same poet tells us, of some of his heroes putting whole squadrons of them to flight.

Trades.

Art of war.

Arts and sciences.

WE shall have occasion to shew in the sequel, that they had no letters till Cadmus brought them thither out of Phœnicia, whose alphabet consisting only of sixteen letters, was not perfected into that of twenty-four till many centuries after him. It was from him likewise that they learned arithmetic, navigation, and commerce; as for other sciences they continued much longer strangers to them; and it was not till some of their great men began to travel into Egypt, and other kingdoms, and the Celtes made their frequent incursions into Greece [†], that they began to have some knowledge and relish for them. We are indeed told, that Orpheus, Museus, and some others, who went into the first of those countries much earlier, did bring a great deal of the Egyptian divinity, and religious rites from thence ^c. But as for astronomy, geometry, philosophy, and magic, they were fetched long after, the first from Babylon, the next from Egypt, and the last from Persia ^d; so ignorant we find them of the first of these sciences, that they knew of no other way of dividing the day, than by dark and light, or time of sleeping and waking, nor the years, but by the time of sowing and reaping.

Their government.

THEIR government was still more rude and barbarous; every city, and almost every village or obscure town, was a petty tyranny, governed by a head, to whom nevertheless they gave the name of king. Hence that vast number of small inconsiderable kingdoms with which this country swarmed, and of the greatest part of which we know little else than their names, and that of one or sometimes two of their petty monarchs, which are occasionally mentioned in the history of those of more a note, into which they were afterwards blended either by alliances or conquest. Laws, at least a written body of them, we do not find they had till the times of the Athenian archons; till then all depended on the will and definitive sentence of their kings; only in dubious and important cases, it was usual for them to consult some oracle, of which they had variety; the two most famous were that of Jupiter at Dodona, and that of Apollo at Delphi, situated on the hill Parnassus (F).

Lacus.

THEIR

(F) It will doubtless be expected that we should say at least so much of these oracles, as may enable our readers to frame an idea of them, since they were esteemed of such concern, that scarce any public affairs were transacted (or hardly any private ones, if the persons were in circumstances to pay for it) without consulting some of them; but as a particular account of them all would carry us too far, we shall content ourselves with a short description of that of Delphi, as it was the most celebrated and frequented of any either in Greece or in any other part of the world, not only on account of its antiquity, contending even with that of Jupiter at Dodona, but because Apollo was supposed more peculiarly to preside over, and to inspire men with the knowledge of futurity. Upon this account also it was esteemed to outdo all others in the clearness and certainty of its answers; and by the great concourse of people who resorted to and enriched it with presents, it did likewise outshine all the rest in splendor and wealth.

Its foundation, origin, and magnificence, shall be seen in its proper place: here we shall content ourselves with a short account of the manner in which it was wont to be consulted and delivered, and by way of specimen to the rest; as for those of other countries, or other deities, the reader may, if he please, see them in our learned bishop Potter's Grecian archeology.

1st. Those who consulted the oracle, were to offer some considerable present to the god. 2^{dly}. They offered also some sacrifices to him, and according as these carried a good or bad omen, so the Pythonesis consented or refused to consult the deity. 3^{dly}. The question to be asked, was to be couched in as few words as possible. We omit some other circumstances of less moment, and which varied according to time and place, the quality of the persons consulting, and the nature of the question to be asked.

2. The time for consulting the oracle was only one month in the year, and that was in the spring; the seventh day of that month was called Apollo's birth-day, because originally the Pythonesis gave no answers but on that day, so that they came to thick to her, that they were forced to lengthen the time; in latter ages it came to be once a month (1).

3. The person who delivered the answer was to be a woman. They were originally to be virgins, but one of them having been deflowered, they came at length to make choice of women above fifty years of age, that in case the same misfortune should happen to them, their shame might be out of danger of being discovered by pregnancy. Yet even these are obliged to go appressed like virgins, but in a plain and homely dress, that they might give no temptation to their customers (2).

Pythia, the name that was given to the woman that delivered the oracle, is variously derived, by some, in memory of the serpent Pytho, killed by Apollo, by others otherwise; but most probably from Pytho, which was but another name for Delphi, the place where this oracle was given, as we shall see in the sequel of this history.

When all the previous ceremonies had been performed on the inquirer's part, this Pythia, having washed herself in the fountain Castalia at the foot of Parnassus, and shaken the laurel tree that grew by it, she crowned herself with a garland of those leaves, and sometimes also did eat some of them; and then ascended the celebrated Tripod or Tripos, and sitting down upon it, waited for the impulse of the god.

What kind of machine this wonderful Tripod was, is variously canvassed, and to as little purpose. Some take it to have been a brass pot filled with dust, through which a miraculous vapour was conveyed into the belly of the Pythonesis, and thence came out at her mouth; others say it was filled with pebbles, by the agitation of which she conceived the mind of the deity; others say that it was large enough for her to plunge herself into; but the most probable opinion is, that it was a table or seat on which she either leaned or sat (3).

It was called Tripod because it had three feet, alluding, according to some, to the three great celestial circles, viz. the two tropics, and the equinoctial line; but more probably, if they had any original meaning, from the three periods of time, past, present, and future. They had more than one of these Tripods. The most ancient of them was that which the people of that country caused to be set over the mouth of the miraculous cave, after they had found out its prophetic power. The next is said to have been wrought by Vulcan, and presented to Apollo by Pelops king of the Eleans; but the most famous one was that which the fishermen drew up with their nets, and being adjudged by the oracle to the worthiest of the seven wise men who flourished then in Greece, and through modesty refused by him, was dedicated to this Delphic Apollo. The two first appear to have been of brass, and the last was of gold; some think also there were likewise more than one Pythia at the same time, but without any good foundation (4); however, when she who officiated as such, had received the divine affatus in her belly, from whence she was called ελασπιμβος and ελασπιμπος, she began sometimes to swell, foam at the mouth, tear her hair and flesh, like one in the strongest phrensy, at other times her spirit moved her more gently. Sometimes the paroxysm has been so terrible, that it hath scared away the priests, as well as the consultants, and one of them is said to have died by the violence of it (5). Some add, that a dragon or serpent has been seen to return the answer from under the Tripod, and that the Pythia was once killed by him.

The answer was returned viva voce, and in hexameter, or heroic verse. Paulanias attributes this form of answering to the famed Phæmonoe the first Delphic Pythia. But the hymn of Beoz, a Delphic lady, attributes it to Olen, who with his Hyperboreans instituted this oracle, and changed their rustic prose into the smooth and heroic verse.

But though this oracle was the most famed for the clearness and truth of its answers, inasmuch that it was often applied to, to explain the more intricate ones of other places, yet was it not without its ambiguities, so as to be easily applicable to the event, let it fall which way it would. Herodotus gives us some instances of this kind of amphibolous answers given to Craesus, of which that unfortunate king, a munificent votary to the Delphic god, justly complains,

Religion.

THEIR religion was still worse than all the rest, being little else than a corruption, ^a if we may be allowed that word, of the Egyptian theology, brought thither at first by Cecrops an Egyptian exile, and founder of the Attic monarchy, who, according to Pausanias, did first introduce the worship of Jupiter in his new kingdom. Orpheus, Dedalus, and Melampus, went and fetched new supplies of Egyptic idolatry and superstition; and Greece was soon after furnished with a number of deities, suited to the taste of their brutal votaries, and with a sanction and precedent for every unsocial and unnatural vice. To this desperate and universal degeneracy of the Grecian nation it is, that we have ventured in a former note to ascribe in some measure all the fabulous accounts which the poets have given us concerning the birth, extraction, and extravagant exploits of those famous heroes, who bestowed so much pains ^b and time to reform and abolish it. Of this number were Minos, Hercules, Theseus, and many more, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, some of whom cleared the seas, others the land, of that pestilent race, and others, lastly, by wholesome laws, by the introduction of commerce, arts and sciences, laid the happy foundations for the politeness and grandeur, for which they were so justly famed in after-ages.

The chronology of this epoch.

flood, 910.
2089.

THIS fabulous epoch, as it includes all that the poets have sung, and historians recorded, concerning the foundation of all the ancient Grecian monarchies, the exploits of the Grecian heroes, their wars and other transactions from the end of the Trojan war and upwards, to the foundation of the Sicyonian kingdom, the most ancient of all; amounts to 905 years, that is from A. M. 1915. when Ægialeus is said to have ^c laid the foundation of his kingdom, to the destruction of Troy, A. M. 2820. (G)^d. But as under this period are contained the history of the several following monarchies; 1st, That of Sicyon above-mentioned: 2. Of Argos and Mycena: 3. Attica: 4. Bœotia: 5. Arcadia: 6. Thessaly: 7. Corinth: 8. Sparta, and some others, from their foundation to their either becoming incorporate with others, or to their severally resolving themselves into commonwealths; this last circumstance will oblige us both to extend it beyond what is properly called the fabulous and heroic epocha, down to the times of their respective change of government, and to give a fuller chronology of each kingdom under each distinct head.

OTHER material transactions under this period are chiefly those that follow, the ^d Ogygian and Deucalion floods; the murder committed by the daughters of Danaus on their husbands; the labours of Hercules; the unfortunate adventures of Oedipus; the complains, as having more than once or twice mislaid him to his ruin (6).

The reader may see a number of other instances of the same nature in Pausanias (7), besides those which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel, and which, though fulfilled contrary to the meaning and expectation of the consulters, yet seemed to be directed by some foreseeing being, because they still answered the prediſtion, though in a different sense. Of this nature was that which forewarned Epaminondas to beware of what the Greeks called the Pelagos; by which he, understanding it to mean the sea, which they called παραγος, forbore to go into any ship or galley, whereas it was the Mantinean wood of that name, of which the oracle bid him beware. Much after the same nature is the Carthaginian general said to have been deceived, when he was told by another oracle, that he should be buried in Libya; from which he concluded, that after having beaten the Romans he should return and die in his own country, whereas the oracle meant the town of Libyssa in Bœotia, but according to our author called by the Nicomædians Libya, in which he died.

It was for this reason that these prediſtions, attributed by the Heathens to some godhead, were by the primitive fathers ascribed to the devil, who, though incapable to dive into futurity, yet could give a greater guess into it than any mortal; but we leave the disquisition of such questions to divines, as well as the times and causes of these oracles ceasing in the heathen world, though this last we may perhaps touch upon, when we come to resume the sequel of the Jewish history.

(G) We need not tell our readers that this chronology is far enough from being unquestionable; those who have read Sir Isaac Newton on this subject, will easily agree with him, that the reigns of the several kings of Sicyon, Argos, &c. are spun out to an unnatural length, they amounting one with another to thirty-five and forty years apiece, which is almost double the time that those of Judah and Israel reigned.

It is also not unlikely that the foundation of the Sicyonian kingdom is vastly antedated, and that the eleven or twelve kings whom they pretend to have reigned between Apis and Epapheus, or Epopeus, whom our author thinks to have been two names for the same person, were only feigned, and interlarded here, to add the greater antiquity to that kingdom. We are told that it began 232 years before the time of Inachus, or 1313 years before the first Olympiad (8); but what certainty can there be in a tradition of such a length.

The same fault may be supposed to run through the whole chronology of the other kingdoms belonging to this epoch, since their foundation is likewise previous to the Olympiads, before which all computation of time is dark, precarious, and in many instances notoriously false.

The history of the ancient kingdom of SICYON.

^a SICYON has the first place in this dark province of antiquity, both as being older than all the rest, and because it boasts a succession of twenty-six kings, whose several reigns make up an epoch of nine hundred and sixty years and upwards. Its original name was Ægiala, given to it by Ægialeus, the supposed founder ^{Namer.} and first monarch of it. Whether the whole kingdom, or only its metropolis, were called by that name, is not certain; but it exchanged it afterwards for that of Apia, from Apis the fourth king from Ægialeus, and in process of time it had that of Sicyon given to it, which was that of their 19th monarch, who reigned about 740 years after its supposed foundation, and from that time, not only the kingdom, but the whole peninsula of Peloponnesus was called Sicyonia until its dissolution, and

THIS little kingdom was situate on the north part of Peloponnesus, since called ^{Situation:} the bay of Corinth. It had the province of Achaia on the west, and the Isthmus which joins the peninsula to the continent of Greece on the east. What its extent was cannot be known. The capital of it is supposed to have been situate upon the river Asopus in about thirty-eight degrees and a half of north latitude, and twenty-three degrees and a half of east longitude, having the bay of Corinth on the north, the rest of the Peloponnesus on the other three points^b.

Its territory is rich, abounding with corn, vines, olive-trees, and other commodities, besides some iron mines. It was in process of time very much adorned by ^{Natural and artificial rav-}

^c Sicyon and his successors, with temples, altars, monuments, and statues of all their gods and ancient monarchs. It would be justly esteemed the ancientest monarchy in the world, not excepting even those of Egypt and Assyria, were it true, that its founder lived about 150 years after the flood, that is, about 200 years before Noah's death, as some have computed it from Eusebius, who affirms this monarchy to have been founded 1313 years before the first olympiad^c. But that mistake has been

^d rectified by other chronologers, who make him cotemporary with Terah, Abraham's father, and to have began his reign about the year of the world 1915, or even later about A. M. 1236^d, which brings it somewhat lower than the year of the flood 900; besides it is not improbable, as Sir Isaac Newton observes, that chronologers ^{Chronology.} have split Apis Epaphus (the 4th in descent from Ægialeus) into two kings, and between them, have inserted eleven or twelve feigned names of kings who did nothing, and thereby have made its founder Ægialeus 300 years older than his brother Phoroneus^e (the son of Inachus, and founder of Phoronium, since called Argos.) The truth is, we know nothing of those princes, but their names, and the years they are affirmed to have reigned. The same indeed may be said of the greatest part of their successors. We meet with no memorable action or conquest performed by any of them during the long space of 960 years; though this epocha, dark and remote as it is, is so fruitful of the most surprizing exploits in most other cotemporary kingdoms. However we shall here subjoin a list of those twenty-six monarchs, ^e with the length of their reigns, as we find it transmitted to us.

In all Years 962

THERE is little else to be found in history worth notice concerning these monarchs, besides what we hinted above. Those that are the most remarkable in the list are, 1. Ægialeus the founder; 2. Apis from whom the country was called Apia; 3. Ægirus, the supposed founder of the ancient city of Ægira, situate on a high and almost inaccessible hill; once the capital of Achaia, properly so called, and now supposed to be the small village of Hylcastro; 4. Maratbon, of whom the famous fields of Marathon had probably their name. Epopæus, who built a stately temple to Minerva, and adorned it with his own trophies; 5. Sicyon from whom the whole country and peninsula took the name of Sicyonia. He is likewise supposed to have either built or at least enlarged the metropolis of the kingdom, and to have called it by his own name.

AFTER the death of Zeuxippus the last king in the list, that estate is said to have been governed by the priests of Apollo Carneus, five of whom held the sovereignty only during one year each; after which Amphyktion held it nine years successively, and Cbaridemus the last of them continued in it eighteen years^d. After this hierarchy had lasted thirty-two years the Heraclidæ, who were by that time returned into Peloponnesus, became masters of it, or, according to Pausanias, the kingdom was incorporated with the Dores, and became subject to that of Argos^e, the next ancient kingdom to that of Sicyon.

S E C T. III.

The history of the ancient kingdom of ARGOS.

WE have already hinted in the last section, that not the kingdom only of Sicyon,^a but the whole Peloponnesus was called Ægiala and Apia from the first and fourth kings of it. There were likewise two kings of the same name in Argos; the one the younger son of Inachus the founder of the kingdom, and the other the son of Phornutus the elder brother of Ægialeus^b. Hence these two have been confounded with those of Sicyon, and their kingdom thought to have been of as ancient, if not of older date than the Sicyonian, and the country to have received their name not from the Sicyonian, but from the Argivic monarch. In so dark a dispute we can only say, that the Argivic Ægialeus being only a younger brother, and it not appearing that he reigned at all there, seeing his brother Phornutus left the kingdom to his own son, it is not so likely that the country should receive its name from him, as from that of Sicyon. However^b the kingdom soon changed its name for that of Argolis, from Argos the son of Jupiter by Niobe, who was sister to Apis, upon whom the kingdom devolved, because Apis died without issue. It was also called Hippim and Hippoboton, from the neighbouring pastures, in which Neptune is said to have fed his horses^c, or rather from an excellent breed of horses, which that country was famed for.

a THIS kingdom is situate on the north-east side of Peloponnesus, surrounded on the east by the two bays of Saron, now Golfo de Neapoli, and of Argos, and has the kingdom of Sicyon or Acbaia Propria and Arcadia on the north and west, and that of Laconia on the south. What its ancient limits were is hard to say; but it was very much enlarged by some of its monarchs, so that it extended itself from east to west from 23 deg. 40 min. east longitude, or about seventy miles, and north and south from 37 deg. and a half to 38 deg. 20 min. north latitude, or about fifty miles.

Situation and extent.

ITS chief river is the Inachus, so called from the founder of this kingdom. It empties its self into the bay of Argos, now called Golfo de Engia near the port Asine.

Natural and artificial rarities.

b On this river was situate the metropolis, called also Inachus from its founder and fourth monarch, and famous among other things, for the death of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who having forced an entrance into it, was knocked on the head with a tile flung by an old woman from the top of a house. Here was also the brazen tower, into which Danae, being confined by her father, was defloured by Jupiter. It was likewise much enriched by its trade, and particularly that of a fine breed of horses bred about its territory, from which the name of Hippium was given to it. 2. Next to Argos was Mycena, which became in process of time the seat of the kingdom, and is celebrated by Horace for her riches, as her rival Argos was for her horses. 3. Træzen, once the royal seat of Pittheus, the grandfather of Theseus. 4. Nemea, famous for the Nemean games, supposed to have been instituted there in memory of Hercules's killing a lion which infested that neighbourhood; or, as others will have it, in memory of the son of Lycurgus king of the country about Nemea, who had been killed by a serpent, whilst his nurse Hyfistyle went to shew the Argivi to a spring of water. We shall have occasion to speak more fully of this adventure in the sequel. 5. Epidaurus, in which stood the so famed temple of Æsculapius, resorted to from most parts of Europe and Asia for the cure of all distempers. 6. Nauplia, so called from its founder Nauplius king of Ebena, and for its excellent situation and harbour, whence it had the name of Nauplia Navale, now Neapolis, from which the gulf on which it is situate hath its modern name^a.

d THE government of Argos, and afterwards of Mycena, continued altogether monarchical from its first foundation to its establishing itself into a downright democracy. Pausanias indeed observes, that the Argives were extremely jealous of their liberties, and were ever endeavouring to encroach upon the royal prerogative. However, they did not wholly clip it till after a long succession of princes; the Heraclidæ, who were of the family of Perseus, recovered the kingdom from that of Pelops, about eighty years after the taking of Troy, or about forty years before its becoming a commonwealth; for it was during that space that they gained so much ground upon their kings, that they left them little else than the bare name; but by what laws they were anciently governed, or by whom they were enacted, and how far these monarchs were tied by them, is what we will not venture to say.

Government.

e THIS kingdom Eusebius tells us out of Castor^c, was founded 1080 years before the first olympiad, that is, according to Usher, in the year of the world 2148, so that Inachus the founder of it was cotemporary with Abraham, and with Thurimachus the 7th king of Sicyon. It continued under the name of the Argolic kingdom till the reign of Acrisius the 14th king of it, who transferred the seat of it to Mycena, a city of his own founding, about the year of the world 2700, and about the year 550 of its foundation, from which time that part of it continued to be called the kingdom of Mycena till the dissolution which happened about the year 2920, when the Heraclidæ made themselves masters again both of this and of the whole peninsula, after it had stood upwards of 77 years, and under the government of twenty-one monarchs. The Argolic kingdom, properly so called, retained likewise its own kings after this division, until the Heraclidæ, whose family had been set aside by that of Euristheus the implacable enemy of Hercules and all his race, above an age before. These dividing the peninsula into three kingdoms, that of Argos had not continued above forty years, before Melias their last king, having made a push to recover the royal prerogative, which was dwindled by that time to the lowest pitch, lost both his kingdom and life, after which the Argivic government was changed into a democracy.

Inachus.

1. Inachus, the supposed son of Oceanus and Tethys (A), is affirmed to have been the founder of this kingdom. He married his sister Melissa, by whom he had two sons, Phoroneus and Ægialeus: he is supposed to be the father of Io, and therefore the Greeks are sometimes called from him Inachi.

Phoroneus.

2. Phoroneus succeeded his father, enlarged his territories, and gathered the people who were before dispersed about the country into one city, which was called from him Phoronium[†]; he is said to have had a son by the nymph Laodice, named Apis, and a daughter named Niobe, who became the first paramour of the lustful god Jupiter, by whom she had a son named Argos. From Phoroneus, his supposed sister Io is sometimes called Phoronis by the poets[‡].

Apis.

3. Apis succeeded his father, but governing too tyrannically, a faction was formed against him, which was upheld by Thekim or Thekion king of Sicyon (B), to whose treachery he was sacrificed. Some affirm that he fled into Egypt, where he taught that people the manuring of land, upon which account he was worshipped under the title of Serapis, and in the form of an ox. We have already observed in the history of that kingdom[†], that Serapis was worshipped under a human form, bearing a bushel on its head. As for their Apis, though he was indeed worshipped under the form of an ox, yet it doth not appear that he was of Argolic extraction. We meet with several of the name, one in Sicyon, one in Argos, and this in Egypt; all of them so confounded by Mythologists, that we can gather nothing certain concerning them.

Argos.

4. Argos, the son of Jupiter and Niobe, succeeded him; he is supposed to have been the founder of the capital city, and to have called it, and the whole kingdom, by his name[‡]. He is said to have been a promoter of agriculture, altogether neglected

(A) Or rather because he came thither by sea. We have had occasion in a former chapter to take notice of this extravagant vanity in the descendants of those first founders of kingdoms, of raising them such fabulous genealogies, in order to disguise the obscurity of their origin, by ascribing it to some god, to the sea, rivers, nymphs, and such like extraordinary progenitors. We shall refer the reader to the caution we gave them there concerning these miraculous offsprings[†].

(B) This shews how little dependance there is in the writings of this epocha, since even this last reigned, according to Eusebius's chronology, near 100 years before Inachus the founder of the Argolic kingdom, unless they have mistook him for Peratus, who flourished about the latter end of Apis's reign.

a by the Grecians before his reign, who came from that time to be called Argivi from him.

5. Criafus, by others called Peirafus the son of Argos. Criafus.

6. Pborbas the son of Criafus, supposed to have been cotemporary with Atlas and Phorbas. Prometheus.

7. Triopas the son of Pborbas, whose brother, named also Pborbas, settled himself Triopas. in the island of Rhodes.

8. Crotopus, in whose times the Argives felt the dire effects of Apollo's anger on the following occasion, that God had had a private amour with Psamathe the king's daughter; and she to conceal the fruit of it from her father, went and hid it among the rushes, Crotopus. where it was devoured by the king's hounds. Apollo, to punish the Argives for this crime, sent the monster, or fury Pene, who snatched their children from their mother's bosom, and destroyed them. This monster being killed at length by Cerebus, Apollo sent them a grievous pestilence. Cerebus having consulted the oracle how his anger might be appeased, was forbid to return to Argos, and directed to take a tripod in his hand, and to build a temple to that god where-ever it chanced to drop from him, which he accordingly did.

9. Sibnelus, son of Crotopus, reigned sixteen years, after which he, or as others Sibnelus. think, his son Geleanor, was routed the kingdom by Danaus an Egyptian.

10. Danaus had been driven out of Egypt by his brother Egyptus, for refusing Sibnelus. to marry his fifty daughters to the fifty sons of his brother. His pretence for refusing the marriage was, that he had been forewarned by the oracle, that he should be killed by a son-in-law. Being therefore expelled Egypt, he came to Argos, where he laid claim to that kingdom, as being descended from Epaphus the son of Io, who, as was hinted above, was the daughter of Inachus. Both he and Sibnelus agreed to have their title decided by the people, and upon the second meeting of the assembly, a wolf came and killed a bull, who was grazing among a herd of cows, under the very walls of the city. The people who beheld it, took it for a fatal omen against the present possessor. Sibnelus was supposed to be meant by the bull, and Danaus by the wolf, because he was a stranger. Upon this he was immediately proclaimed king¹.

As soon as Egyptus heard of this election, he resolved to prevent his marrying his fifty daughters to neighbouring princes, and strengthening himself by so many alliances against him. He raised a powerful army, and sent it with his fifty sons at the head of it, against the new king of Argos; and these reduced him to such extremity, that he was forced to grant them his daughters in marriage. But he had taken care to make them promise to stab their husbands on the very first night of their nuptials, which they all punctually performed, except one named Hypermetra, who privately conveyed her bridegroom Lyceus to Lyrcea, a town not far from the metropolis. Danaus was no sooner apprised of her disobedience, than he Sibnelus. would have put her to death for it; but she was honourably acquitted by the more humane Argives, was again received into favour, and Lyceus declared his heir and successor. As for his other forty-nine daughters, they are feigned to have been condemned to an endless punishment in hell for their inhuman treachery, being forced to draw out water with buckets, bored with innumerable holes, and never to be filled (C).

11. Lyceus, the son of Egyptus, expelled his father-in-law out of his kingdom, Lyceus. and reigned in his stead. In commemoration of his wife's having saved his life, and of the Argives having acquitted her, they dedicated a statue to Venus, and the Argives instituted a feast in memory of the signal Hypermetra had given to her husband of his being out of danger, and called it the feast of Flambeaus.

12. Abas was the son of Lyceus and Hypermetra, and father of Prætus and Acri- Abas. Abas, by Ocalia the daughter of Mantineus. These two sons, who were twins, are

(C) This fable, some mythologists interpret of their being doomed to fill the cisterns of the citadel, which Danaus built at Argos, with water, and probably also those of the city, which, according to the description an ancient geographer gives us of it (1), seems to have wanted a considerable supply of that element. For though it be built upon the river Inachus, yet by reason of its nearness to the gulf, it is more than probable, that the waters of it were too brackish to be drank.

said to have struggled together in their mother's womb, a sure presage of that more a fatal struggle they had for the kingdom when they came to manhood. They are reported to have been the two first who made use of targets in the battles they fought against each other *.

Prætus.

13. Prætus found means to step first upon the throne, and held it about seventeen years. It was in some part of this time, that Bellerophon king of Corinth, having committed manslaughter, came to Argos to be expiated by Prætus, whose queen Stenobæa being charmed with the beauty of that prince, solicited him often in vain to an unlawful commerce; and at length, to be revenged of his continency, did privately accuse him to her husband of having attempted her chastity. Prætus, not suspecting the truth of the accusation, sent immediately the young Corinthian prince b to his father-in-law Jobates, with letters, in which he desired him to make away with the innocent stranger. Jobates sent him upon several dangerous expeditions, from which, notwithstanding, Bellerophon came off victorious, as we shall see when we come to speak of the kings of *Corinth*¹. In the mean time Prætus met with something to turn his thoughts another way; his kingdom was invaded by his brother Acrisius, who proving too strong for him, forced him to fly to his father-in-law Jobates king of Lycia. These two soon returned into Argos with an army, took the city of Tyrias, and obliged Acrisius to agree to a treaty, by which Prætus had Tyris, and other maritime, and Acrisius, Argos, and the inland towns². Prætus had forty-three daughters by his wife Stenobæa, or, as she is called by Homer, Antea; c and they with the rest of the women of that country, were seized with a distemper which they called the fury of Bacchus; but were cured by an excellent physician and soothsayer, who had one of the daughters given him in marriage, with a third part of the kingdom as a reward for his skill. Melampus, that was the physician's name, obtained another daughter, and another third of the kingdom for his brother Bias; but Prætus had soon after this partition, a son named Megapenthes, who succeeded him in the other third called Tyris; but it is likely that these three were again reunited, and made a new kingdom of Argos after the death of those philosophers, as we shall see after we have ended the history of the kings of Mycenæ, whose part from that time makes the most considerable figure.

Acrisius king of Mycenæ.

14. Acrisius on the other hand, had a daughter by his wife Eurydice, called Danaë, d and had been forewarned by the oracle, that she would have a son, by whom he should be killed. To prevent therefore that young princess having any conversation with mankind, he caused her to be close confined in a strong brazen tower, and under such strict watch, that she might in all likelihood have been out of danger of fulfilling the oracle, had not Jupiter melted himself, as the poets feign, into a golden shower, which sliding through the tiles into her lap, eluded all her father's caution (D) *.

THE fruit of these stolen embraces was Perseus, who was no sooner born, than Acrisius ordered him and his mother to be put into a chest, and thrown into the e sea; but Jupiter took care to convey them safe to Seriphus, where Diclys the brother of Polydectes king of that island, brought Perseus up as his own son. By that time he was grown up, the king was fallen in love with his mother, and would have offered violence to her, had not her son prevented it. The king, highly provoked at this opposition, and resolved to be at once revenged and rid of him, sent him into Africa to fetch the famous Gorgon, Medusa's head, not doubting but the attempt would cost him his life. But to his surprise he saw the young prince return with the Gorgon (E), and crowned with a two-fold success, having in that expedition saved An-

(D) This golden shower seems to have been only some considerable bribe to those who guarded the tower. Some think that it was her uncle Prætus who found means to corrupt them, and to get admittance to her.

(E) It is not improbable, that, according to the account an ancient writer gives us (2) of this expedition, Medusa had succeeded her father Phegeus in his kingdom, which was situate along the lake Tri-

tanis, and that she was a Virago, who, for want of other employment, was much used to hunting, and to fight with her African subjects; and that Perseus coming upon her in the dead of the night with the choicest forces of Peloponnesus, surprised and beheaded her, and carried her head away into Groves, to be admired for its extraordinary beauty (3). The reader may see what has been said of it by the judicious author last quoted.

- a dromeda, the daughter of Cepheus king of Joppe, a maritime town in Phœnicia, from being devoured by a whale (F); in recompence of which service, she was given to him in marriage.

AT his return into Scriphus, he thought on nothing but how to be revenged on the lustful and inhospitable king. Here he found that his mother and Diſtys had been forced to run into a sanctuary, to skreen themselves from his brutish violence, and, as the fable goes on, having turned him and all his accomplices into stones at the sight of the Gorgon, set up Diſtys upon the throne. From thence he went with his mother Danae, and his wife Andromeda, into Agros; but Acrisius, frightened at the news of his being alive, and having performed such noble exploits, had retired b into Larissa, a city of Pelasgia, situate on the river Peneus, whose king of Tantalus having soon after caused some funeral games to be celebrated in honour of his deceased father; Perseus came thither among a great concourse of Grecian princes, and by an unfortunate cast of the disk (G) which fell upon Acrisius's foot, who was there present, killed him, and unwillingly fulfilled the oracle upon him*.

15. Perseus, though next heir to the kingdom of Argos, in right of Danae his Perseus mother, yet chose to exchange it with his cousin Megapenthes for that small one of Tyrins which had been left to him by his father Prætus, rather than to return to Argos, after this unhappy death of his grandfather. Some affirm that Perseus restored his grandfather to his throne, after he had been driven out of it by his brother; but that is inconsistent with their dividing the kingdom by treaty. However, after this exchange
c with Megapenthes, Perseus went and built the city of Mycena, and made it the seat of the kingdom. That of Argos was therefore said to have been translated thither, because this new metropolis became in a short time more populous and opulent than the other. After Acrisius's death, the kingdom being thus divided into several pieces, and among different families, Perseus having reigned about eighteen years in that of Tyrins, left it to his son Alceus, and he to Amphitryon, by whose wife Alcmena, Jupiter is said to have begot Hercules, and to have lengthened that amorous night as long as three, to add the more strength to the child†. In the mean time Amphitryon having unawares killed Electryon, who was both his uncle and father-in-law, was
d forced to fly to Thebes. Here the child Hercules began to give such early proofs of his courage, extraordinary strength and fierceness, that he was sent to be brought up among some shepherds, where he killed a lion before he was eighteen years of age (G)‡.

16. Euryſtheus the son of Sibenelus, who was come to the crown of Mycena, or, Euryſtheus as others have it, succeeded his father, began to look upon that young hero with a jealous eye. His title to the crown, as being the reputed son of Amphitryon his cousin german, made him fear, lest he should in time find means to dispossess him of it. His fear and hatred of him soon grew to such a height, that he left no way untried to be rid of him. Hercules, who was not insensible of it, because he
e was ever engaging him upon some desperate expedition; went to consult the oracle, and being answered that it was the pleasure of the gods that he should serve Euryſtheus twelve years, was cast into so deep a melancholy, that it turned at length into a furious madness, during which, among other desperate deeds, he put away his wife

(G) The disk was a round piece of iron, lead, brass, or stone, with a hole in the middle, with which the gamesters used to exercise their strength and skill. He who could throw it farthest won the prize (5).

(H) We have already observed, that there were many fabulous heroes of this name. Diodorus and Ensebius mention three: Diodorus ascribes all these fabulous actions to the youngest, who was the son of Alcmena (6). Servius speaks of four, and Varro of forty-four; but the most remarkable of these are the six mentioned by Tully: as follows (7):

The first, begot by the most ancient Jupiter and Lysito, who contended with Apollo for the tripod.

The second the son of Nile, and an Egyptian, was the inventor of the Phrygian characters.

The third was a native of Crete (and the son of the Celtic Jupiter): he was one of the Idæi Dædylis, or Curetes of mount Ida.

The fourth was the son of the second Jupiter, and Asteria, sister to Latona, and father of Carthage; he was worshipped by the Tyrrians.

The fifth was the Indian Belus. And

The sixth was this Hercules the supposed son of Amphitryon, but begot by the third Jupiter upon Alcmena.

Megara,

Megara, and murdered all the children he had had by her, which are supposed to have been twelve, because the king imposed the same number of labours upon him as an expiation for their murder, after he had recovered his senses *. These labours being for the most part fabulous, and some of them, as we have observed more than once, being probably stolen from the history of Sampson and other Hebrew worthies, we shall give them in the margin, that they may not interrupt the thread of our history of this kingdom, with which but few of them have an immediate connexion (I).

Atreus.

17. Atreus the son of Pelops, and grandson of Tantalus king of Lydia, ascended the throne of Mycena, after the death of Eurystheus, who left no issue. As for the line of Perseus it only subsisted in Hercules. Atreus is always joined with his brother Thyestes as partner of the kingdom. These two are justly branded, the one for his incest, and the other for his horrid murders. Thyestes for defiling his brother's wife; and Atreus for murdering his sons, and feasting him with their flesh (K).

It was in his reign that the Heraclidae, for so were called the sons and descendants of Hercules, came under the conduct of their champion Hyllus the son of Hercules, and claimed the kingdom of Mycena, from which they had been driven by Eurystheus. The controversy was to be decided by single combat, and under these conditions, that if Hyllus killed Eubermus, who had undertook to be champion for Atreus, then this last should relinquish his kingdom to the Heraclidae; and if Hyllus was killed, they were to depart immediately, and not return into Peloponnesus till fifty years were expired. It happened that Hyllus was killed by his antagonist, so that Atreus obliged them to leave the kingdom. Some of the Heraclidae went to Tricorintus, and others to Dorus, to whose father Hercules had left the region of Hestieotis in trust for them, and demanded it of him, upon which they were incorporated with the Dores. Their grandmother Alcmena disappearing about this time, as she was returning to Thebes, had divine honours instituted and paid to her *. Atreus was soon after their departure killed by Aegyptus, and succeeded by his own son,

(I) The first labour imposed upon him was the killing of a lion in Nemea a wood of Achaia; whose hide was proof against any weapon, so that he was forced to seize him by the throat, and strangle him; in memory of which he afterwards wore his skin about his shoulders.

In the second he killed the Hydra, a monster with two heads, one of which was no sooner cut off, than two sprung up in its room.

In the third he brought the Erymanthian boar alive upon his shoulders, at the sight of which the king is said to have been so frightened, that he ran and hid himself in a brazen hoghead. It was likewise in this expedition that he overcame the famous centaurs (8).

In his fourth he caught a hart with golden horns, and of prodigious swiftness.

In his fifth labour he was commanded to cleanse Auger's stable in one day, which he did by turning the river Alpheus into it.

In the sixth he chased away the mischievous birds of the lake Stymphalis, who are feigned to have lived upon human flesh, and to have been at length destroyed by Hercules's arrows, or according to others to have been only scared away from thence (9).

His seventh was to fetch a famous bull from the isle of Crete, with which Pasiphe the wife of Minos is said to have fallen in love. In this expedition, having helped Jupiter to overcome the Titanick giants, he reconciled Prometheus to him, and loosed him from mount Caucasus.

The eighth was to fetch the mares of Diomedes out of Thrace, which were tied with iron chains to brazen mangers, and were fed with the flesh of the strangers that passed by that way. Hercules first threw their inhuman master to be devoured by them, and then brought the mules to Eurystheus, who dedicated them to Juno. Their breed is said to have continued till Alexander's time. Betwixt this and his next task he is supposed to have gone upon the Argonautic expedition, of which we shall speak in due time.

In the ninth he fetched away the girdle of the queen of the Amazons; and

In the tenth the oxen of Geryon out of Iberia or Spain, in the furthest parts of which he erected his two pillars, as the utmost limits of the then-known world. These ten labours he achieved, as the fable says, in a little above eight years. In this expedition he is likewise affirmed to have killed Anteus, a famous giant of a monstrous size, who when weary with wrestling or labour, was immediately refreshed by touching the earth. Pliny makes him the founder of Tangier. Hercules overcame him in wrestling, and slew him; and after him the tyrant Busiris in his way through Egypt. This bloody man used to sacrifice all his guests and strangers upon his altars, and designing to have done the same by Hercules, was slain by him, together with all his attendants.

His two last tasks were fetching Cerberus out of hell, and the Hesperian golden apples, kept by a dragon, which last is interpreted to have been some fine herd of cattle kept by some stout man, and brought out of Africa to the king. As to his other exploits they will be mentioned in their proper place.

(K) The poets feign that the sun went back at the sight of this horrid feast. As for Thyestes, he went to consult Apollo how he might be revenged on his brother, and was answered, that if he would lie with his own daughter Pelopia, he would beget a son that should murder both Atreus and his son Agamemnon. He did so, and Aegisthus, the fruit of this second incest, fulfilled the prophecy.

a 18. Agamemnon, who was reckoned at that time the wealthiest and most powerful potentate in all Greece. His dominion extended not only through a considerable part of Peloponnesus, but also to several neighbouring islands. So that having a larger fleet, a greater number of sea-ports, his commerce and revenue exceeded that of his cotemporary kings. This was the main reason of his being chosen general of the Trojan expedition for the recovery of Hellena, his brother Menelaus's wife.

THE success of that expedition, the sacrifice of Iphigenia, and other circumstances relating to this prince, have been seen in a former chapter †. After the taking of that city, besides several other jars which happened between the allied monarchs, about the parting of the booty, the disposition of their Forces, and the like, a fatal
b quarrel arose between Agamemnon and his brother. The latter was for sailing homewards out of hand, and the other for staying to sacrifice to Minerva. The consequence was, that they parted in great anger. Agamemnon having weathered several storms, which the goddess Pallas, as the poets feign, had sent both to him and his confederates during their return homewards; arrived at last at Mycena, where he was murdered by his cousin german Egistbus, and his wife Clytemnestra, who during his absence had contracted an unlawful amour together.

19. Egistbus was the son of Thyestes, begot on his daughter Pelopia, by the Egistbus advice of the oracle mentioned in the last note. His mother, to conceal the foulness of her pregnancy, exposed him in the woods, where a shepherd finding him, c nursed him with goats milk, from which he was called Egistbus. The unlawful commerce he had afterwards with Clytemnestra, during Agamemnon's absence, made them both fear lest they should fall a sacrifice to the resentment of that prince; and the oracle had pronounced him the murderer of both him and his father. The two guilty lovers were therefore soon determined to the fact, and having murdered Agamemnon seized upon the kingdom and held it about ten years, but both he and his paramour were at length murdered by Orestes Agamemnon's son.

20. Orestes, who was but a child when his father was killed, had been privately Orestes conveyed to Strophias in Phocis by Electra his father's sister; but as soon as he was come to riper years, he returned to Mycena, and having murdered the usurper, and d his own mother, took possession of the kingdom, and of that of Argos, whose throne was become in a manner vacant by the flight of Diomedes into Italy, after his return from the siege of Troy. The occasion of this flight we shall see in the sequel of the remaining kings of Argos, after its being parted from that of Mycena. Orestes ran raving mad soon after at the guilt of his parricide, or, as the poets feigned, was tormented for it by the furies. Being again restored to his senses, and vexed to find that Hermione his uncle Menelaus's daughter, whom her grandfather Tyndareus had promised to him in marriage, had been espoused to Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, he went and killed him in the temple of Apollo at Delfos, and married Hermione, by whom he got also the kingdom of Sparta *.

e WITH Orestes we may mention here his faithful and constant friend Pylades the son of Strophias, with whom he had been brought up. These two are famed for having been so like each other in face, shape, temper, and affection, that they seemed to have had but one soul, and were not to be distinguished from one another. Inasmuch that when Thoas king of Taurica, would have put Orestes to death, they both affirming to be the same person, and both ready to die each for his friend, the king could not possibly find out which was the right person, but admired their extraordinary friendship, which was indeed such, that it passed into a proverb.

21. Pentibius, or according to others Tisamenus, succeeded his father Orestes in both Pentibius kingdoms; but in less than three years, he was killed in a battle which he fought
f against the Achei, whom he had driven from Argos and Mycena, and had reduced to the necessity of driving the Ionians out of Aegialia into Attica. After his death the Heracidae, who had already got the greatest part of Peloponnesus, made themselves masters of these two kingdoms also, which they held until the conquest of that peninsula by the Macedonians.

AFTER the parting of the kingdoms of Mycena and Argos, and of the latter into three parts, as we have seen above; we find Adrastus the son of Talaon and Eurynome reigning in Argos, and descended from Perseus. This valiant prince married his two daughters, the one to Polynices prince of Thebes, and the other to Tydeus, † See before, Vol. II. p. 318. & seq.

upon the following accident. These two princes were come to Argos, the former ^a to beg the king's assistance against his brother Etocles, who had deprived him of his yearly share in the government, and the latter was fled thither from Calydenia for manslaughter. These two happened to have a squabble in some of the out-buildings of the palace, which alarmed Adrastus, and forced him to come and enquire the occasion of the disturbance. He had been formerly advised by the oracle to give his two daughters, the one to a lion, the other to a boar, and had been doubtless very much puzzled to find out the meaning of it; but at his coming out, he found, to his joy and surprize, an agreeable solution of it. Polynices bore a lion, and Tydeus a boar upon his shield, upon which he immediately gave his daughters Argia to the former, and Deipyle to the latter, whose son succeeded him afterwards in the kingdom. ^b

Soon after this, being resolved to assist Polynices, he raised a good army, and procured the best commanders he could to accompany him. Among these was one Amphiaræus a good officer and great soothsayer, whom he had in vain attempted to gain, till Polynices bethought himself of the following stratagem. They offered to make his wife Eriphyle umpire whether he should go or not, and having bribed her beforehand with a costly bracelet, she decided in the affirmative; upon which Amphiaræus, who foresaw that none of the chief officers would escape except the king, and thinking on nothing but how to be revenged on his faithless wife, left strict charge with his two sons, before he departed, that as soon as they were come of age, they should kill her, and make war against the king of Thebes. ^c

Adrastus marching with his army through the wood of Nemea, met with a woman carrying a child in her arms. This was the unfortunate Daughter of Thoas king of Lemnos, whom she had saved, when the rest of the Lemnian women had killed by one consent all the males of that island, with intent to turn Amazons. For this her filial piety, they had sold her to pirates, who brought her to Lycurgus king of the country about Nemea, whose son Archemorus, or as others call him Opbeltes, she was nursing, and had then in her arms. The Argives desired her to direct them to some water, and she laying down the boy went to shew them a fountain. At her return, finding that the child had been killed by a serpent, she went and hid herself for fear of her master's anger, and Amphiaræus sent her sons word soon after where their ^d mother was. The Argives killed the serpent, and in memory of the dead child, they are said to have instituted the games called Nemean, in which Adrastus won the race by the swiftness of his horse Arion. Tydeus got the prize at whorlbats, Polynices at wrestling, Amphiaræus at running and quoits, Partenopæus at shooting, and Laodicus at darting.

FROM the Nemean woods they went and encamped at the foot of Cithæron, a famed hill among the poets, among other things for the infamous revels which the priestesses of Bacchus, to whom the hill was consecrated, used to keep there. Here they sent Tydeus to Thebes, to demand of Etocles the performance of the contract between Polynices and him. Upon his refusal, Tydeus, desirous partly to shew his own courage, ^e and partly to try that of the Thebans, gave several challenges to their most noted champions, in which he still came off conqueror. The Thebans, envious of his success, sent fifty of their choicest men to way-lay him in his return to Cithæron, who were all killed except one, whom he sent back to Thebes, to acquaint Etocles with his courage and success. The Argives on the other hand hearing what had passed, resolved upon the siege of the city; the ill success of which we shall see in its proper place. All that needs be said here is, that Adrastus owed his escape to the swiftness of his horse, and Amphiaræus is said to have been swallowed up alive by the earth, together with his chariot and horses near the river Ismene, or perhaps drowned all together in that river. The other five generals did likewise lose their lives, so that it proved ^f even as Amphiaræus had foreseen, that Adrastus alone should survive that expedition; and even he was forced to take refuge at the altar of mercy of the Atbenians, and to beg their assistance, that the Argives might at least be enabled to recover the dead bodies of his soldiers and subjects, which the Thebans refused to deliver up. The Atbenians readily granted his request, and forced the Thebans into a compliance with it, after which we hear no more of him.

a HE was succeeded by his son Ægialeus, who about ten years after the defeat before Thebes, entered into a confederacy with Diomedes the son of his brother-in-law Tydeus, and with the five sons of the other generals who had lost their lives in that expedition, to revenge their deaths upon the Thebans, and if possible to level that city with the ground. Thence these seven captains were called Epigoni. The oracle being consulted, promised them success provided they chose Alcmaeon the son of Amphiaraus their general. They did so, and came off victorious accordingly, as we shall see in the next section.

AFTER this Diomedes the son of Tydeus, the son-in-law of Adrastus, who was also king of Ætolia, came to the crown of Argos in right of his wife, and was the last king of it. After his successful enterprise against Thebes, he lifted himself in that against Troy, and was one of that small number of princes which returned safe home. Upon his arrival at Argos, he found that his wife Ægiale, whom Venus had plagued with a furor uteri, in revenge of the wound which he had given her at the siege of Troy, had entertained a criminal familiarity with Cometes the son of Sthenelus, one of the heroes that went to the siege of Troy. When she found that her husband had discovered her intrigue, she attempted to kill him, but he first retired to the temple of Juno, and thence into Apulia, then a small kingdom in Italy. Here he found Daunus the king of it strictly besieged, who promised him part of his kingdom, if he could beat his enemies. Diomedes did it with success, and built a city there, which he called Argos Hippiu, whence in process of time it changed its name into Argyrippa. He was afterwards killed by Daunus, and, according to the poetic fiction, his companions, who greatly lamented his death, were turned into swans, or birds very much like them.

In the mean time the Heraclidae, since their first expulsion out of Peloponnesus, by Eurystheus king of Argos, had made several fruitless attempts to regain it. The first, as we have seen, was in Atreus's time under Hyllus; another under his son Cleodæus; a third under his grandson Aristomachus. This last prince left three sons, Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, who, when they came of age, consulted the oracle concerning the success of a new invasion, and received this ambiguous answer, that it would succeed if they went by the way of Stenygrus; but they thinking the narrow passage of the Isthmus to be meant by it, invaded it by that way, and Aristomachus lost the battle and his life in the attempt*.

THE Pythones being upbraided with it by his sons, made answer, that their ancestors had brought their misfortunes upon themselves by mistaking her words. Thus when Hyllus was bid to wait for the third fruit, the oracle meant the third generation, and not, as he mistook it, the third crop; and that now by Stenygrus was not meant the neck of land, but the deep sea on the right hand of the peninsula. Upon this answer they went to build a navy at Ætolia, since called upon that account Naupactus. During their stay here, Aristodemus the youngest of the three was killed by lightning, and left two twins, Eurysthenes and Procles. Soon after this a more severe misfortune befel them, for their fleet was destroyed, and their army laboured under a grievous famine. The oracle was applied to afresh, and answered, that Apollo had sent those plagues upon them, because they had murdered his prophet Carnus. There had indeed been such a man among them whom Hippotes killed, because he took him to be some magician, who came to delude the army; to expiate which crime, he was ordered by the oracle to be banished ten years.

THE Heraclidae were also promised better success, provided they put themselves under the command of a general that had three eyes, but where to find such a one was the difficulty; at length they met an Ætolian named Oxylus, who was returning from Peloponnesus into his own country, which he had been forced to fly a year before for the unfortunate murder of his brother. This man and the horse, or mule he rode upon, having but three eyes between them, was immediately supposed to be the person pointed at by the oracle, upon which they chose him for their general, and promised him the country of Elis as a recompence†. They then gave out that they were going to enter the peninsula at the Isthmus, which drew all the Peloponnesian forces thither, and sailing up the Stenygrus, as the oracle had directed them, landed their forces at Molyerium without any opposition.

THREE of the kingdoms of Peloponnesus they challenged as their undoubted right, ^a namely Argos, Mycena, and Lacedemon (L). The first of these they got with some difficulty, and Tisamenus the king of it, was either killed ^{*}, or escaped by flight [†]. Mycena they conquered with the sword, and expelled all the Nestorian family, who went and settled at Athens, where Alcmeon and Peon became the heads of two considerable families in that city [‡]. As for Lacedemon, Sparta being betrayed to them by one Philonomus ^b, they entered it with the sound of the flute, which instrument became much in vogue, as it was thought, both to inspire the soldiers with courage, and to keep them in their ranks ^c. They also kept their promise with their three-eyed general, who being descended from Ætolus, had a right to the country of Elis, from which the latter had been banished by Salmoneus king of the Epheii, who were now ^b in possession of it. These agreed with the Heraclide, that the pretensions of Oxylas should be decided by single combat, according to the Grecian custom, and the Ephean champion being killed, Elis was restored to its right owner. After these successes the three brothers having raised three altars to Jupiter Patrius, resolved to divide their conquest by lot. Cresphontes is supposed by some juggle to have made the kingdom of Mycena, the richest and most fruitful of the three, to fall to his share. Temenus had Argos, and Lacedemon was divided between Eurysthenes, and Procles the sons of Aristodemus ^d, as shall be seen in its place.

Argos.

Temenus, now fixed in Argos, betrayed such an extraordinary fondness for his son-in-law Deiphontes, who was descended from Ctesiphus the son of Hercules by ^c Dejanira, that his other sons, who had reason to fear he would appoint him his successor, hired the Titans to murder their father. Temenus being dead, one author tells us, the army abhorring the parricides, set the crown upon Deiphontes and his wife ^e; but Pausanias tells us that it fell to his eldest son Cifus.

HOWEVER that be, from this time the royal prerogative began to lose ground very fast, as we observed before. To Cifus succeeded Lacidamus, who had little else than the title of a king. His son Meltas, impatient of such restraint, endeavoured, when it was too late, to restore it to its ancient dignity, but the people were by that time grown so powerful and headstrong, that as soon as they found out his design, they put an effectual stop to it, and a final end to the kingly power, reducing ^d the government into a downright democracy, and condemning their unhappy prince to death ^f.

THE kingdom of Mycena, or Messenia was not much longer lived. For though these two did outvie that of Sparta by far, at first, yet the latter soon grew to such a height of power and splendor, as both to eclipse and overpower them in the wars which they had afterwards with them. To avoid repetitions, we shall defer the further account of them till we come to speak of Sparta. All that need be added here is, that Cresphontes, who, as we observed before, had juggled himself into Mycena, soon lost his new-gotten kingdom and his life, being murdered by the nobles with two of his sons, for his extraordinary caresses to the people. His third son Ægyptus, or ^e rather Æpytus, fled to Cypselus king of Arcadia, who was his grandfather by the mother's side, and when of age obtained his assistance to regain his kingdom, killed the usurper of it, and by wisely dividing his favours and largesses between the nobles and the people gained the affections of both to such a degree, that the kings who had till then been called Heraclide, were from thenceforth called Æpytide in honour of him ^f. But this popular liberality, though now so successful, proved fatal to the regal dignity; the subjects grew daily more and more encroaching, and the kings more tenacious of their prerogative, till it ended in the excision of monarchy and a total change of government.

The history of the ancient kingdom of ATTICA.

ATTICA was situate along the north coast of the gulph of Saron, bounded on Geography. the west by Megara, and part of Bootia, on the north by the Euripic gulph, a now Stretto de negro ponte, and on the east by the Ægean sea. It reached in length from north-west to south-east, about sixty miles, that is from 24 deg. 40 min. to 25 deg. 41 min. east longitude. Its breadth from north to south, where it is broadest was about fifty-six miles, and decreasing as it came nearer to the sea.*

THE soil is naturally barren and craggy, and made fertile chiefly by the indefatigable industry of the people; hence it was that it often enjoyed a profound quietness, when other more fruitful countries were exposed to frequent incursions. Natural and artificial varieties. So that having above all others preserved its ancient inhabitants, gave rise to their extravagant notion, that they, like other insects, were the spontaneous product of the soil, and as a badge of it, Thucydides tells us, they wore a golden grasshopper in the curls of their hair. b However they were much more advantageously situated for commerce, having several good ports, the chief of which was that of Pyreus, whose haven, distant from Athens the metropolis of Attica, about two miles, had a communication with it by a channel, guarded on each side with two strong walls reaching from the one to the other, for the security of the merchandise that went up to that capital. It had moreover a wide harbour capable of containing above 100 ships^a. There were some other ports and cities of note in this kingdom, the chief Cities. of which next to Athens was Eleusis on the same gulph, and near the coasts of Megara, upon which account it had been once so strongly fortified that it was reckoned impregnable (A). 2. Rhamnus, famed for the temple of Amphiaræus, and the statue of Nemesis (B). But the largest and most opulent was the metropolis, called at first Cecropia from Cecrops the founder of it; but afterwards Athens from the goddess Minerva (C), Athens. whom the Greeks called Athene, and to whom that city was dedicated, and in whose honour were instituted the yearly games called Panathenæa. It was chiefly famed, besides its strength beauty, and opulence; 1. For the inviolable faith of its citizens, whence Fides Attica became a common proverb; 2. For being the nursery of the best scholars and orators, choicest wits, and greatest philosophers; and 3. For having produced the greatest number of brave generals of any city in the world, Rome not excepted, upon all which accounts it was justly esteemed one of the eyes of Greece.

d THE chief river in this kingdom is the Asopus, flowing from the lake Copais, through Bootia and Attica, and splitting itself into two streams, which divide the famous plains of Marathon, empties itself into the Ægean sea.

THE government from its first foundation to the Archontes, continued altogether Government. monarchical, under a succession of seventeen kings. What is most remarkable of all is, that they did not reduce it like other kingdoms, into a commonwealth, and out of a dislike to the regal dignity, but rather changed only the name of it out of a deep respect to the last monarch, who bore the title of king. For this glorious prince, having

(A) This city is said to have been built by one Eleusius, who having entertained Ceres there, when she went in search of her daughter, she taught him agriculture as an acknowledgment for his hospitality. Hence [that goddess is sometimes called Eleusina by the poets (1).

(B) The goddess of justice, called also Rhamnasia from this town where her temple stood (2).

(C) The occasion of it, as the story goes, is that Cecrops not knowing what name to give to his new-built city, an olive-tree, and a fountain of water, or, as others have it, a horse appeared. The oracle being consulted, answered, that Neptune and Minerva were contending for the honour of naming of it, that the olive was the gift of Minerva, and the fountain (or horse) that of Neptune; and that that which they esteemed the most beneficial to mankind should adjudge the prize to the giver. The men and the women being assembled to give their judgment, the former gave it for the god, but the women, who were more in number, gave it for the goddess, and the city was called from her Athene. Neptune, in revenge of the affront, drowned their territories about it, and the men to appease his anger, past three votes against the women, the one, that they should not be called Athenians, but Atticans; and the second, that they should have no vote in public matters; and lastly, that no children should thenceforth bear their mother's name. The poets have embellished this story after their way, by pretending that those deities did visibly contend for those places, as they did also for several others, and that either Jupiter, or themselves, left the arbitration of the dispute to some proper judges. We shall meet with some further instances of this kind of contention in the sequel (3).

generously sacrificed his life to the safety of his subjects, the grateful Athenians resolved a that no man from thenceforth should bear the title of king, and gave that of Archon to his son and successor, which continued during ten successions. So that the only difference between the kingly and the Archontic government was, that the former descended by inheritance, and the latter by election, and that these were accountable to the people whenever it was required.

Riches.

Coin.

THE riches of this kingdom occasioned by its great commerce and frugality, are said to have amounted to 3200 (Attic) talents a year^d; this vast income gave them a considerable superiority over all their neighbours, not only as it enabled them to keep a greater army and navy than they, but also as they could make use of it to gain any other estates to their side; and as their coin was commonly stamped with b the figure of an ox, hence was the phrase so frequent among the Greeks, of a thing being worth ten or a hundred oxen[†]. Hence also came the common proverb, Bovem habet in lingua, when a man was thought bribed to speak contrary to his own sentiments.

Chronology.

THIS kingdom is generally allowed to have been founded by Cecrops an Egyptian, who brought hither a colony of Saïts, a people who lived upon one of the mouths of the Nile called Saiticum, about the year of the world 2448, and of the flood 1443, or according to Eusebius's chronology, 780 years before the first olympiad (D). It continued under its monarchs 487 years, according to the same chronology, during which c time it doth not appear that the Athenians felt any grievances that could induce them to exchange that form of government for any other. The Archontic government which followed, though made elective by their law, yet continued in the family of their last king 312 years longer, that is till the year of the world 3252, and of the flood 2247, from this time to that of receiving the government into a commonwealth, A. M. 3412, there elapsed 160 years. The whole duration then of this government from Cecrops to Solon amounts to 960 years.

1. Cecrops built the city of Athens, as we said before, married the daughter of Ægeus, supposed to have been king of Attica before him, and in right of her, laid the foundation of a new monarchy. He is said to have been the first who deified Jupiter, and ordained sacrifices to be offered to him[†] as the supreme deity. He is

(D) some authors, who make Ogyges to have been king of Attica at that time in which it was destroyed by the deluge which bears his name (4), place the foundation of this kingdom still further off, namely 200 years earlier. Who this Ogyges was is not easy to guess: Some make him an Egyptian, and some an Arcadian: Some think he reigned in Attica, and others at Thebes. Under this uncertainty we chuse to date the foundation of the kingdom from Cecrops, who, if Gyges had really reigned there, may at least be reckoned the restorer of it, and the person from whom the succession of Attic princes is derived.

We must own however that according to this supposition of his being the first founder of the kingdom, those of Thebes and Sparta will stand foremost in point of antiquity, though in no other respect; but this is not worth inverting the order we gave them at first in our plan of this work.

This Cecrops is feigned by the poets to have been partly man and partly serpent or dragon (5), that is, according to Justin (6), because he was the first that coupled male and female in matrimony, or, according to Demosthenes, and the rest of the vain Grecians, because he had the wisdom of a man, and the strength of a dragon, or came a dragon or barbarian out of Egypt, and polished himself into a man in Greece; but more probably, either as he was the first institutor of marriage, or because he understood the Egyptian and Greek tongues. Some authors have, though without any foundation, affirmed him to have been drowned in the Red-Sea with Pharaoh's host, in whose time he lived.

- a likewise affirmed to have been the first who set up altars and idols, offered sacrifices, and instituted marriage among the Grecians, who before his time it seems, lived promiscuously, and coupled as their fancy led them. Pausanias tells us that he forbid sacrificing any living creatures to the gods, or any sort of offerings, except a kind of forked or horned cakes, called by the Athenians Pelanous, and in Greek Bovē, which signifies likewise an ox. This led Eusebius into the mistake which we find in the first book of his chronicle, where he affirms that Cecrops was the first who sacrificed an ox to Jupiter; whereas that creature, so esteemed by the Athenians on account of its serviceableness in agriculture, was not sacrificed by them till the time of Ereäbeus, who offered one to Jupiter Polieus, or protector of the city; and then Pausanias tells us that
- b the priest who knocked it down, being seized with horror at the fact, flung his hatchet down and fled out of Attica. From Cecrops the Athenians affected to call themselves Cecropide, during the five following reigns, after which they changed it for that of Ereäbyde, in honour of Ereäbeus their sixth monarch. Cecrops reigned fifty years, according to Eusebius and St. Jerom, and left only three daughters, viz. Herse, Aglauros, and Pandrosos, of whom we shall speak in a following note. As for his son Eryäthron, he died before his father. So that after Cecrop's death, Cranaus, one of the wealthiest citizens of Athens, and in the greatest credit, found means to ascend the Attic throne, probably by the marriage of one of his daughters.
2. Cranaus enjoyed the kingdom about ten years, during which time having Cranaus.
- c unfortunately married one of his daughters named Attis to Amphiäyon the son of Deucalion, was by him dethroned and forced to retire into the city of Lamprea, where he led a private life to the last, and where the Lampreans shewed his tomb. From his daughter Attis the country, till then called Athaa, took the name of Attica.
3. Amphiäyon (E) after he had reigned about ten, or, according to the last quoted Amphiäyon. authors, twelve years, was himself deposed, and outed by
4. Eriäthionius, who was the reputed son of Vulcan and Tethys (F). He is said to Eriäthionius. have been the first inventor of coaches, being lame of his feet: He reigned fifty years.
5. Pandion the son of Eriäthionius, and father of Progne and Philomela; whose hard Pandion. fate, so famous among the poets, is supposed to have broke his heart after he had
- d reigned about forty years.
6. Ereäbeus, Pandion's son, was reckoned the most powerful prince of his time; Ereäbeus. wherefore Boreas king of Thrace, who sought his alliance, demanded his daughter Oritbia in marriage, and being denied, carried her away by force. Ereäbeus, after he had reigned fifty years, was unfortunately killed in a battle against the Eleusians. He left several sons, who equally contended for the kingdom, and at length agreed to refer the decision to their brother-in-law Xuthus, who adjudged the kingdom to Cecrops, who was the eldest. For this the other two brothers bore Xuthus such ill-will, that they forced him to fly their country, whither he had taken refuge, when driven from Theffaly by his brethren.
- e 7. Cecrops II. the eldest son of Ereäbeus: this prince is generally allowed to have Cecrops II. been the first who gathered the people into twelve towns, who had till then lived in houses and cottages, scattered here and there, without order or regular distance; but he was after forty years reign, outed the kingdom by his two discontented brethren Metion and Pandorus, and forced to fly into Ägialea, and died there.
8. Pandion II. the son of Cecrops II. was likewise driven out of Athens by the sons of Pandion II. his uncle Metion, who took the administration for some time. Pandion fled into Megara, where Pylas then reigning gave him his daughter Pelia, and afterwards made him his successor. During his abode there he had four sons, with whom he came into Athens (G),

(E) Not that who was the first institutor of the court of the Amphiäyons or common council of Greece, but his uncle.

(F) He is feigned by the poets to have sprung ex spermate Vulcani in terram delapsa, by the assistance of Minerva who also brought him up. The fable adds, that she having one day laid the child in a covered coffer, gave it in charge to Cecrop's three daughters, with express orders not to open it upon any account. Pandrosos obeyed the goddess; but her two sisters, more curious than she, having ventured to open it, were immediately taken with such a phrensy, or, according to the fabulous phrase, so tormented with furies, that they flung themselves down the steepest place of the citadel, and ended their lives.

(G) It is indeed much more likely that he never returned into Athens, but that after his sons were grown up, he sent them to recover that kingdom from the Metionides, so that having all shared alike the danger, they thought it reasonable to share alike in the conquest.

The space therefore of twenty-five years allowed by chronologists (7) to their father's reign, seems rather designed to mark the interval of the interregnum or usurpation from Cecrop's expulsion to his grandson Ägeus's reign.

whence he expelled the sons of Metion, and after he had reigned a short time, a either left the kingdom among his four sons, or they agreed to divide it among themselves after his death; notwithstanding which the royal dignity did in effect remain with the eldest^b Ægeus.

9. Ægeus, when he came to the crown, finding himself despised by his subjects, because he could get no children by his wives, and sometimes insulted by his brother Pallas, who by that time had got no less than fifty sons besides daughters, went to consult the Delphic oracle, and was answered that he must forbear the use of women till his return into Athens^c. This puzzling answer forced him to apply himself to Pittheus king of Troezen, who was then famed for his extraordinary wisdom and skill in expounding oracles, where this prince easily prevailed with him to lie with his daughter Æthra, whom he got with child. As none but these three were privy to the secret, Ægeus, before his return to Athens, hid a sword and a pair of shoes under a stone long enough to cover them, and left orders with the princess, that if the child proved a boy, she should send him to Athens with those tokens, as soon as he was able to lift up the stone. He charged her moreover to use all imaginable secrecy, lest the sons of his brother Pallas, getting knowledge of it, should way-lay and murder him in his way to Athens.

Æthra being soon after delivered of a son, Pittheus gave out that Neptune was the father of it; and when he was sixteen years old, she brought him to the stone, which she saw him lift up with ease, upon which she discovered to him the whole secret of his parentage, bid him take up the sword and shoes, and prepare himself to go to his father. Both she and Pittheus however advised him to go by sea, alledging that since Hercules's departure, who had been the great scourge of robbers and banditti, the roads were again so infested with them, that it was extremely hazardous to travel by land. Theseus, this was the young prince's name, who had by that time shewed uncommon marks of courage and strength, no sooner heard Hercules named upon such an occasion, than he was fired with a desire to imitate so noble a pattern; so that all their intreaties could not dissuade him from taking his journey by land. The exploits which he performed in his way to Athens having no connection with either his father's reign or his own, may be best seen in the margin (H). d

WHILST Theseus was still at Troezen, his father laboured under no small perplexities from his subjects and his haughty brother; and an accident happened which had almost driven him to despair. Androgeus the son of Minos, king of Crete, who was come to Athens to be present at one of their feasts, had unhappily contracted such an intimacy with the fifty sons of Pallas, that the jealous old king, fearing some fatal consequence from it, had caused that prince to be privately murdered. Others say that that young prince having undertaken to encounter the Marathonian bull, was killed by it. However that be, Minos having received the news of his son's death, and made several vain attempts to revenge it on the Athenians, prayed to the gods to do it for him; upon which the Athenians were punished with pestilence, e famine, and several other plagues; and were told by the oracle that they must expect no relief, till they were reconciled to the Cretan king. Minos, resolved to make them pay dear for their deliverance, imposed a yearly tribute upon them of seven young men, and seven young virgins, whom he condemned to be devoured by the Minotaur (I), during the space of seven^f, or according to others nine years^g, these

(H) His first encounter after he left Troezen, was with Periphetes the son of Vulcan, surnamed also Corynetes, or Club-bearer, from the club he used to fight with, whom he slew in single combat, and afterwards carried his club with him. The next he overcame was Sinnis the son of Polyphemus, surnamed Pityocamptes, from his bending the heads of two tall pines, and tying passengers between the opposite branches, which by their sudden return, did tear them in pieces: him Theseus put to the same death.

His next exploit was killing the fierce Cromyonian sow called Phæa, which others take to have been a female robber of that name, infamous for her thefts, murders, and lewdness.

Sciron a famous robber, who used to throw passengers down a steep rock, after he had made them wash his feet, sell the next victim to his valour. Having next signalized himself in the Eleusian games by killing Cercyon a famous Arcadian wrestler, he went to Terminus, where he killed Damastes, otherwise called Procrustes, by distending his limbs to the length of his bed, as he used to do to those who unhappily fell into his hands.

Lastly, He went and fetched the famed bull of Marathon and brought him alive to Athens, where he sacrificed him to Apollo (8).

a these unhappy victims were to be drawn by lot, and what heightened the people's murmurs was, that Ageus, the cause of these misfortunes, being childless, was the only person who was exempt from the punishment.

It was now the third time that Minos had sent his bloody messengers to exact the tribute, when Theseus, having performed all those glorious exploits abovementioned, was arrived at his father's capital. The unfortunate king, who had received some years before into his court the famous enchantress Medea, in her flight from Corinth, and had been deluded with hopes that she would renew his age, and make him capable of getting children; had by that time been also prevailed upon to marry her. Theseus, whose birth was a secret to every one there, was soon discovered by Medea, b who conceived such jealousy of him, by reason of his noble exploits, that she easily filled her weak husband with fears, and persuaded him to invite the young stranger, and to poison him in a glass of wine. As soon as they were sat at table, Theseus, willing to give his father an agreeable surprize, did happily draw his sword, as if he designed to help himself with it, which the old king no sooner saw, than he hastened to throw down the poisoned draught, and embracing his son, he owned him for such before all the court. This declaration, and the known valour of Theseus, did so quash the sanguine hopes of Pallas and his sons, that they broke out in open rebellion, but were soon after discomfited by him.

c AFTER this Theseus, who resolved at any rate to deliver his father's country from the bloody Cretan tribute, having encouraged his old father with hopes of killing the Minotaur, went and willingly offered himself to be one of the unhappy victims, and embarking with them in one ship, he gave the pilot two sails, the one black to sail by, and the other white, to be hoisted up at their return, in case he came off victorious. At their arrival at Crete he offered himself to Minos, and demanded the liberty to fight the Minotaur, or rather his champion Taurus, in single combat, which the king did the more readily grant, because he had some just reason to suspect that his queen, a woman of no singular chastity, had some criminal commerce with him. Theseus after this, had all the success he could wish: he killed his enemy, released all the Athenian captives, prevailed upon Minos to remit the tribute, d and obtained his daughter Ariadne in marriage, not indeed with her father's consent; but she having been an eye-witness of his valour, and address in the late fight, conceived such a passion for him, that she resolved to run away with him. He left her however in the isle of Naxos: and some add that after the conquest of the Minotaur, Minos fell in love with Peribea, one of the seven virgins which Theseus had brought with him, and would have detained her. Theseus strenuously opposed it, which so exasperated the Cretan king, that among other ill language which he gave him, he told him that he was not the son of Neptune, unless he would fetch his ring which he then flung into the sea. Theseus immediately plunged after it, and brought up with the ring a golden crown which Amphitrite had put upon his head. Minos however would not e be pacified without Peribea, and Theseus still persisting in his denial, was by his order cast into the labyrinth, in which the Minotaur used to be kept; but he stayed not long there, before Ariadne furnished him with a clue, by the help of which he extricated himself out of it, and setting out with his fleet for Athens, left Ariadne behind at the island above-mentioned, where Bacchus fell in love with her, and carried her off, whilst Theseus sailed homewards towards Athens. Unfortunately for them and for Ageus, their extraordinary joy for their late success, made them forget to display the white flag in token of victory, as had been agreed; and the old king, who went from time to time to espie them from a high rock, observing the ship afar off, still hanging out its sable colours, doubted not but that his son had like the rest fallen
 f a victim to the Minotaur; and in a fit of sudden despair threw himself into the sea, which from him was since called the Aegean sea; so that when Theseus landed king's order thrown into a labyrinth, and fed with human flesh: but more reasonably supposed to have been a man of great strength and ferocity, and upon that account to have been surnamed Taurus or Bull. He seems also to have been in great power at the Cretan court, either for his constant victories at the games which Minos had instituted in memory of his son, or for some other exploits, or perhaps rather for his fierce and cruel nature; upon which account it may be reasonably supposed, that all the Athenian captives in particular were given to him by that exasperated prince, to be used with uncommon severity. For we are told (9) that he was grown to such a height of intolerance and cruelty, that he was by this time become odious to the whole kingdom, and not unlikely to the king also, upon his being suspected to have too great a familiarity with the queen.

at Athens he found the city divided between grief for Ægeus's death, and joy for a the safe return of his valiant son and successor. Ægeus reigned forty years.

10. Theseus was of too active and warlike a temper, and too fond of imitating the great Hercules, to spend his time in the civil affairs of his kingdom; so that he began, upon his first accession to it, to think how to divest himself of that care, that he might the better indulge his military genius. To this end he began with gathering all the people of Attica into the old and new town, which he incorporated into one city. After this he divested himself of all his regal power, excepting only the title of king, the command of the army, and the guardianship of their laws. The rest he committed to proper magistrates, chosen out of three different orders of the people, which he divided into nobles, husbandmen, and artificers. The first he b invested with the power of interpreting and executing the laws, and regulating all things that related to religion. The other two chose their inferior magistrates from among themselves, to take care of whatever related to their separate orders: so that the kingdom was in some measure reduced to a commonwealth, in which the king had the greatest post; the nobles were next to him in honour and authority; the husbandmen had the greatest profit; and the artist excelled them in number. He instituted two annual festivals, the Panathenæa, in memory of the Athenians being now united into one, and that called Metœcia, besides the famous Isthmian games, in honour of Neptune, which we have mentioned formerly, and were so called from the Isthmus in which they were celebrated. All these were chiefly designed to draw c a concourse of strangers thither, and as a further encouragement for them to come and settle there, he endowed them with the privileges of natives. He likewise abolished all their distinct courts of judicature, and built one common-council-hall, called Prytaneum, a sumptuous building which stood for many ages *. We observed before, that the Athenian money was stamped with an ox; this coin was supposed to have had that figure, either in memory of Theseus's killing the bull of Marathon, or the Minotaur, or perhaps to recommend agriculture to the people, to which the ox was most subservient.

AFTER he had thus new modelled the government, his next care was to join the kingdom of Megara to his own in right of his grandfather Pandion the second, who had succeeded Pylus his father-in-law, as we have seen above. It was then that Theseus erected that famous pillar in the Isthmus, which shewed the limits of the two countries which met there, and which had this inscription on the one side, This is not Peloponnesus but Ionia; and on the other, This is Peloponnesus not Ionia. What we read concerning his two expeditions against the Amazons, is so blended with fable, so differently related †, and so uncertain, that we shall give it in a short note, because they do not appear upon the whole to have an immediate relation to the kingdom of Athens (K).

SOME TIME after these expeditions, Theseus contracted an intimacy with Piritheus the son of Ixion, and being invited to his nuptials, helped him to kill a great number of Centaurs, or rather Thessalian horsemen, as we shall see in the sequel, who in their cups had offered violence to their female guests; and drove the rest out of the country. These two went from thence to Sparta, and stole away the famed Helena out of the temple of Diana Ortia, where she happened to be a dancing ‡. This princess was the reputed daughter of Jupiter, by Leda the wife of Tyndarus king of Oebalia in Peloponnesus; and though then but nine years old was already famed for the greatest beauty in the world; insomuch that Theseus, though then, as is reckoned,

(K) The first expedition was only undertaken in favour of Hercules, whose companion in all such exploits Theseus always affected to be. As a reward therefore for his assistance, that victorious hero gave him Antiope one of the Amazonian queens whom he had taken prisoner. Justin says, Hippolyte the other queen, and that Hercules kept Antiope for himself.

However this gave occasion to a second expedition, in which some affirm that the Amazons made a descent into Attica, to recover their lost queen, having with them besides their own forces obtained a powerful supply of horsemen from Sagillus king of Scythia, with his son Panasagorus at their head, who did afterwards upon some misunderstanding withdraw his troops, and left them in the lurch. Others say that Theseus went and attacked them near the Caspian sea: however they all agree that he gained the victory over them, and that in one of these two expeditions, he took the queen Hippolyte, whom he afterwards married. After this the Amazons were forced to clap up a peace with the Athenians, and these either in memory of this or of their late victory, erected a pillar near the temple of Tellus Olympia.

a above fifty years old, yet could not his virtue be proof against her charms. However, the time and place, and circumstances of this rape are variously reported, we have followed Plutarch's account of it as the most allowed. According to him the two ravishers were pursued as far as Tegea; but they happily made their escape out of Peloponnesus, and thinking themselves now secure of their prey; they agreed to cast lots for her, upon condition that he to whose lot she fell, should help the other in getting some other celebrated beauty in lieu of her; and fortune having declared for Theseus, he assisted his companion in the like attempt upon Proserpina, daughter of Aidonius king of the Molossi in Epirus, who being the next beauty to Helena, was guarded by the dog Cerberus, and was not to be won, but by the death of that monster. However, when the king understood that they designed to steal her away, he threw Pirithous to be torn in pieces by Cerberus, and Theseus into prison, from which he was afterwards released at the intercession of Hercules.

DURING his absence Mnestheus the son of Peteus, grandchild of Erechtheus, had taken care to ingratiate himself so far with the nobles and commons, that when he returned, he found them very cold towards him. Soon after this, the war which Castor and Pollux waged against him for the recovery of their sister Helena, raised a more powerful faction against him: and as soon as the two brothers were got to the gates of the city, Mnestheus harangued the citizens, and told them that since their quarrel was only against Theseus, their safest way was to open their gates to them, and Theseus finding it impossible to resist the torrent, conveyed himself and family away privately, after he had pronounced a solemn curse against his faithless subjects, which did not go unheard (L.) His design was to have sailed into Crete, and to have obtained either a succour or sanctuary there, from Deucalion the son of Minos, and his now brother-in-law (M); but he was unfortunately cast by a tempest upon the island of Scyros. Here he was at first kindly received by king Lycomedes, but was soon after killed by a fall from a high mountain, in the 40th year of his reign. Some say that he was decoyed thither by that king, who, either out of fear of him, or as is most likely, at the instigation of his Athenian rival, threw him headlong down that precipice, tho' others say, that that place being d his usual walk after supper, his foot unfortunately slipped in the dark. We omit for brevity sake many other famous exploits of this renowned hero, which the reader may more fully find in Plutarch's life of him. All we shall add here is, that the Athenians did sometime after dedicate a temple to him, and that Cimon the famous son of Miltiades did raze the whole island of Scyros in revenge of his death, and carried his bones to Athens, after he had, by the advice of the oracle been at a great deal of pains to find them out.

11. Mnestheus or Menestheus, was the son of Peteus, and great grandson of Erechtheus, the sixth king of Athens, and consequently had a better right to the crown than Theseus, whose father was uncertain, and who was at best but the son of Ægeus, and this but the adopted son of Pandion, as we have seen above. Whilst therefore Theseus was either pursuing his amours, or was imprisoned for the rape of Proserpine, it was easy for his rival to persuade the Athenians to raise him to the throne. What gave him another lift to it was, that Castor and Pollux, taking the advantage of Theseus's confinement, came and besieged Apbidne, a town in Attica, where he had sent his mother and his wife Helena; and these two heroes having taken and rescued their sister, out of revenge to her ravisher, helped his competitor to mount the throne.

(L) The ungrateful Athenians, who expressed more joy for their new king, than grief for their old one, were in process of time made so sensible of the effects of his curse, that to appease his ghost they appointed solemn sacrifices and divine honours to be paid to him. The place where he pronounced his dire imprecation against them, was from thenceforth called Arattherion, or the place of cursing (10).

(M) Theseus had a son by the Amazonian queen, named Hippolytus, and having soon after married Phædra the sister of Deucalion the son and successor of Minos, by whom he had two sons; he sent Hippolytus to be brought up by his own mother Æthra queen of Troizen; but he coming afterwards to be present at some Athenian games, Phædra fell in love with him, and having sollicitated him in vain to a compliance, in a fit of resentment, accused him to Theseus of having made an attempt upon her. The fable says that Theseus prayed to Neptune to punish him by some violent death, and that as Hippolytus was riding along the sea-shore, Neptune sent two sea-calves who frightened the horses, overturned the chariot, and tore him in pieces. The poets add that the lustful queen hanged herself for grief, but as for Hippolytus, Diana being taken with his chastity, and pitying the sad fate it had brought upon him, prevailed upon Æsculapius to restore him to life, to be a companion of her diversions.

(10) Plutarch. in These.

Menestheus being thus chosen, was in no great care about the sons of Theseus,^a but dreaded his known valour, in case he should ever get into his dominions again. To prevent which, he prevailed so far upon the Athenians, what with gifts and caresses, that they would not suffer him to come into Attica. And as soon as he heard that he was retired into the island of Scyros, he prevailed on Lycomedes to dispatch him by the stratagem we lately mentioned. Menestheus reigned twenty-four years, and was one of the chiefs that went to the siege of Troy, where having lost his life, the kingdom of Athens returned again to the Thesean line.

12. Demophon one of the sons of Theseus by Phedra, succeeded him both in the kingdom and in the command of the Athenian forces that were before Troy. He was one of those that came back safe from that siege: in his return he landed in Thrace,^b where Phyllis king Lycurgus's daughter entertained him for some time at bed and board. Upon his departure he promised to return to her, but broke his word and her heart. In his reign was erected the famous court of the Ephetae, consisting originally of fifty Athenians, and as many Argivi, for trying of wilful murders, and lying in wait to kill. The occasion of erecting this court, and of the Argives being admitted to sit as judges in it, was as follows: Agamemnon, others say Diomedes, returning with his forces from Troy, were driven one night into an Athenian port called Phalerus, and thinking themselves in an enemy's country, began their usual trade of ravaging and plundering, upon which the surpris'd Athenians fell upon them and killed a considerable number of them. On the morrow they found the palladium^c upon the ground among the slain, by which they knew that they were their friends the Argives. The oracle having been consulted, ordered them to give the slain an honourable burial in the place where they fell, to build a temple upon it, and dedicate it to Minerva, and to set up the palladium in it. Immediately after this it was ordered that this court should be erected to try all cases of murder, manslaughter, and chance-medly. It consisted of fifty members who were to be above fifty years old, men of sense and known probity, and had power of life and death. Upon its first setting up, Agamemnon insisting that there should be an equal number of Athenians and Argives to sit in it, the Athenians readily granted it. Demophon submitted himself afterwards to be tried by this court, for having unfortunately killed one of his^d subjects by the turn of his horse, as he was coming from Troy. It subsisted a considerable time in the same form; but Draco, one of their Archons, new modelled it, excluded the Argives out of it, and made it consist of fifty-one Athenians, who were all to be turned of fifty years of age^e. Demophon reigned thirty-three years, and was succeeded by his son, or according to others his brother.

13. Oxyntes who reigned twelve years, and left the crown to his son.

14. Aphydas, who was murdered by Thymetes in the first year of his reign.

15. Thymetes the bastard son of Oxyntes, betrayed his base nature in many things besides the murder of Aphydas, by which he got the crown. We shall only mention the last instance of it which justly bereaved him of it. He had reigned about eight^e years when Xanthus king of Boeotia had a contest with him about one of their frontier towns. Xanthus offered to decide the matter in single combat, and Thymetes as cowardly declined it. It happened that Melanthus a noble Messenian, who had been driven out of his country by the Heraclidae, was come to Athens about this time, and offered to answer the cartel. Upon their very first onset Melanthus called to his adversary, and asked him why he brought a second along with him contrary to their articles, and whilst Xanthus turned about to see who followed him, he ran him through with his lance^f. This victory, though it was more owing to his cunning than bravery, did so please the Athenians, that they not only deposed their pusillanimous king, who was the last of the line of Erechtheus, and set their Mycean champion upon the throne; but instituted a feast in memory of this action, and called it Apatheria from the stratagem that gave occasion to it^f.

16. Melanibius, as soon as he had mounted the throne, persuaded the Athenians to receive the banished Messenians and Nestoride, and after a reign of thirty-seven years left the kingdom to his worthy son Codrus^g.

17. Codrus reigned about twenty-one years, during which time the Dores and Heraclidae had regained all Peloponnesus and were entering into Attica. Codrus was informed a that the oracle had promised them victory provided they did not kill the king of the Athenians, and that they had taken all proper precautions against it; but he, who had resolved to sacrifice his life to the safety of his kingdom, took this method to elude them: he disguised himself like a peasant, went into his camp, fell a quarrelling with some of the Athenian soldiers; from thence they went to blows, and he ceased not fighting till he was killed. On the morrow when they found who he was, they were so terrified, that they decamped without striking a blow¹.

b WITH Codrus ended the regal succession and title of kings of Athens. His subjects conceived such veneration for that magnanimous prince, that they esteemed none worthy to bear the royal title after him, and therefore committed the management of the estates to elective magistrates, to whom they gave the title of Archons, and chose Medon the eldest son of Codrus to that new dignity. His election however was opposed by his brother Nileus, who pretended he could not submit to Medon's authority, because he was lame of one foot; but the oracle having confirmed it², all the Archons that succeeded him were from him surnamed Medontidae, because they were all chosen by succession: so that the Athenian government continued in the family of Codrus under twelve perpetual Archontes, somewhat above the space of two-hundred years.

c THEIR names need not be repeated here, having added them to the list of the Athenian kings: neither shall we dwell upon the transactions which happened under each several archonship; this epocha having proved very unactive and barren, except that the people, always fond of a change, did shew from time to time their dislike to that dignity being made perpetual, as having too near a resemblance to monarchy, and giving its possessor too great a handle to tyrannize over them. They began to give some marks of their discontent under their first Archon. Attica had enjoyed so much quiet during a long season, that it swarmed with exiles and foreigners, who flocked thither from other parts which are more harrassed with wars, so that they were forced to discharge them in great multitudes upon the maritime coasts of Lesser Asia. Upon the very first of these expeditions Nileus and the rest of Codrus's sons, who could not brook to be under their brother Medon, drew d a great number of Athenians to them, joined with the Ionians and Thebans, and left Athens for Lesser Asia, where they dispersed themselves in different parts, and founded the twelve following cities, viz. Ephesus, Miletum, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenae, Erythrae, Phocaea, Chios in the isle of that name, and Samos. These were at first each under a petty prince, but being forced at length to join together, became afterwards very famous, as will be seen in due time.

THIS perpetual archonship however upheld itself so long, in spite of the people's dislike to it, that it passed through thirteen hands, from Medon the son of Codrus, to Alcmon the last who bore that dignity; but the people at length, impatient to put an end to it, took the advantage of his short reign, which lasted but two e years, to clip the power of it, and to reduce its duration to ten years: so that Charops the son of Eschylus, was forced to accept of it upon those terms or none. This change happened about the beginning of the seventh olympiad, and in the year of the world 3252, the year in which Hezekiah king of Judah was born. Year of the line, in whose archonship this tumult happened, had scarce enjoyed it half its time, when his cruelties to the people, and more particularly to his son and daughter (N), caused him to be deposed. However they did not then gain their point; it continued still through three different hands, till at length Eryxias the last of them f either dying, or being deposed in the last year of his archonship, the Athenians appointed new archontes to be chosen from among the most considerable citizens for birth, wealth and interest, and voted that dignity annual from thenceforth. From that time their government dwindled into a downright democracy, which Solon did afterwards new-model and confirm, as we shall see in the next chapter.

S E C T. IV.

The history of the ancient kingdoms of Bœotia and Thebes.

Ancient names.

WE find two ancient kingdoms called by the name of Bœotia, the one, and by far ^a the more ancient and considerable of the two, founded or rather restored by Cadmus, and named by him Bœotia from the ox which is said to have directed him to the place where he built the capital of his new kingdom, better known afterwards by the name of Thebes. The other was in Thessaly, and is said to have been founded by Bœotus the son of Neptune, and brother of Æolus, by Arne the daughter of Æolus king of Æolis. This last having sent his daughter to Metapontium a city of Italy, she was there delivered of those two sons, the eldest of whom she called after her father's name Æolus; and he possessed himself of the islands in the Tyrrhenian, now Tuscan sea, and built the city of Lipara. Bœotus the younger son went to his grandfather and succeeded him in his kingdom, and called it by his own ^b name, and the capital city Arne from his mother. All that we know of these is, that they held this settlement upwards of two-hundred years, and that the Thessalians did expel them from it, and forced them to seek for a new one; upon which they came and possessed themselves of that country which had been till then called Cadmeis, and gave it the name of Bœotia. Diodorus and Homer tell us that these Bœotians did signalize themselves at the Trojan war, and the latter adds, that five of Bœotus's grandsons, Peneleus, Leitus, Prothoenor, Arcefilaus, and Clonius, were the five chiefs who led their Bœotian troops thither.

ACCORDING therefore to *Diodorus, this last country, though founded into a kingdom, at least ever since the time of Cadmus, was not called Bœotia till the ^c banished sons of Bœotus gave it that name, about three-hundred years after the building of Thebes; but the most current account, especially among the poets is, that this name had been given to it by Cadmus himself in memory of the ox, by whom he had been directed thither, according to the command of the oracle (A). However it is owned that it had had several other names, according to those of its supposed founders: those who ascribed it to Ogyges called both it and its capital Ogygia; others called it Cadmeis from Cadmus, Aonia from Aon the son of Neptune, and Hyanthis from Hyas the son of Atlas; but the far greater part say it was originally called Calydna from Calydneus, the first founder of the capital and kingdom; that province is now called Stramulippa, and Thebes its ancient capital, Stibes or Stives. ^d

Geography.

IT bordered on the east to Attica, and was in time joined to it, as we have seen in the last article, and was parted from it by the mountain Cithæron. On the north by the streight Euripus, now called the Negroponte, said to flow seven times in twenty-four hours, or rather, according to Livy, supposed to do so, because its tides are boisterous and uncertain. On the west it had the kingdom of Phocis, and on the south the gulph of Corinth. Its utmost extent from east to west was 1 deg. 10 min. and near the same length from north to south; but coming near to a point eastward*. Here is the large lake Copais about fourteen miles in length, and eight in breadth, out of which flow two considerable rivers which water the far greater part of the country eastward. These are the Asopus, which divided the territories of Thebes ^e from those of the Plateans, and running through those of Attica falls into the Ægean sea; and the Iymenus, which empties itself into the Euripus abovementioned. The country is partly hilly, especially Aonia properly so called; the rest is low and flat, abounding with excellent pasturage; but whose air is so thick and foggy, that Horace thought it the occasion of the inhabitants being such famous dunces.

It is generally allowed to have been founded by Cadmus, b as we obſerved before, and to have been made by him the capital of the Bœotian kingdom, from which his ſucceſſors, who did adorn it with many ſtately temples, palaces, and other ſumptuous buildings, ſome of whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention by and by, were alſo called kings of Thebes ^{Places of note.}

THE government was altogether monarchical like thoſe we have ſeen already, but perhaps more deſpotic here than in the reſt, and having no other laws than the kings's will ; ſome of whom governed more like tyrants than natural monarchs. We have nothing left of their ancient cuſtoms, except what Plutarch tells us in his morals, of their manner of introducing their new-married women into their new habitation. They were brought thither in a kind of chariot or cart, the axle-tree of which was immediately burnt, to give the bride to underſtand that ſhe was fixed with her huſband for life, and muſt not expect to return to her parents. The ^{Laws and cuſtoms.} foundation of this ancient kingdom, we ſhall only date from the building or rebuilding of its metropolis by Cadmus, to avoid all the fables and uncertainties which preceded that period, and concerning which, whether we make Ogyges or any other hero to have reigned in Bœotia, we cannot gather any light from even what we have left out of the fable writers. Even the times which elapſed between Cadmus, and the celebrated war between the two contending ſons of Œdipus, and which is the moſt ancient piece of hiſtory that we have of all Greece, are ſo ſtuffed with the vileſt and moſt abſurd fables of gods turned into ſatyrs and devils, and of men turned into ^{Chronology.} monſters of cruelty and luſt, that we hope we ſhall be excuſed for ſkipping over all that has not ſome affinity with the hiſtory itſelf. The time in which chronologiſts place the rape of Europa being about the year of the world 2550 ^{Of the flood}, and of the flood 1545, the rebuilding of Thebes may be ſuppoſed to have been within a very few years after. From thence to the time of its being totally deſtroyed by the Epigoni it had ſtood above 230 years, under the government of eleven kings, two whereof were not of the Cadmean race, but uſurpers. After this there reigned in Thebes two kings more of the race of Œdipus, and three of the race of Penelus the great grandſon of Bœotus. Beſides theſe we find Homer mentioning Etion as king of Thebes. We have ſpoken of him in another place †, and ſhall omit him here in our liſt, becauſe it doth c not appear that he was of the Cadmean race, nor is he mentioned by Pauſanias among the Theban kings, though he may have ſignalized himſelf in the defence of that city.

The LIST of the Kings of Thebes, according to our Author, is as follows :

1 Cadmus	Lajus reſtored.	12 Tiſamenes
2 Polydorus	7 Œdipus	13 Auteſion
3 Labdacus	8 Eteocles and	14 Damaſichthon
4 Lajus	9 Polynices	15 Ptolomeos
5 Amphion an uſurper.	10 Laodamas the ſon of Eteocles .	16 Xuthus
6 Zethus his brother.	11 Therſander ſon of Polynices .

f After this laſt the Thebans, grown weary of kingly government, reſolved themſelves into a commonwealth, as ſhall be ſeen in the next chapter.

Cadmus, according to the Greeks, was the ſon of Agenor king of Sidon, or, according to others, of Tyre ; but according to the Sidonians his country men, he was no more than the king's cook : theſe add that his wife Hermione was likewise a mere minstrel at court, with whom he ran away into Greece†. The former tells us a that his father sending him and his two brothers in quest of Europa, had forbid them to return without her. Cadmus therefore, having sought her far and long in vain, and despairing of success, came into Bæotia, where, as we have seen above, he rebuilt this city, and laid the foundation of this new kingdom. He was at first opposed by the Hyantes and Aones, who were then in possession of that territory: the former he overcame in fight, and forced them to retire into Locris; but the latter he admitted, upon their submitting themselves to him, to continue there, and to be incorporated with his own people (C). Here he built the city of Thebes, and a citadel, which he called by his own name *Cadmea, which name it retained many ages after.

THE fable adds, that when Cadmus married his wife Hermione, whom the poets make the daughter of Mars and Venus, the gods came to Cadmus and assisted at his wedding; and that he had by her one son named Polydorus, and four daughters, Semele the mother of Bacchus by Jupiter (D), Ino Autonoë, and Agave. After this the Encheleæ, who were at war with the Illyrians, being commanded by the oracle to chuse him their general, he left Thebes to his son Polydorus, and headed them; and here it was that he and his wife are feigned to have been turned into serpents (E), or, as some interpret it, to have degenerated from their pristine civility into barbarians. In this place he begat another son, whom he either called Illyrius from the name of the Illyrians, his new conquered subjects, or else that people took their name from him.

Brings letters
into Greece.

Cadmus is universally allowed to have introduced the use of letters into Greece from Phœnicia. The alphabet at first had but sixteen letters, and was not compleated till a long time after. He also was the first that set up schools there: he taught them more-over trade and navigation, and brags had the name of Cadmean given it, in memory of his being the inventor of it, or rather of his introducing the use of it into those parts*.

Cadmus being retired to Illyrium, as we have seen, left the Theban government to his son Polydorus, in whose reign his great favourite nephew Pentheus, the son of Ecbion by Agave, having had the insolence to profane the rites of Bacchus, was torn in pieces by his mother and sisters. Polydorus, whose son Labdæus, was as yet under d age, when he found himself dying, committed the care of him and of the kingdom to Nycteus, whose daughter Antiope (F), the greatest beauty then in all Greece, being

(C) Who and whence those people were whom Cadmus brought hither, is variously conjectured: some think that he and they came from Thebais in Egypt (2), and that he therefore gave that name to his new metropolis. Others believe them to have been a colony of Phœnicians; but we think Bochart's conjecture (3) the most reasonable, that they were Canaanites driven out of their land by Jeshurun, whose time falls in with Cadmus exactly. Hence it is far from improbable, that this latter was of the family of the Cadmonites mentioned by Moses (4), who were the same with the Hivites, and were called Cadmonim, or Easterlings, because they inhabited mount Hermon, the most eastern part of Canaan, from which the same author supposes Cadmus's wife to have been called Hermione or Harmonia.

The fable of these two being turned into serpents, he thinks to have sprung from their retaining their common name of Hivites, which in the Syriac signifies a serpent.

These conjectures are further confirmed by the name of his capital Thebes, for the above quoted book mentions a city of the same name in the land of Canaan (5); and written in the plural Θεβæ by Josephus (6): this is therefore a much more probable etymon, than that of those who derive it from Theba the daughter of Prometheus (7).

(D) The reason why the poets make Cadmus

grandfather to Bacchus, is generally thought to have been his bringing the extravagant rites of that god into Greece: for it is intirely contrary to the chronology of those, who make Bacchus to be the same with Nimrod, and of those who make him the son of Jupiter Ammon, since in either opinion, he must have been vally more ancient (8).

However Bacchus is feigned to have been the first who found out the use of wine, to have gone upon a three years expedition, at the head of an army of men and women into India, even to the utmost parts of it, and to have reduced and civilized the Barbarian inhabitants of those parts: and lastly, to have returned in triumph upon an elephant (9).

(E) Another fable of him is, that having killed a great serpent, he srowed the teeth of it upon the ground, which immediately became living men, and fell a fighting against each other till they were all killed except five; hence a dear-gotten victory came to be called Victoria Cadmea.

(F) This young princess who was married to Zetbus, is supposed to have been carried off by her own consent, because her dying father gave him orders to punish her, if ever he got her into his hands. But when he had got her, and found that she was pregnant, he contented himself at first with divorcing her, though he was afterwards persuaded by his next wife to clap her into a prison, out of which she was afterwards released by her two sons (10).

a soon after carried off by Epopeus king of Sicyon, he was forced to leave the government and the young prince to his brother Lycus, whilst he undertook a war against the ravisher of his daughter. He went soon after him at the head of his Theban troops, and a bloody fight ensued, in which Nycteus received a mortal wound and lost the battle; upon which he caused himself to be brought back to Thebes, where he left once more his brother guardian of the king and kingdom, and gave him in charge to revenge his death on Epopeus, and to rescue his daughter Antiope. In the mean time Epopeus, flushed with his victory (G), neglected a slight wound, which he had received, and which gave him his death some time after, and put an end to the war. Lycus recovered his niece, and as she was coming back to Thebes, she b fell in labour, and was delivered of two sons, Amphion and Zethus (H), of whom we shall have occasion to speak by-and-by.

3. Labdacus, when of age, finding that Laomedon, who had succeeded Epopeus in Sicyon, was attacked by two powerful enemies, Archandes and Architeles, the sons of Achæus, thought it a proper time to demand his aunt Antiope to be restored; and Laomedon, though then assisted by Sicyon, whom he had invited from Aibens (I), yet chose rather to deliver up that princess, than to exasperate the Theban king by a refusal *. We have seen what reception she met with in a late note. Labdacus dying soon after, left his son Lajus and the government to the care of Lycus.

c 4. Lajus being then very young, Amphion and his brother Zethus, taking the advantage of his minority, invaded the country at the head of a powerful army. Lycus having made it his first care to secure the person of the young prince, the only surviving one of the Cadmean race, went and gave battle to the invaders, and lost the day. Amphion seized the Theban crown, and called its metropolis, or at least the lower city, Thebes, in honour of Thebe their aunt by the mother's side (K), whilst the upper city or citadel retained its ancient name of Cadmea. It is to these two heroes that Homer attributes the inclosing and fortifying the former with a famous strong wall, with seven gates, and a number of stately towers at a convenient space from each other, without which their valour could never have held that city long against the Theban forces (L). A grievous plague raged soon after which destroyed great d multitudes, and among the rest Amphion and his family. His brother Zethus, who succeeded him, fell under other misfortunes; his only son was killed by his own mother, the grief of which shortened his days, and gave the Thebans an opportunity of setting Lajus again upon his throne.

Lajus having married Jocasta, or, as she is called by others, Epicastè, the daughter of Creon, was forewarned by Apollo's oracle, that if he had a son by her, he should be killed by him. Cædipus was the unhappy fruit of this marriage, whom Lajus there-

(G) He is said to have built a temple to Minerva, as an acknowledgment for his late success, and that when it was finished, he prayed to the goddess, that if she accepted of it, she would shew some particular token of it; upon which they add, that an olive-tree grew up immediately before the gate of the temple (11).

(H) These twins, Homer says (12), were begot, not by Epopeus, but by Jupiter, who fell in love with Antiope. The first exploit was to murder Zethus and his wife, and to rescue their mother out of her confinement. After this they seized on the government, and performed wonders in the building of the walls of that metropolis, as we shall see in due time.

Antiope is also called Nycteis from her father Nycteus, and the ancient Semotic poet celebrates her in verses to this purpose; That she had Asopus for her father; Epopeus and Jupiter for her gallants; and Amphion and Zethus for her sons (13).

(I) Who, the Sicyonians say, was not the son of Marathon, the son of Epopeus, but of Metien the son of Eretheus (14). Hesiod makes him the son of Eretheus, and another of Pelops (15). We are all in the dark about it; the reader may see what we said of him in the second section of this chapter.

(K) Some pretend that she was one of the three daughters of the river Asopus, or rather of Asopus the Philasian, from whom that river had its name; but the Boeotians affirm that she was the daughter of Asopus the Boeotian, probably the same which was also called Nycteus the father of their mother Antiope, whom Asius above quoted calls Asopus.

(L) What the fable adds concerning the miraculous effects of Amphion's lyre in the building of those walls, is so well known, that we need not say any thing farther about it, than that Amphion had first brought music into Greece, from Lydia where he had learned it (16), and that it was so admired for its novelty and excellence, that he easily captivated the people to carry on that work, whilst he diverted them with the music of his harp; and probably also by his eloquence, which he was no less a master of, persuaded that as yet barbarous and wild people to live sociably and in community.

fore gave to a shepherd to be slain (M); but he, moved with compassion, left him exposed in a place, where he was soon after taken up by the herdsman of, and presented to Polybus king of Corinth, who healed his feet, and from the swelling which the boring and anguish had left in them, called him Œdipus, and brought him up as his own^f. When he came of age, and understood that he was not the son of the Corinthian king, he went to the oracle of Delphos to enquire after his parents, and at the same time Lajus led by his fate went likewise to enquire what was become of his son. They met at Phocis, and some scuffle happening between them, Œdipus unwittingly killed his father and went to Thebes, where he married his mother Jocasta, and obtained the kingdom, by expounding the Sphinx's riddle (N). Eteocles and Polynices, were the unhappy fruit of their incestuous embraces (O). Some add that he had also two daughters by her, but others say they were by another woman.

As soon as Œdipus was apprised, by a fatal train of calamities, of his parricide and incest, the horror of his guilt threw him into such a fit of distraction, that he tore his own eyes out, and having cursed his unhappy posterity, was led by his daughter Antigone to Attica, where he took sanctuary in Eumenides's grove, and soon after ended his miserable life. As for Jocasta she hanged herself for grief even before he left the kingdom.
